The announcements in the Budget were excellent news for public transport, because they made clear our commitment to securing the future of those projects of vital importance to the region's infrastructure—the Heathrow express, the channel tunnel rail link and crossrail. The £300 million Heathrow express project is an example of a joint venture between the public and private sectors, with the bulk of the finance coming from the British Airports Authority. It will further enhance Heathrow's position as the world's leading international hub. It will mean that all three of London's main airports will be served by fast, direct rail links.

We have recently announced our willingness to provide substantial public sector support for the construction of a high-speed rail link between the channel tunnel and central London. We are also examining the crossrail scheme, to link Paddington and Liverpool Street stations, with a view to maximising private sector involvement, so that can also proceed as a joint venture. Construction is ready to start on the Jubilee line extension, once the promised private sector contributions from property owners have been secured.

Other potential projects in the planning stage are the new underground line between Chelsea and Hackney, an extension to the east London line, a big expansion of Thameslink to improve Network SouthEast's north-south services across London, the docklands light railway extension to Lewisham and the Croydon tramlink.

Mr. Tony Banks: We have heard all that before, and we support many of the transport infrastructure decisions, but when are we going to see some of them? How much longer will we have to wait for the Jubilee line extension, which seems to be closest to an agreement? Can the Minister give us any idea when the agreement will be signed?

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Member has heard the stories before, and will hear them again. It is important that Opposition Members appreciate the good news in London and the south-east. I have absolutely no doubt that those major infrastructure projects will start in the near future. In today's debate on London and the south-east, not one Opposition Member even mentioned the fact that the channel tunnel—perhaps the largest ever major civil engineering project in this country—was due to open later this year. Opposition Members are completely blind to any good news there might be in London and the south-east; they simply do not wish to share it with the House. If the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr Banks) is patient, he will see that we shall be bringing forward the Jubilee line and other major infrastructure projects in the near future. We attach enormous importance to improving transport infrastructure. In London alone, our investment in transport is running at about £2 billion per year, out of a total Department of Transport budget of £7 billion.

There is a clear Government commitment to improving and developing the transport system within the region. To achieve that objective, we are pursuing policies which allow the different transport modes to play their part in responding efficiently to the needs of London and south-east. We are determined to harness the resources and expertise of both the public and private sectors. Just as we are determined to improve the transport infrastructure, we are also determined to improve infrastructure generally and to ensure that every family in London and the south-east has a decent home in which to live.

During last year, the housing market in the south-east continued to be severely affected by the recession. In his autumn statement, the Chancellor announced a huge cash boost to the market. Some £580 million of new money was provided to enable housing associations to purchase new, empty or repossessed homes, to use for the homeless families and others in housing need. Some £200 million of that money has been spent in London, where the pressures have been particularly acute. The housing association sector has responded magnificently to that opportunity. In just 19 weeks, associations throughout London have purchased more than 4,000 homes. Those empty dwellings were clogging up the housing market, and many homeless families have been able to move straight into them. That is helping to alleviate the homelessness problem in London, and further reducing the use of undesirable bed-and-breakfast accommodation, as well as freeing up the whole housing market.

[Mr. Baldry]

The Chancellor also announced a further £50 million for grants to help up to 3,500 tenants of housing associations and local authorities to buy and move into homes in the private sector. Most of those resources are being spent in London. As a consequence of the relaxation of the capital receipts rules, £500 million of extra capital resources is being invested in housing in London boroughs, which means more money for home refurbishment and estate action.

Seven of the 13 London urban programme boroughs have been successful in their bids for city challenge funding —an average of £37·5 million per borough, and a total investment through city challenge of well over £1,500 million. The Opposition did not say one word about any city challenge projects, either in their constituencies or boroughs, or in London as a whole. With that investment we shall reclaim almost 200 hectares of valuable inner-city land which is currently lying derelict or contaminated; we shall improve or build 12,500 homes; we shall start 2,500 businesses; we shall bring into use nearly 500,000 sq ft of business and commercial floor space; perhaps most importantly, we shall preserve more than 11,000 jobs which might otherwise have been at risk and open up nearly 20,000 new job opportnities.

Our policies for the south-east will need to be reflected in the region's planning regime. Last week, we published regional planning guidance for the south-east in which we laid special emphasis on the east Thames corridor, which provides a focus for long-term growth in the region by recycling mainly urban and derelict land without the need to encroach further on the green belt.

London has outstanding assets as a business centre and unrivalled attractions as a place to live and visit. Like all world cities, it has formidable strengths and we are determined to build on those strengths. We have great confidence in London and the south-east. We are determined to ensure that the area will once again lead Britain, Europe and the world out of recession and into recovery. We have confidence in our policies, and when the electors again have the chance to test the Government, I am sure that they will once again return a Conservative Government, committed to ensuring the continuing revival and growth of London and the south-east.

M25 (Link Roads)

12.25 am

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): Were this not a matter of great concern to my constituents and people throughout the south-east and further afield, I might feel some embarassment about raising it tonight. It is, after all, only some two months since I had cause to detain my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic over the same issue. In saying how grateful I am to see him here tonight, at this late hour, I must also say that I can offer no apology for asking the House to return to the matter of the M25 and the proposed link roads. In so doing, I hope to give some of my hon. Friends the opportunity to make known their views on an issue that is of importance and concern to their constituents. I know that my hon. Friends have taken a keen interest in the matter, and that includes my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), who, for family reasons, is not able to be here tonight.

Although it is a matter of deep personal concern to people whose lives, homes, villages, fields and woodlands are directly affected by the proposals, it raises wider issues about transport policy, planning policy, environmental policy and the relationship between all of them. We know that roads and cars are vital to the development of our economy. We know that an efficient transport infrastructure in the south-east—I listened with interest to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment speaking on that in the previous debate—is important not only regionally but nationally. We know that roads and road traffic will continue to play a key role in that. We know that millions of people regard almost as a right the freedom to travel by car, as and when they choose. We know that all commentators agree that demand for road transport, if unchecked, will increase substantially between now and the second decade of the next century.

We also know that roads and cars are damaging to the environment. They are damaging in a local, practical way. When one builds a new road, one inevitably tarmacs over part of a field or somebody's garden, and affects homes and property. In this instance, we are talking about road-widening proposals for green belt land, but there is global damage as well, through emissions of carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxide and carbon dioxide.

We know also that cars are bad for human health. Much more work needs to be done in that area, but, as I said to my hon. Friend when we last discussed these matters, it is not necessary to have a Phd in chemistry to work out that cars damage human health. We are all aware of the tragic consequences that can arise from a running engine in a confined space. I remind the House that in 1990 there were 19 million private vehicles licensed for use on this overcrowded island, and that car traffic had reached 331 billion km a year. Department of Transport forecasts are that those figures will grow by up to 75 per cent. by the year 2015.

These are major issues. My hon. Friend will know that they have been given a thorough treatment in a document entitled "Cars and the Environment: a view to the year 2020", published by the Royal Automobile Club's foundation for motoring and the environment. The fact that a motoring organisation is giving serious thought to these issues is indicative of the way in which the debate about transport and the environment is developing. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that it is vital that the Department of Transport should be at the forefront of new thinking on these matters and not stuck with an accepted wisdom that fails to recognise changing attitudes and new needs.

It is not an exaggeration to say that one of the greatest challenges facing us as we move towards the millennium is that of reconciling environmental health and transport policies. New technologies will undoubtedly help, but the greatest help would be a change in philosophy at the Department. I believe that the link roads concept fails to meet the problem, because it addresses only the problem of traffic congestion, and that in isolation from other issues. It fails, too, because we know that wider roads have a habit of becoming filled by traffic as the years pass, creating greater traffic jams, more pollution, further pressure for more tarmac in the green belt and more environmental damage.

I am delighted that since our previous debate on these issues there has been a positive development. I warmly welcome my hon. Friend's announcement a few days ago that the Department will be introducing variable automatic speed limits between junctions 11 and 15 on the M25. My hon. Friend will recall that I urged the introduction of just such measures in February. He will know, therefore, how much I welcome his announcement. In Germany and Holland, similar systems have proven that the capacity of motorways can be increased by up to about 10 per cent. They ease traffic flow and reduce the risk of accidents and attendant congestion.

I know that my hon. Friend has tolling much in mind. If road tolls are introduced with sufficient flexibility to the busiest part of the M25, I am sure that they could have a major impact on congestion. The majority of cars are on the motorway for short journeys, and it was not built to take that sort of traffic. The fact that it must do so is a major cause of congestion and of the problems that my hon. Friend is seeking to deal with through his link road proposals. The careful introduction of tolling could well keep local traffic on local roads, thereby freeing the motorway for the trunk journeys for which it was intended.

I know also that my hon. Friend may take the view that failure to tackle congestion on the M25 will make life progressively worse on adjacent roads. I share that concern. There was an incident in my constituency a week or so ago that led to the entire motorway being blocked to traffic. That was the result of a possible terrorist-related incident. The amount of traffic that immediately flowed on to the A25 and other surrounding roads caused severe problems for local people using those roads. I share my hon. Friend's concern about shifting traffic off the motorway and on to local roads. I fully understand his point of view.

Equally, it is important to bear in mind the wider issues that I mentioned. There must be a case for seeing the effect that advanced management systems and tolling have on congestion before proceeding with the development of a 14-lane highway in a crude attempt to satisfy a rising tide of demand that cannot in truth be satisfied.

Let us consider also the regional aspects of my hon. Friend's proposals, which conflict with a regional planning strategy that has been carefully developed over many years to promote development in the east of the region. The west is already crowded. I fear that if that link roads proposal is implemented, that overcrowding will become more severe.

My hon. Friend knows that his link roads proposal is not welcome by Surrey county council, other local authorities, or SERPLAN. Large sums of public money have been spent developing a coherent and balanced regional strategy under the auspices of the Department of the Environment. The link roads proposal does not complement that in any way, but runs counter to it.

One criticism of the link roads proposal and other plans for expanding the motorway's capacity is that they are being developed on a piecemeal basis. Sections of the motorway are being considered in isolation. It is always difficult to develop a coherent, overall strategy if one takes a piecemeal approach, but it is nigh on impossible in the case of an orbital road. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider reviewing the motorway in its entirety. To approach it on a piecemeal basis is further to cut across the developed approach to regional planning.

I ask my hon. Friend to think carefully before making further announcements about the link roads and to bear in mind the points that I raised. I do not raise them glibly but because they reflect the views of locally elected representatives of all parties, local government officers, and the views of many whose lives will be immediately and practically affected by the plans.

My concerns are shared by a growing number of people further afield. They include road users such as myself, who understand the economic importance of road traffic but who are afraid that simple road widening, even on the massive scale envisaged by my hon. Friend the Minister, offers no lasting solution to the present difficulties but instead offers what we should most seek to avoid—a poisoned bequest to our children and to future generations.

12.37 am

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I congratulate my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth), on securing this debate and giving a number of us an opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the concerns of our constituents and ourselves about proposals by my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department for link roads around the M25.

I owe my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic an apology, because for the second time in a week I am keeping him from his bed. Earlier this week, when we were all here overnight, my sonorous breathing in the Library disturbed him. Tonight, we are keeping him out of his bed again. We all know that a Minister's life is a dog's life—or some of it, anyway.

I understand the priorities of my hon. Friend the Minister in respect of the M25. He has the job of keeping the main arterial road around London open and flowing with traffic moving at a reasonable speed. I appreciate that he must make plans to try to deal with the ever-increasing density of traffic on the road, and that, if he does not take some action—now and in future—the traffic flow will seize up.

Others will speak for themselves, but for my part I accept—albeit reluctantly—the need to widen the existing M25 to four lanes within the existing boundaries. However, I want to emphasise my concern, and that of my local authority and constituents. We are worried about the effect on the current environmental safeguards. We have all seen central grassed or hedge lanes of motorways being concreted over. I do not know what the Department's policy is, but I should like to know. Will all the green strips down the centre of motorways eventually be removed in favour of concrete and crash barriers, which will have a much harsher environmental impact?

[Mr. Mark Wolfson]

There is also concern about the existing environmental controls provided by banks and trees within the hedged or fenced limits of the motorway. What will happen to them when the motorway is widened to four lanes? What are the Department's intentions, and how will those environmental safeguards be replaced and, indeed, improved? Current thinking on environmental safeguards is now very much more sophisticated than it was when the road was first built. Will there be sound barriers, and will new trees be planted? Is it right for the Department to try to widen the road within the existing limits, rather than enlarging its land-take to provide the space for adequate noise and air-pollution barriers for the future?

What is the current policy on the width of lanes? When the four-lane widening was first proposed, we were told that the widths of lanes would differ, the widest being on the outside and the narrowest closest to the kerb. That strikes me as a rather dangerous proposal. Will drivers know the width of the lane that they happen to be driving in? Perhaps the idea has been thrown out.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): My hon. Friend mentioned trees, which are important in environmental terms. All those green blobs on the maps look very good, and one imagines that a wonderful forest will appear overnight; but, in fact, those blobs will not become trees for 30 or 40 years—for several generations. It is not really a solution.

Mr. Wolfson: I entirely agree. Moreover, if the motorway is widened to four lanes, the trees that have already been planted on the verges may have to go, in which case we shall have to start again from scratch. How does the Department propose to deal with that? As I have said, I reluctantly accept that the road may have to be widened immediately; none the less, I want some answers from the Minister.

Implacable local opposition to the link road proposals is building up. There is great worry about the proposal that, running through green bel: country—some of it of outstanding natural beauty—there should be a 14-lane highway. It is a terrifying prospect.

One sees a comparable width of tarmac only in America, particularly in Los Angeles. If I am wrong, I look forward to the Minister correcting me, giving examples of where 14-lane highways in Britain have been landscaped and telling me that we do not need to worry about them. I shall take a lot of convincing on that score. Such an intrusion into very attractive countryside is an appalling prospect.

Due to the lateness of the hour, the full picture is not emerging of the mounting concern of hon. Members and local authorities throughout the circumference of the M25. Those who are participating in this debate are the ones who may face difficulties during the earliest stages of the proposals. As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East said, we are not happy about planning applications for the proposals being submitted on a piecemeal basis. We believe that the only fair way of bringing this matter properly to the attention of the public is to look at the road as a whole, as part of the strategic planning for London and the south-east.

I am concerned, too, about the effect on work and living patterns which widening the road, and in particular building the link roads, will have. Where will this end? It is a short-term solution which, over the next 20 years, might deal with the overcrowding, but if, during those 20 years, we continue to make it easy for people to live in Surrey and work in Hertfordshire, more of them will do so. We shall therefore add to the problem. We must think about population growth, where the jobs will be and whether, in the 21st century, it will make sense to encourage people to travel the distances that they now travel to work, using the road network.

When my hon. Friends and I talk to people who work in our constituencies, we find that often they tell us that they have not moved house because they are now able to get round the M25, even though they may have to start very early in the morning and put up with the great congestion on the road. It allows them to follow their present work and living pattern. What sense does it make to allow that process to continue? It will lead to the same problem all over again in 20 years' time. A 14-lane motorway and its link roads will no longer be adequate; we shall have to create a 20-lane, or more, motorway. We shall be no further forward.

As for noise barriers, is it proposed that better noise protection barriers will be provided? I am pleased that the Department of Transport now accepts that different road surfaces produce different levels of noise. Before my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) became a Department of Transport Minister I remember writing letters to the Department asking whether its officials were aware that some surfaces were quieter than others. They wrote back and said that their experts had told them that there was no difference in the noise level. We were not experts. We were common or garden people, but we could tell that there was a difference. At last, the Department, with or without its expert advice, has accepted that there is a difference and is promoting quieter road surfaces. However, they are not being promoted fast enough. The materials that lead to lower noise levels should be used not just on new roads but on roads that are resurfaced. One of the banes of modern life, which can turn heaven into absolute hell for many of my constituents, is to have a very noisy road running close by. There is no doubt at all that the plans for the M25, as they stand, will result in a horrifying increase in the level of noise.

On the question of noise barriers, we look to experience abroad, where, it appears, there is a much greater readiness to provide new and different types of barrier. Motorways on the outskirts of Paris and those running past other French towns have very tall barriers, and different wall angles are used to break up noise. Then, to disguise the ugliness of the barriers, trees and creepers are planted. There is much more advanced development than has been achieved in this country so far. My expectation is that Kent will follow the good example of Surrey, where parts of the M25 have wooden noise barriers already. We have never had any such things in Kent. I do not know whose fault that is, though I can happily say that the situation arose before I became a Member of Parliament. However, we will try to learn and to see that very much better barriers and bunds are provided in the future.

There is an absolute need for a clear transport strategy in connection with the M25 proposals. The Government must consider, and there must be a public debate about, the balance between road and rail, between bus, train and car. I welcome the proposals for road pricing and the recent announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport about the possibility of tagging a motorist as a means of measuring the amount of time he spends, for example, driving on London roads and the distance covered. These are sensible policies. We must move from a situation in which people are not immediately aware of the cost of a car journey, as they are aware of the cost of a train journey when they buy a ticket. Only after having met much of the cost of running a car does the motorist buy the petrol, which is the only immediately apparent cost. If we are to control the use of cars, it will be necessary to make a more immediate charge for the use of congested roads. The idea of congestion pricing makes good sense to me.

I want to deal with the question of public transport, which has to be considered in balance with private transport. I call for renewed priority to be given to improvement of the public transport system in London as a corollary to limiting the intrusion of link roads into the countryside in the area of the M25. In the debate on an earlier topic, an Opposition Member quoted a recent CBI survey which suggests that traffic congestion in London costs industry £10 billion a year. As I am a realist in respect of these matters, I do not expect that there will be an opportunity to prevent traffic congestion, however good the public transport system may be. However, there is a good deal of room to make the public transport system in London more comparable with the systems in other capital cities. Paris is the one that I know particularly well. In that city there are at least four highly developed forms of rail transport—the 19th century railway system; the high-speed railways, which run directly into the capital; the metro system, which is comparable to our tube; and the RER high-speed trains, which criss-cross the city at 60 mph. The parallel proposals here are for crossrail and the line from Heathrow to central London.

Those proposals are only a beginning—such services have existed in Paris for 20 years or more. The French had major problems about, among other things, the environment when establishing their services, but they went ahead. I appreciate the fact that French law allows central Government greater freedom to make final decisions than is the case here.

Having used the French system, I know how good it is in comparison with ours. I also know that, year by year, London's public transport system is falling behind that of our continental competitors—and they are competitors. Whatever our political views, we must accept that a good public transport system is an absolute necessity for a capital city which wants to stay in the world class for business.

There are proper interchanges in Paris. The suburban stations on the RER lines have been developed, and bus routes run out to residential areas. The whole system is integrated in a way that we have so far not been able to achieve, so I welcome the appointment of a Minister with responsibility for transport in London. The appointment was long overdue and very necessary.

As a corollary to asking for a more integrated approach to the particular proposals for the M25 link roads, we must accept that it will be necessary to increase investment in public transport in and around London to prevent the countryside from being literally swamped by concrete pathways for the motor car, which would still not enable people to go about their daily business on a decent system.

12.56 am

Sir Geoffrey Pattie (Chertsey and Walton): I speak as a keen user of motorways. If I can escape the traffic congestion, I hope to be using a motorway in a few hours, and I do not need the Minister, now or at any other time, to extol the virtues of rapid motor vehicle surface benefits.

The Department of Transport talks of adding another lane to the M25. My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) reminded us that even increasing the number of lanes from three to four involves certain hazards. Without meaning to, the Department has done us a great service. Its link road proposals are sufficiently grotesque—adding another six lanes to what will be eight lanes—will force many people, including me, to say that, although there have been considerable benefits to be had from motorway travel until now, what will happen when we fill up the six new lanes, as we shall? Will we have another six and another six after that?

The policy appears to be to have a bypass around this, an extension to that, and an extra lane somewhere else. Successive Governments have done the same. I sympathise with the Minister because the main problem is to know when it is time to call a halt and recognise that we are heading into the proverbial cul-de-sac. We are not in the Australian outback or the Nevada desert; we are a small country with a finite resource. The image that people have of this green and pleasant land is not one of motorways but of fields, hedgerows and downs, which are relentlessly being eaten up.

I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister that there is nothing remotely resembling personal criticism of him, and no offence meant, when I talk about "the Department". I know from experience in government how difficult it is for anyone holding ministerial office to be able to initiate a review of policy, but I have to ask whether even the Department of Transport is capable of producing what I think we need, which is a new transport policy to take us through not only the rest of the decade—it is too late for that—but into the next century.

For example, is the Department of Transport capable of integrating the road and rail aspects of transport? We have my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic —how grateful we are that he is here tonight—and we have a Minister for Public Transport, who is responsible for rail transport. We should feel more comfortable if the Department of Transport issued a proclamation that it was examining the future transport needs of the south-east, and of the whole country. We are focusing on the M25 tonight, but if what I am saying has any force at all, it has equal force anywhere in the country. I am talking about considering transport as an integrated activity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth), who initiated the debate so excellently, said that there was a sense of growing unease among many people, and not only in the south-east. That unease is not simply the predictable kind, which enables Departments and civil servants to say, "Oh, well, let us give them some compensation, because some people's houses will be affected," and the other standard stuff that we always hear when a bypass is going through a housing estate, or whatever. The unease that people feel about current proposals is different; it is deeper. People are really starting to ask whether we have reached the point in transport development at which basic questions have to be asked and answered.

[Sir Geoffrey Pattie]

How will we move people about in the first decade of the next century and beyond? As my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks explained so well, the existence of the M25 has made possible a whole series of journeys that were never possible before. Someone can live in Braintree, for example, and work near Guildford; and there are many such permutations. Who am I to say that that is wrong? But it has drawn traffic in. When the Department of Transport sees that, its answer is, "We must provide more facilities: let us widen the road so that even more cars can come on to the motorway."

That represents one of the rare examples that I can think of in this country of our not providing market mechanisms such as tolls. On a personal note, I must admit that I am one of the people whom my hon. Friend the Minister and his proposals are trying to get at. I frequently get on to the M25 and leave it at the next exit, because my constituency of Chertsey and Walton is situated precisely between exits 10 and 11. If I had to pay £25, or whatever, for the privilege at peak time, I might think twice about doing that.

In the past two weeks the Minister has produced what seems, prima facie, a sensible proposal—to manage the flow of traffic with speed restrictions. But I ask him to consider the results. Apparently the proposal would result in large gantries appearing over the 14 lanes. I know that there will not be 14 lanes at the pilot stage, but let us look ahead at the grotesque nightmare that will eventually materialise. There will be 14 lanes and gantries with all sorts of messages on them, and drivers will be jockeying for position, trying to work out what the signals are telling them to do. Are they to reduce their speed or increase it? If they are three lanes from the lane they ought to be in, it will be like the dodgems.

Simply adding more lanes on the scale proposed is not the answer. Had the Department been smart enough a few years ago to leave a slightly wider curtilage, which would have enabled it to move first from three to four lanes, then from four to five in two or three year's time, and then from five to six, it would have got away with it. It would have seemed unreasonable for my hon. Friends and I in future debates to say that we did not like the fifth lane, or were not happy about the sixth lane, when only one lane was being added.

This is the big leap: we are to have an extra six lanes. My hon. Friend the Minister must not underestimate the intensity of the opposition, which is not based just on the fact that people are saying that they already live near it and do not like it or that they will lose their houses. The people who will lose their houses are lucky. We are beyond that —we are talking about colossal environmental damage and fantastic pollution.

The Department needs to think about work patterns, and about the 60,000 or 70,000 people who work at Heathrow, nearly all of whom drive to work, and many of whom would not do so if a satisfactory alternative transit system existed. My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks has described cogently the Paris transport system. The sad fact that we have to face, which involves successive Governments, is that we have not solved the problem of how to move people from the conurbations around London in and out of the city, whether they are travelling for leisure or for business purposes.

I urge my hon. Friend to take the message back to his Department from the debate that this is not just a knee-jerk reaction by a bunch of well-meaning Members from the shires, as I suppose we are called. This is but the start. These are the early shots in a campaign which will last a long time. It will last as long as his Department persists with the proposals. We intend to use whatever means we can to encourage the Department, if I may put it in those terms, to justify what it is doing and to urge it every step of the way to think again and to develop the integrated transport policies that we believe are the only sensible recipe for transport use in the early part of the next century.

1.7 am

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): My hon. Friends who have taken part in the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) have covered much of the ground involved in the effective doubling of the M25. I want to paint a picture of the area where it is proposed to start, which may not be familiar to all hon. Members—roughly the part between the M4 and the M3, going towards Chertsey, in other words, Egham to Chertsey. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) will forgive me for mentioning Chertsey, but I had the honour to represent the people in that area until they took the wise decision to have him instead of me.

It is a lovely area. From St Anne's hill at my hon. Friend's end of the constituency, to the village of Thorpe in my constituency, to the ancient town of Egham on the edge of the River Thames, it is a great beauty spot. Thorpe is a beautiful village, surrounded by the M25, the M3 and the Thorpe water park, which is quite agreeable on a nice day. The village will be squeezed even more by the doubling of the M25. It is a lovely village with its ancient church. Coincidentally, it is reputed to be the place where the first Christian worship took place, so it is an historic church. Thorpe is a traditional English village where people have lived happily for hundreds of years.

I shall pick up the theme of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton. He said that people originally accepted the M25. There was an understanding that there had to be a belt road round London to avoid congestion in the capital. People accepted it, although it did enormous damage when it was built. The M25 goes close to the village of Thorpe and touches the town of Egham. As my right hon. Friend said, the noise is appalling.

People accepted the road because there was a national interest in it and they understood the logic of it. None of them in their wildest imaginations believed that my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic would make this proposal. My hon. Friend is benign, extremely efficient, charming and distinguished. He has only good attributes: I cannot think of a single negative attribute. That is a rare thing to say about any Minister—we get to know the negatives quickly. My hon. Friend the Minister does not have any negative attributes. The only problem was that he made this proposal. People could not believe that someone would double the motorway. It was absolutely astounding. In the years that I have represented this lovely part of the world, I have known nothing like the anger and horror which spread.

When the proposal was mooted, it was fascinating. I went to an exhibition in Egham in the literary institute building. The building is beautiful and I commend it to my hon. Friends who have not yet been there. There were two gentlemen from the Department of Transport at the exhibition, although my hon. Friend the Minister was not there. There were a lot of anxious burghers of Egham at the meeting who asked the officials, "Even if we accept these feeder roads—which we certainly do not, but let us say that we do simply for the matter of argument—as necessary to resolve the present problems, for how long will they resolve the problems? What will happen when the feeder roads get filled up? Will you take another eight lanes or build something on top or underneath?" We were treated like idiots. The officials may have been right or wrong. We may be idiots. We got the odd reply that those matters are not relevant because this solution will be the all-time solution. We heard the same thing when the M25 was built.

We have the advantage of some traffic flows which are expected in the year 2015—they were announced in a parliamentary question. That is a few years on. Undoubtedly, my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic will still be in the same position: he may even be the Secretary of State for Transport by then. There will certainly be a Conservative Government. In 2015, he will be 74. We will probably have another Adjournment debate to discuss this issue and it may well be at an uncivilised hour, as well. My hon. Friend the Minister will be 74 and I will be 81, so it will be much worse for me. Undoubtedly, I will stagger or totter into the Chamber and say that this sort of thing is wrong.

The figures show that nearly a quarter of a million cars will travel between junctions 14 and 15 daily. They are silly figures because we know that such figures have always been wrong. My hon. Friend the Minister has given the figures in all honesty, and he is a man of the highest integrity. I do not believe that he is trying to trick anyone. However, I do not think that any true credibility can be given to the figures. Forecasts are made and it is said that this will be the all-time solution until the year 2015; but the figures could be at least 50 per cent. wrong. I believe that the initial figures for the M25 were more than 50 per cent. wrong.

We know what is happening. The Department feels that it must do something—and that is understandable. It is what politics is about: instant action to get instant results. However, as my hon. Friends the Members for Surrey, East and for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) said, when one is talking about the future of the countryside and green belt areas, one cannot be short-termist. Once it has been concreted over, it cannot be deconcreted. People in our part of the world have accepted the M25 as being generally in the national interest, but hereafter we face creeping concretisation—if I may be allowed to use that phrase. It is short-termism gone mad.

We need some real lateral thinking, not the knee-jerk reaction of putting a few more lanes in to keep the whole thing going. I do not know how the suggested traffic slowing measure would work. If traffic on one part of a circular road goes at 50 mph and on another part goes at 80 mph, one does not need to be a great mathematician to realise that at some stage there might be a nasty bump. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton said, one has to read the gantries. I would not be able to read them at all, let alone concentrate on them. So perhaps that is not helpful.

We need to examine how we shall deal with the car. In the past 25 years, the growth in the number of cars has been enormous. Somehow the country has just survived. But our south-east of England has become very crowded. If one takes the increase in traffic in London in the past 25 years and doubles it for the next 25 years, one can conclude that, although the traffic flows slowly now, it would come to a full stop then. So we must do some careful thinking.

First, we must conduct an environmental study of the whole M25. We should not deal with it piecemeal. I do not want my hon. Friend the Minister to think that I am being critical—perish the thought—but I believe that there is an element of divide and rule in the Government's policy. They think, "We will pick off Grylls in this part. We can dispose of him easily. We can eat him for supper. Then we will take the right hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton." He would be rather a more substantial meal than me. They may get indigestion.

We are not too much trouble individually. Tonight, unfortunately for the Government, four of us happen to be together so we are a proper repas, to coin a French phrase. The Government have to do better. We must look at the environmental dimension. I do not want to stray into European policy in a debate on a national issue, because I know that you would tick me off, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, there may be room for calling back that EC figure who was much derided by some of us—Mr. Ripa di Meana.

Sir Geoffrey Pattie: He has retired.

Sir Michael Grylls: Perhaps he has retired or perhaps he is in prison for taking a few pourboires that he should not have taken. Good luck to him. Perhaps we want another Mr. Ripa di Meana to have a look at the whole of the M25 and find some less damaging solutions.

My hon. Friend the Minister has one great attribute which I have not yet mentioned. I do not want to leave any out. He is a real country man. He loves the country and represents the beautiful county town of Lincoln in a beautiful part of England. He understands well the need to preserve the countryside. Perhaps we should look more seriously for solutions to traffic problems. The Government have mentioned road pricing. It would be difficult to operate, but it is a better solution than telling people that they should not use their cars. That would not be feasible. The car is part of our life for the foreseeable future in a free country. As a Conservative, I do not believe that people should be told not to use their cars.

Using price as a way to control the use of cars would be more acceptable than creeping concretisation. This is not the time to go into the technicalities of road pricing, but certainly it can be done without people having to put money into boxes. We can do it with technology. Perhaps another way—I do not necessarily propose this, but I want to put some new thinking into the debate—would be somehow to limit the amount of petrol that people can buy. I do not like rationing. The hon. Member for

[Sir Michael Grylls]

Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is going to have a bit of fun in a moment. He would love to intervene, I am sure, and I would love to give way to him, but time is short.

Perhaps petrol is the key—pricing petrol according to how much is used. A motorist has £500 worth at the normal price, and the next £500 worth at double the price.

Some thought must be given to bringing pricing into the use of cars. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton was right when he said that we are a very small country. But we are particularly blessed because we have had sensible policies that preserve the green belt, so we still have lovely parts of our country, even near great cities such as London, Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool. That has been a precious policy that we must not eat into. If we do, future generations will never forgive us.

So let us look at road pricing very seriously. Even if these feeder roads happen—there is a big question whether they will—when they get blocked up again in the year 2015, and my right hon. Friend is 74 and I am 81, we will still have to come to road pricing, I am absolutely sure. So why not do it now, and not destroy more and more of the countryside?

There is another area that I commend to my hon. Friend, because he is a member of the Government, whom I support with great enthusiasm, and they have a temporary problem with their borrowing, which is forecast to go to a very high level temporarily, until we can bring it under control. I know that my hon. Friend will wish to play his part in bringing that excessive spending under control, because he is a very sound economist and I have discussed these things with him. He wants to see sound money and prudent finances. He does not like high spending any more than I do, and we are spending far too much as a country. I am perfectly sure that he will want to make his contribution from his Department. He is, and would like to be even more, I am sure, the blue-eyed boy of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who needs to bring the financial situation under control.

Most hon. Members come to the House and ask for more money for their constituents—a bit more money for this hospital, this school, that bypass. I am going to shock the House and suggest tonight that my constituency could do without £144 million, which is the estimated cost of this first stage of the feeder road system. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be the first to congratulate me on that generous gesture and will tell the Chief Secretary that the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West has made a generous gesture, and it should be recognised, appreciated and accepted here and now.

We have a very famous part of the country in north-west Surrey called Runnymede, where the Magna Carta was signed. There are some statues and memorials there, and my hon. Friend would surely deserve a statue in that famous field if he accepted my proposal to save £144 million of taxpayers' money. That would be good for the Budget and good for the borrowing requirement. It would please the Chancellor, and we always like to do that. It would give us time to look very seriously at this issue of how we keep the M25 moving and how we deal with the motor car for the next 25 years, while preserving the freedoms that we all want to preserve.

I want to leave my hon. Friend under no misapprehension about the anger that is felt about this proposal in my constituency, and in other constituencies, too; there is also the fear that people's main asset, their home, is under threat. It is not the house that is compulsorily purchased that is the problem; it is the house whose occupants can no longer go into the garden. Their house is not only unsaleable; it is uninhabitable.

Mr. Wolfson: In support of that point, is my hon. Friend aware that there have been road widening schemes in the area near Maidstone and the current compensation arrangements are quite appalling? It is an inadequate way of protecting his constituents from the ravages of road widening.

Mr. Grylls: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. No one dreamt there would be such noise. My constituents accepted the concept and the building of the M25, but they had no idea what the noise would be, and nor did the planners or the Department. They had no idea what the traffic flow would be, so they could not have known about the noise. Now it will be virtually doubled and that is intolerable.

Like those of my hon. Friends here tonight, mine is a loyal Conservative constituency which has always returned a Conservative Member of Parliament, as far as I know. I am sure that it will continue doing so, but the anger of my constituents with their own Government knows no bounds. They are deeply upset and angry and they do not believe that sufficient thinking has gone into the plans.

We need lateral thinking and we need to pause. Let us save the money, and let us find a sensible way of dealing with the problem and not do it through wholesale destruction.

1.25 am

Mr. Tony Banks: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make some comments about the proposal.

I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) on his choice of subject. Having heard the proposal, it is not surprising that the widening of the M25 should have stirred up the Conservatives in the way it has done this evening. I have great sympathy with Conservative Members, and indeed with all the people who will be affected if the Government are foolish enough to go ahead with the proposal. The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) was too kind to the Minister. Perhaps he feels that his gentle persuasion will cause the Minister to rethink, but there are signs of a juggernaut behind the proposal and I am not sure whether the Minister has the power to stop it.

So many proposals start in the fevered minds of planners and civil servants, are taken up by Ministers and, despite the fact that hon. Members across the House consider them to be absolutely appalling, nothing is done about it. No one has spoken in favour of the proposal. Although the Government Whip might speak in favour of it if he had the opportunity to do so, I suspect that he would be a minority voice among those who understand and are directly affected. If Parliament means anything at all, the wishes of Members of Parliament who represent the area covered by such a proposal ought to be taken seriously into account. It will not bother me if the Minister outrages his own side. I welcome the thought of large numbers of Conservative seats falling at the next county council elections, as they may very well do as a result of the proposal. It is not for me to tell the Minister that if he wants to save his political skin and some of his colleagues on county councils in the area he should do something about it. That is his problem.

If the proposal is implemented, it will be devastating to the environment and to the communities, which happen to be represented in large measure by Conservative Members, but that does not mean that there are no Labour voters in the area and that we have no concern for people, whoever they vote for and whoever they elect to the House of Commons.

Sir Michael Grylls: The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that Surrey county council, as a body, and all the Conservative councillors are dead against the proposal and have been fighting it every bit as hard as Conservative Members.

Mr. Banks: I was aware of that fact. The only thing that will concentrate the Government's mind, however, is if they see their party suffering electoral reverses in the county council elections. That might sound like an obvious point for me to make, but I do not want to rejoice in Tory defeat by seeing the scheme go ahead. If the people of Surrey, Kent, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire and Essex want to send a clear message to Ministers, perhaps they should do so by voting out Conservative county councils—even when they know that those councils are as much opposed to the M25 proposals as they, the electors, are.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I must take issue with the hon. Gentleman on that point. The people of Surrey, Essex, Kent and Berkshire are not foolish. They know where they stand on the proposals, which they are against. They know that their locally elected authorities share their opposition. They know that their best chance of getting the proposals thrown out is by re-electing Conservative councillors who will be able to liaise closely with their Members of Parliament to persuade my hon. Friend the Minister to see sense.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend the Minister has not seen sense up to now, even after listening to an awful lot of his hon. Friends trying to tell him why he should. Conservative Members should be more forceful in their treatment of the Minister. Instead of treating him with kid gloves, perhaps they should strangle him—that would be the best way to concentrate his mind.

I understand that Conservative Members are serious about their opposition to the proposals, but I believe that some serious electoral reverses will have to be suffered by their party in their areas so that the Minister understands the depth of local feeling. If a Labour Government were to make such a proposal, I would be up in arms—I would not go toadying to a Labour Minister to beg him not to be nasty to my constituents.

The proposals will have a devastating impact on the affected areas and it is amazing that the Government can come forward with them. In 1986, on the day the M25 was completed, the then Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, described it as "a magnificent achievement". That was a hollow claim even then. Even before its completion, planners realised that they had hopelessly underestimated traffic growth on the motorway. Traffic in the north-west sections grew by between 30 and 70 per cent. within six months of the final stage being completed. Although it was expected to carry 79,000 vehicles a day in 2001, traffic on some western sections already exceeds 200,000 vehicles.

In 1988, two years after completion, 21 out of 26 sections were carrying more traffic than they were designed to carry. The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West referred to the possible intervention of the European Community and the former Environment Commissioner, Carlo Ripa di Meana. The Government's proposal that eight lanes should be completed by 1996 and 14 lanes by 2007 cuts out public discussion and debate in the affected areas. No full plan will be debated, so the environmental impact assessments which the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West wants will not be prepared. They will be prepared for one section at a time. Some sections will be widened before consultations and inquiries into other sections have taken place. That is a ridiculous and irresponsible way to undertake such a development.

The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West also said that he intended to ask Ministers not to spend money in his constituency. I understand why, because the total cost of the 14 lanes will be £2·8 billion at 1990-91 prices. That money could be used to build crossrail, which would be a good way to relieve congestion within the M25 area.

I have a list of all the towns, villages and sites of special scientific interest affected in Kent, Surrey, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire and Essex.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Read it out.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend asks me to read it out, but I cannot do so as it contains dozens and dozens of villages. Widening the M25 to 14 lanes will devastate the countryside around London. Some 60 per cent. of the area affected lies in the green belt. Up to 26 sites of special scientific interest—the official title given to the United Kingdom's most precious wildlife sites—lie near the M25. Seventeen of them lie within 500 metres of it, and many will be damaged or destroyed. The M25 passes through three areas of outstanding natural beauty—the official term used for areas of beautiful countryside—the Chilterns, the Surrey hills and the Kent downs. Widening it would further damage those areas.

The proposal is not the way to deal with congestion. I think that it was the right hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) who said that if the motorway is widened it will be the widest motorway system outside north America. We know what happens: the more roads one builds, the more traffic comes on to them. The Roads Federation will then demand that more roads be built. People in the Department of Transport seem obsessed with building more roads. I wish that they were more obsessed with building railways in this country, but the cry is always for more roads. The roads lobby, with which Conservative Members are dealing, is a powerful political force. As the roads become wider, more traffic uses them, and so the demand increases.

The scheme is crazy, irresponsible and destructive. The Opposition bitterly oppose the proposal to widen the M25. If the Minister does not listen to me—and I doubt whether he will—I hope that he will listen to Conservative voices as on this occasion they are telling the truth and it is about time that he listened.

1.32 am

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Kenneth Carlisle): I, too, am glad that tonight's subject for debate was chosen. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) on securing it, and I congratulate my hon. Friends for turning up in such force to participate in it. The subject is important and I have found the arguments of great interest and thought. I hope to respond satisfactorily to my hon. Friends, but the debate is a continuing one and will go beyond tonight as it involves the development of our transport policy, which is important and enduring. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East has returned to the subject, which I welcome, and I know that he will do so again. He also expressed the interest of some of my hon. Friends.

I was glad to visit the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) only a week or two ago to look at the problem on site. He showed me the road from all angles and I met many of his constituents. He made me aware of his concern. In the House, and on other occasions, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) have also ensured that their great concerns are fully aired. I thank them for being present tonight.

I shall try to answer the issues raised. First, however, it is important to consider the present needs of the M25, which is one of the most important roads in this country. Since it was opened, the traffic on it has increased. It has served its purpose well and has drawn traffic away from London, but now its busiest sections—sections 12 to 15, to which the proposal relates—carry up to 200,000 per day. That is nearly double the amount of traffic for which the road was designed.

There has been much talk about expanding other forms of transport, which we support. We want a balanced transport system, and put about as much money into railways and public transport as we do into roads. But 90 per cent. of freight and people travel on our road system. Even if we doubled the number of people who travelled by train, we would hardly dent the numbers who travel by road. The M25 is already full to overflowing, so the problem is one that we face now, not one that will have to be faced in 10 years' time. We need a better road system now.

The M25 is not just a local road, although surprisingly it is that as well—two thirds of the traffic which gets on at the M3 gets off at or before the M4—so we can look at sections of the M25 in their own right, serving a local community. It also serves as an important road for through traffic. I have more letters than ever saying that we must improve the road. People write from Scotland to say that the biggest bottleneck between Scotland and their markets is the M25. We must stand up for a big silent majority who want not to face congestion on roads, and who want the roads to be improved.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton is important in the industrial world, and is an important man in my constituency of Lincoln, where he is the chairman of some of the companies there. When I visit those companies, the biggest complaints that I have about their ability to compete is that communications are not good enough and it takes them too long to get their products to Heathrow or the channel ports. It is therefore vital for the economies of communities north of Watford, in Lincoln, in Yorkshire and in Lancashire, that the M25 should work well, and we are determined to ensure that our plans for the M25 relate to that.

My hon. Friends have said that they want to see the future of the M25 set in its strategic context. That is the right way to go about things, and it is what we seek to do. Many papers have done so. For example "Roads for Prosperity" in 1989 had a section on the M25, and that was followed up by the White Paper of 1990. We also had, in 1989, the M25 review, which dealt specifically with the M25, followed in 1990 by the M25 action plan, which again looked at the M25 in its strategic context. I have promised my hon. Friends and the county councils representing the areas surrounding the M25 that when we come up with the results of the consultation paper on link roads we shall have a further paper on our strategy for the M25.

The case for a better M25 is proven by the existing weight of traffic on it, by the needs of the economy and by the congestion. People who live around the M25 should ponder a little on what happened when it was closed by the false alarm that a bomb had been placed on it. Traffic was forced on to local roads, where it had been before the motorway was built, causing great inconvenience to all the local communities. The number of cars on the roads will further increase. We have fewer cars per person than Germany and France, but as prosperity returns, more cars will be bought. If we do nothing to the M25, and do not improve that existing route, in 10 or 15 years' time, those communities will be angry about the congestion. There is an argument that we should seek to keep traffic on existing routes so that it does not spill over into surrounding communities.

I agree that there is a strong argument that we cannot continue merely to build roads. We must have new thinking, and within the Department there is the genesis of many new initiatives. First, we can use new technology —some of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton produces—to manage roads better. We are increasingly erecting variable message signs on motorways to enable us better to manage traffic flows. We recently announced a trial of controlled motorways, which we hope will help to improve the flow on existing motorways. As that will not be enough, we are examining pricing. I may be unpopular as a result, but I must say that we are considering it.

We are undertaking some research into road pricing within towns and cities. That is city congestion charging. We hope that we shall be able to develop ideas and technology so that if we wanted to go ahead with an experiment, we could do so. It is important to separate towns and cities from the flow of traffic between communities. We have said that in May we shall be producing a Green Paper on motorway charging, which will be between cities. I shall be grateful if my right hon. and hon. Friends respond to the paper. As the Minister with responsibility for roads, I recognise that it is vital to improve the flow of traffic between towns and cities. The roads which link them are, unfortunately, not yet good enough. They are far worse than their counterparts in many other countries on the continent. Our inter-urban roads need to be improved, even if we have to move towards some concept of motorway charging in the long-run. I am convinced that within towns and cities we cannot make provision for ever more traffic. Therefore, we are developing comprehensive packages within towns.

The other day I visited Chester, where we have helped to fund a park-and-ride scheme. Eventually, there will be five or six extremely good car parks on the edge of the city, where motorists will park their cars before taking a 10-minute journey into the city centre at a very cheap rate.

We are examining city congestion charging, park and ride, controlled parking, bus routes, and so on. These ideas are developing quickly in our communities. There is much to be said for the integration of transport, but I tend to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West that we cannot dictate to people what they may or may not do. We must depend very much on the private sector to ensure that a bus meets a train when it arrives at a station. Within that use of the private sector, we are seeking integration. In the coming year we shall invite local authorities, when they bid for transport supplementary grant, to adopt what we call a package approach, if they can develop one. That means submitting a bid which can balance, as it were, buses, railways, the need for roads, park and ride, and so on. That is a useful initiative.

My right hon. and hon. Friends are rightly worried about the environment and it is important that we adopt a sensitive approach to the building of roads. First, we accept that it is difficult to build a road on a green-field site. If we do not improve existing routes, however, we may be forced to build a road where one did not exist before. If we are to improve our road system, we must expand existing routes—that is the way to do it.

The realistic speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks dwelt on environmental aspects. There have been improvements in that respect. Our "Good Roads Guide" described how new roads are made to fit better into the landscape, and false mounding and false cutting is used far more imaginatively. I agree with my hon. Friend that there is great scope for higher and more environmentally friendly noise barriers. Such new techniques, together with quieter road surfaces, will be used to make roads more acceptable.

When designing roads, we must consider each section in detail to determine how it should be constructed. My hon. Friend asked how the road would be constructed in his constituency, if we decide to widen within the existing boundaries after consultation. If my hon. Friend will visit the Department, we can show him how each section will be dealt with in the most sensitive way. If we were to go ahead with link roads on the west of the M25, the road's existing design would be improved. About two-thirds of the land taken for the link roads would be used for landscaping —the planting of trees, banks, mounding, and otherwise making the road less obtrusive. When I visited the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West, I reached the conclusion that our designs would make the road less intrusive than it is today. If we went ahead with the link roads, we would take great care to design them properly.

As my hon. Friends know, we take consultation seriously and have consulted on the link roads. I cannot say yet what we shall do because we have not concluded our consideration of that consultation. If we were to go ahead because the existing need for the road was considered pre-eminent, we would bring forward a full environmental assessment. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) should understand that. It is not as he said. We would attempt to take people with us when we announced the preferred route and would show them the plans in more detail. They would of course have the right to a full public inquiry at which they could advance their views.

Sir Geoffrey Pattie: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the public inquiry and related procedures would be on a motorway-wide basis, and not deal with one section after another?

Mr. Carlisle: It has to be on the road that is being built. It would not make any sense to hold an inquiry on junctions 12 to 15 and on the Dartford bridge at the same time. They are not related closely enough. When one considers the flow of traffic on the M25, it is clear that it is a local road. My right hon. Friend said that he uses just one section, as he nips to his surgery and back again. When the results of the consultation are published, and if we are to go ahead, we shall produce a strategy document which will consider the M25 in the round.

Sir Michael Grylls: Will my hon. Friend undertake to include in his paper all the options for the feeder roads?

Mr. Carlisle: I shall try to be as helpful as possible. I believe that there is an economic need for a better M25. We shall consult, and we shall be as sensitive as possible. I fully understand that we must develop our thinking about how to manage traffic in the future. Although roads are economically important, we all know that they are only a part of life and need to fit sensibly into the existence of a civilised society.

Atomic Test Site (South Australia)

1.54 am

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): This debate was prompted by the civilised and honourable campaign conducted by the Maralinga people of South Australia to have their land—or much of it—restored to them in a way that will allow the continuation of a culture that has existed for many years.

Between 1953 and 1957, the United Kingdom Government conducted nine atomic tests and 700 minor trials in the traditional lands of the Maralinga people. Those lands were restored to them in 1984 by the South Australian Government's Maralinga—Tjarutja land rights. The Maralinga people were traditionally nomadic, roaming across the Maralinga lands. From the 1920s, rations and a rudimentary education were offered to them by a mission at Ooldea, which was located on the east-west railway line. That mission, however, was abandoned in 1952.

In fact, 1952 was a momentous year for the people. It was in that year that the aborigines who had inhabited Maralinga lands were placed in a mission at Yalata, several hundred miles south of their tribal lands. The people were not consulted; they were simply moved by forces attached to the South Australian and federal Australian Governments. They stayed at Yalata and elsewhere until as recently as 1984. Some of the elders—including Hugh Windlass, who visited this Parliament not long ago—attempted to return to their lands, but were set back to Yalata by federal Australian nuclear test personnel.

Despite the setbacks, the Maralinga people were determined to return to their lands. They began a long struggle for land rights, which culminated, in December 1984, in the grant of title to 76,000 sq km of their lands by the South Australian Government.

The issue of the contamination of atomic nuclear tests sites arouses widespread interest—and, indeed, controversy—among those who seek to defend the interests of soldiers who, it is legitimately claimed, have suffered because of their physical involvement in such tests. On 14 March, The Observer said:

"Britain is facing a multi-billion-dollar bill to clean up hundreds of square kilometres of land seriously contaminated with radioactivity from its testing of nuclear bombs. Legislation before the US Congress threatens to make Britain pay its share of a huge decontamination project at the Nevada test site, which is leaking plutonium and other dangerous radionuclides."

The position in Australia is much less grave. The same article, written by Geoffrey Lean, states:

"Meanwhile, Australia is demanding that Britain should pay a much smaller bill for the clean-up of the Maralinga test site, which it used before moving to Nevada . . . A joint British and Australian investigation concluded that a full clean-up would cost £300 million. The Government and Aborigines have agreed to a £45 million programme."

I should be interested in the Minister's reaction to the press report; the figure of £45 million may be sheer press speculation.

Many people are interested in the issue. Yesterday morning I received a letter from Ken McGinley, the chairman of the British Nuclear Tests Veterans' Association. He says:

"Dear Mr. Godman,

Nuclear Tests—Maralinga.

I write on behalf of the Maralinga Veterans and indigenous peoples of Australia who, I feel, have been treated extremely shabbily since the Atomic Bomb tests in the 1950's. It is the British Government's responsibility to clean up the Maralinga range and fully compensate the Aboriginal people for using their land for scientific purposes."

Councillor McGinley—he is a district councillor in Renfrewshire—goes on to make an interesting observation:

"It is a fact that during the 1950's the British Government was contemplating using Wick [in Scotland] as a testing ground for atomic trigger devices. However, this did not materialise because (according to Lord Penny . . .) the climate was too wet! Otherwise the inhabitants of the north of Scotland would be in the same predicament today as are their Australian counterparts."

Ken McGinley goes on to say:

"It is ironic that countries who have been involved in nuclear testing would not carry out these tests in their own countries."

Some two and a half years ago, Archie Barton, Hugh Windlass and a number of others from Maralinga Tjarutja formed a delegation and came to London with the objective of securing a sympathetic response from both Ministers and Members of Parliament to what I believe to be their entirely reasonable claim that the contaminated land should be cleansed and, wherever possible, made safe for traditional aboriginal life and culture.

I readily acknowledge that our Australian visitors received a courteous reception from the Minister concerned and his officials. They also elicited a great deal of sympathy from Members on both sides of the House. However, nothing was achieved in terms of their legitimate claims. Consequently, a second delegation was sent by the Maralinga people to the Minister with the appropriate responsibilities, Lord Cranborne. Again the response was extremely courteous. Lord Cranborne is a very courteous man. However, matters remained largely unchanged.

The frustration and anger of these fine and decent people concerning what they see as this Government's failure to honour certain obligations that they have towards them and their land is mounting. This, to my mind, disgraceful state of affairs must be ended by joint action being undertaken and financed by the federal Government of Australia and the United Kingdom Government.

I ask the Minister, who always in these debates and others listens with characteristic attention, to accept my view that now that the dust has settled in the wake of the Australian federal election, Prime Minister Keating and our Prime Minister should sign an agreement that would satisfy the needs of the Maralinga people.

Perhaps I could offer a word or two about my involvement in this affair. At the time of Archie Barton's initial visit, a number of Opposition Members discussed the possibility of our visiting the site in South Australia. We agreed that if any one of us were lucky enough, a special effort should be made to travel to Maralinga Tjarutja in order, among other things, to discuss the problems with the local people. For me, that ambition was realised last September, when I had the honour of being appointed deputy leader of the United Kingdom's Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation for a three-week visit to Australia. I am not being facetious when I say that I was in interesting company. The group included the hon. and irrepressible Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). It was an agreeable lot, ably led by the distinguished Conservative hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). We travelled to Maralinga Tjarutja in the company of two representatives of the South Australia Parliament—Mr. Graham Gunn, a Liberal Member, and Mr. Kevin Hamilton, a Labour Member. Those gentlemen were extremely kind, courteous and helpful to their United Kingdom visitors, and I am telling the truth when I say that both were utterly committed to the Maralinga cause. It is my view that this reflects the cross-party support to be found in the state Parliament of South Australia and in the federal Parliament in Canberra.

For our part, we quickly discovered that there were no party political differences between United Kingdom Labour and Conservative Members. In proof of the continuing cross-party support, I quote from a letter that I have received from the hon. Member from Stratford-on-Avon:

"Dear Norman

I am extremely pleased that you have been able to secure the opportunity for a debate here in the House of Commons on cleaning up the former United Kingdom atomic test site at Maralinga. I am only very sorry that I am unable personally to attend this debate, which is to be held at short notice."

The hon. Gentleman refers to the delegation of which we were members and to our briefing, both in Adelaide and at Maralinga. The letter goes on:

"I know that all of us were both impressed and moved by the case put to us by Archie Barton and other representatives of the Maralinga people. I know too that there is a body of opinion in all parties in the British House of Commons that is anxious to secure rapid progress towards a settlement of the outstanding issues which is accepted as fair and reasonable among all concerned.

Speaking for myself, I do not think that environmental standards which may have been found acceptable in 1968 are adequate today. I believe that responsibility for clearing up the test site should be accepted as resting jointly with the British and Australian Governments."

I make no apology for having quoted at some length from the hon. Gentleman's admirable letter. I believe that if his hon. Friends the Members for Billericay and for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) were here at this bleak hour they would be only too willing to voice identical sentiments. The other two Members of the delegation, my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), who is an old friend, and Baroness Hollis of Heigham, hold exactly the same view.

This is a moral issue. It certainly is not a party political issue. For that reason, I have sought not to make a party political speech. The Minister might well ask how one could make a party political speech. After all, both Tory and Labour Administrations have made critical decisions that have had a severe and distressing impact on the Maralinga Tjaratja. My hon. Friends must be reminded of the fact that it was Prime Minister Clement Attlee who, by way of a telephone call to federal Prime Minister Robert Menzies, sought and obtained authorisation for the creation and establishment of this atomic bomb test site. In 1968, it was a Labour Government who made what with 1993 hindsight can be called the erroneous claim that matters had been put right. It was also a Labour Government who prepared the way for the 1979 accord which said that things were all well and good in the area.

Late last year, Archie Barton wrote a letter to Viscount Cranborne, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence: He said:

"Dear Lord Cranborne,

Thank you very much for agreeing to see the delegation from the Maralinga Aboriginal Community and our solicitor on Friday 25 September . . .

My delegation is looking forward to meeting you to discuss the problems facing the Maralinga people arising from the residual radioactive contamination on the Maralinga lands from the British Nuclear Tests, and in particular:

(1) the deep concern of my people at the delay in resolving outstanding questions between the Australian Government and your Government relating to the funding of the clean-up of our lands.

(2) matters of common interest to the Maralinga people and the British Government relating to the future clean-up of the lands and including:

—the views of the Maralinga people as to the most appropriate clean-up;

—the use which my people can make of the rehabilitated land and test site facilities after the clean-up has occurred."

I sincerely hope that there will be no more procrastination or prevarication in the negotiations between our Government and the federal Government. I shall be delighted when the Australian and United Kingdom Governments agree to make fair and reasonable contributions to the overall cost of a comprehensive clean-up of the site. Account should also be taken of claims for compensation by the Maralinga people for the lands which they accept cannot be cleared up.

When I and my parliamentary colleagues visited the site, we were not allowed inside the fence as we did not have the necessary apparatus to protect ourselves. Even though that site is a very small part of the hugh area of 76,000 sq km, it is extremely important to the people of Maralinga Tjarutja.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): In light of his visit to the area, does my hon. Friend know when there might once again be open access to the traditional lands of the Maralinga people, which have been contaminated?

Dr. Godman: I am not a technical man, as the Minister knows. Australian and United Kingdom specialists and scientists believe that a small area will remain contaminated for thousands of years. The aboriginal people accept that that is the case. The McClelland royal commission of, I think, 1984 confirmed that. Another investigation conducted by Australian and United Kingdom scientists made a similar observation. In any case, the parliamentary delegation was not allowed beyond the fence, and I was not going to argue about it.

Yesterday the Premier of the South Australian Government wrote to Archie Barton, and the office kindly sent me a copy of the letter. It is a short letter, and I believe that it is worth quoting, because it reveals the sense of involvement of the state Government:

"Dear Mr. Barton,

I am informed that your compensation claim to the British Government is to be brought on for debate in the House of Commons in the immediate future. I congratulate your organisation on your tireless campaign to pursue the rights of your people, and I reiterate the full support of the South Australian Government for your efforts. Let me assure you that I am committed to assisting the Maralinga people whenever possible in the pursuit of your claim. As you are aware I took the opportunity on my recent overseas trip to meet with the Under Secretary of State for Defence for the Armed Forces, Lord Cranborne, in order to reinforce the importance that the South Australian Government places on your cause. I trust our combined efforts will result in a successful resolution of your claim."

In conclusion, you will not be surprised, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to hear that I hope to hear a positive response from the Minister. The Maralinga people deserve a reasonable reaction to their eminently honourable, peaceable and civilised campaign—I believe that they deserve no less. The Australian federal election is out of the way, and the British Government, with the federal Government of Australia, now have a fine opportunity to settle the issue in the interests of those fine, decent people, the Maralinga people of South Australia.

[Dr. Godman]

2.16 am

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on raising this important and topical subject on the Adjournment tonight. I also commend him for the moderate tone that he has taken; I think that he accepts that there is no party divide on the issue, and that we hope to resolve it.

In my response, I hope to set out some of the history of the issue before dealing with the factors that the Government are taking into account in deciding how to respond to the Australian Government's request for a British contribution towards the cost of carrying out further rehabilitation of the Maralinga site.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, Maralinga is located in a remote and generally uninhabited region of the Nullabor plain in South Australia. It is about 1,000 km from the nearest major population centre at Adelaide. That is why the site was selected, with the agreement of the Australian Government, for the conduct of a series of tests and experiments as part of the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons development programme.

The hon. Gentlemen referred to the fact that the Maralinga people had been moved out, and at this stage it is important to explain that that was Australian Government policy. The people were not moved to make way for a nuclear test site; they were being moved anyway, and once that had happened, the area from which they had been moved seemed an ideal site for nuclear tests. The decision followed a move already made by the Australian Government for other reasons, and that is significant in connection with the claims for compensation made by the Maralinga people.

In all, four atmospheric nuclear weapons tests took place in 1956, and several hundred more minor trials not involving nuclear detonations took place between 1955 and 1963. Most involved the release of short-lived radio-isotopes with no-lasting effects. A few, however, involved the release of quantities of plutonium, which is the primary cause of the residual contamination at Maralinga.

The use by the United Kingdom of the Maralinga site was originally governed by ad hoc arrangements between Her Majesty's Government and the Australian Government. The hon. Gentleman referred to Prime Minister Attlee and his conversations on that with the federal Prime Minister. But in March 1956 the ad hoc arrangement was formalised in a memorandum of arrangements, signed by both Governments. The memorandum provided for the clean-up of the test site to standards agreed by the Australian Government, once the test programme was complete. Accordingly, Her Majesty's Government carried out an extensive rehabilitation operation in 1967, known as Operation Brumby, aimed at reducing residual contamination to an acceptable level, assuming no permanent habitation of the area—the position that obtained prior to the start of the test programme. Following completion of Operation Brumby and a survey of the sites by a joint Atomic Weapons Establishment/United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority team, the United Kingdom and Australian Governments signed an agreement on 23 September 1968, which stated:

"The United Kingdom government have completed decontamination and debris clearance at the Atomic Weapons Proving Ground Maralinga to the satisfaction of the Australian government;"

and:

"With effect from 21 December 1967, the United Kingdom government are released from all liabilities and responsibilities under [the 1956] Memorandum of Arrangements save that the United Kingdom will continue to indemnify the Australian government in accordance with Clause II of [the 1956] Memorandum in respect of claims for which the cause of action took place after 7 March 1956 and before 21 December 1967."

The exception relates specifically to a limited class of claims for death or injury to personnel and damage to property.

The range has remained wholly in Australian hands since then, though the United Kingdom authorities carried out an operation in 1978 to repatriate 0·5kg of plutonium that was regarded as potentially recoverable. An exchange of notes in November 1978 following that operation confirmed that there was "no question of the United Kingdom having any further responsibility to repatriate waste."

This exchange also expressed the United Kingdom's willingness to provide technical advice on further clean-up, should the Australians decide to carry out such an operation.

Since 1968, various surveys and investigations have been conducted by the Australian Government. In 1984, it appointed a royal commission to investigate the situation and propose further action. The commission reported in November 1985 and, among other recommendations, proposed that the sites be released for unrestricted habitation by the traditional aboriginal owners of the land after further clean-up, and that, notwithstanding the 1968 agreement, the United Kingdom should pay for such a clean-up. The Australian Government, in response to the royal commission report, appointed a group of experts, known as the technical assessment group—TAG—in February 1986 to examine options for possible further clean-up of the site. In accordance with the undertaking given by the United Kingdom in 1978, the group included two United Kingdom experts. We also provided two RAF helicopters to assist in carrying out radiological surveys of the sites. The National Radiological Protection Board also carried out some associated studies.

The TAG reported in November 1990 and set out a range of clean-up options, ranging from the erection and maintenance of light fencing and warning notices to the wholesale removal and treatment of large quantities of topsoil. The report also identified the possible broad costs of the options, ranging from less than £10 million to over £300 million, a figure to which the hon. Gentleman referred. A copy of the report is in the Library of the House.

Following publication of the TAG report, the Australian Government approached Her Majesty's Government in September 1991 stating their view that there was a need for further decontamination, that the United Kingdom was liable for any clean-up, and requesting that Her Majesty's Government make a significant contribution towards the cost of further rehabilitation. The Australian Government also claimed that the United Kingdom had a responsibility to pay compensation to the traditional aboriginal owners of the land, Maralinga Tjarutja, for any remaining restrictions on access.

Since that time, there have been a number of meetings and exchanges between the Australian federal authorities and Her Majesty's Government to discuss the matter. This included a meeting in November 1991 between the responsible Australian Minister and my noble Friend, the then Under-Secretary for the Armed Forces. Both he and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, to whom the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow referred, have met representatives of Maralinga Tjarutja to hear their particular concerns. There have also been meetings with representatives of the Government of South Australia, within whose territory Maralinga lies. We have stressed that we see this as a matter between Her Majesty's Government and the federal Government, rather than the state Government.

The current position at Maralinga is that about 3,000 sq km of uninhabited land around the former test site remains subject to restrictions on access imposed after Operation Brumby. The hon. Gentleman confirmed that because he was not allowed into the area. This represents about 4 per cent. of the 76,000 sq km of traditional Maralinga Tjarutja land. The TAG report identified about 100 sq km—about 0·1 per cent.—of the Tjarutja lands as being contaminated to the extent that exposure for continuous occupancy would result in an annual radiological dose of 5 milliSieverts or more. Exposure to 5 mSv gives an annual risk of one in 10,000 of contracting a fatal cancer. It is worth pointing out that the average lifetime risk of an Australian contracting cancer is about one in four. It is worth mentioning that the inhabitants of Cornwall regularly receive an annual dosage of 8 mSv arising from natural background radiation. If the hon. Gentleman had gone through the fence and into the area involved, he would not have been in any greater danger than if he had not been in Australia at all but in Cornwall.

Clearly, those are factors which need to be taken into account in deciding whether further decontamination is required. This is a matter for the Australian Government, as is the option for clean-up which is selected. Our understanding that a middle-range option from those identified in the TAG report has been selected by the Australian Government. This would involve the treatment of some 2 sq km of the test area, the reburial of some waste material and the erection of light fencing. The indicative estimated cost of this is about 100 million Australian dollars, or about £50 million. We also understand that, in pursuance of their case for compensation, Maralinga Tjarutja have claimed the sum of 45 million dollars, or about £22.5 million.

That is the background and history against which the issue has developed. The Government have made it plain on a number of occasions that it is their view that our obligations for the decontamination of the Maralinga site were fully discharged after the clean-up carried out in 1967. That was formally recognised in the 1968 agreement to which I referred earlier. We also firmly believe that any question of providing compensation for the aboriginal population is not a matter for Her Majesty's Government. The Australian Government are well aware of our position, and it is against that background that we have been studying their request for a United Kingdom contribution for further clean-up. The Australian case has raised a number of complex and detailed technical and legal points which have required study and research by my Department's nuclear and legal experts.

That process has been completed and Ministers are now considering what substantive response should be made to the Australian Government. A final decision has not yet been made, but we hope to be in a position to make a full response shortly. Clearly, that response will need to take into account the real concerns which the hon. Gentleman and others have raised about such contamination as remains at Maralinga. We are keen to resolve the issue as soon as possible. I am confident that the excellent relationship which we enjoy with the Australian Government as close friends and allies will enable us to do so.

It is necessary to take into account some of the other points which I raised earlier: first, the site is very remote and was deliberately chosen for that reason; secondly, the absolute risk to health, even without further decontamination, is slight; and, thirdly, the United Kingdom has already cleaned up the site once to the satisfaction, confirmed in writing, of the Australian Government.

In summary, the Government fully recognise the anxieties expressed by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow and others, both in the United Kingdom and in Australia, about the condition of the former test sites at Maralinga. We are examining the case made by the Australian Government for a United Kingdom contribution to further rehabilitation. We have listened carefully to the particular anxieties expressed by the Maralinga Tjarutja about access to their traditional lands. We recognise that, as the hon. Gentleman said, it has taken some time to respond fully to the Australian request. But the hon. Gentleman and others can be assured that that reflects the care with which we have addressed this complex issue.

Post Office

2.30 am

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I ask the leave of the House to speak for a second time this evening, as indeed have two Opposition Members. I hope that the House will be as kind to me as we were to the hon. Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

First, I pay tribute to all those who work for the Post Office. One of the highlights of my annual political year is going every Christmas to see those who work at the Golders Green sorting office. They are among the most friendly and hardworking of people. They have to work the most anti-social hours, but they are for ever cheerful. They are well regarded by those to whom they deliver letters. They also seem to have a good political bias, because most of them tell me that they vote for me.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): They would, wouldn't they?

Mr. Marshall: Constituents do not always say that when one talks to them. I am sure that, even in Greenock and Port Glasgow, they do not always tell the Member of Parliament that they vote for him.

The Government have already privatised part of the Post Office which they inherited in 1979. I want to talk about Post Office Counters Ltd and the Royal Mail. The Government have already developed some franchised offices of Post Office Counters, instead of Crown offices. In my observation, that has frequently led to several advantages. The first is that the hours of opening of the franchised operations are often longer than those of the Crown offices. I do not think that there is a Crown office in the country which opens after 1 pm on a Saturday. The franchised operations almost all open on Saturday afternoon and later at night than many of the Crown offices. Those longer hours are obviously much more convenient for the customers than the rather restricted hours that Crown offices offer.

The second advantage of franchised operations is that they offer a wide range of goods for the customer. In my constituency there is a franchised operation in Temple Fortune. The lady who runs it, Mrs. Lim, offers a much wider range of goods. She sells cards, stationery and other things which previously would not have been sold when it was a Crown office. She has transformed a neighbourhood post office into much more of a neighbourhood convenience store.

Earlier today—in the parliamentary sense—I entertained some constituents for tea in the Pugin Room. They talked about the former Crown post office in Lyttleton road in my constituency, which has been transformed by being made into a franchised operation slightly further along the road. They said that they now received a friendly service. The person who runs the post office recognises all the customers by name. If they turn up slightly after closing hours, he is still open and will still serve them. They get a much better deal from him than previously from the Crown office. Another post office in my constituency used to have a big mausoleum of an office above it. When it became a franchise operation, the franchisee said that he did not need the office and could let it out to someone else who could use it and provide jobs.

We have found that when offices are franchised there is frequently a hell of a row in advance, because people in Britain do not like change, but once that change has happened they recognise that the new office is giving an even better service than was given before, and it is to the advantage of all those who use that operation. If Post Office Counters were to stay indefinitely in the public sector, it would, I believe, face a gentle decline and find it very much more difficult over the years to continue to offer the sort of service that people expect.

One of the major forms of activity at present is paying out pensions and child benefits to claimants, but I believe that increasingly people will not want to go to the post office and collect the cash; they will want the money paid into their bank accounts. After all, it is only relatively recently that wage earners have received monthly payments into their bank accounts rather than weekly cash payments. If we expect people now to get their wages and salaries paid into their accounts, we should not be surprised if pensioners and mums want their social security benefits paid into their bank accounts rather than having to collect them in cash every week. There is also a perfectly sensible security argument for encouraging that. If a lot of cash is kept in a post office, it is much more likely to be the subject of a raid by robbers than if there is somewhat less cash there.

We have to recognise that the service provided by Post Office Counters to its customers will be very much better if the offices go into the private sector than if they stay in the public sector. If they stay in the public sector, the range of choice that they offer will not be increased, whereas if they go into the private sector they will offer a better choice and longer hours of service to the customer, and eventually they will create many more job opportunities for those who work in them, and offer much more sustainable jobs.

We should also look at some of the Crown offices which occupy wonderful sites in main high roads. Under the present financial arrangements, if the Post Office redevelops those sites, the money flows straight back to the Treasury, so there is no financial incentive for the Post Office as currently constituted to earn the property profits that it might well be able to earn if it were in the private sector. It also sometimes lacks the property expertise. There is an unanswerable case for all the Crown offices to go into the private sector, where they will thrive as small businesses with an entrepreneurial skill and flair that they often lack at the moment.

With regard to the Royal Mail, I listened earlier this week to the "Today" programme, or whatever it is that the BBC churns out at 6.15 in the morning, and the views of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) who, like all Liberals, has missed this Adjournment debate and every Adjournment debate before it—one wonders where they are. Perhaps the rail strike has sent the hon. Gentleman to Cornwall; that will no doubt be the excuse.

Listening to the hon. Member for North Cornwall talking about the potential impact on the quality of service of the possible privatisation of the Royal Mail, one had to sit back—if one can sit back at 6.15 in the morning—and wonder if we had not heard all this before. Was it not the sort of nonsense that we heard when British Telecom was being privatised in the early 1980s? We were told then that the quality of the payphone service would only get worse if it was privatised.

What happened? Payphones did not work very well in 1983, but today there are many more payphones and virtually all of them work. Those who say that if we privatise the Post Office and the Royal Mail the quality of service will decline should consider the example of British Telecom. The fears that were expressed when it was privatised turned out to be groundless. Rural telephone services have thrived, just as rural post offices would thrive under privatisation. The overall quality of service supplied by British Telecom has improved.

Similarly, those who run the Post Office believe that there is a case for increasing the level of investment in it. Mr. Cockburn who runs it would like to increase his investment substantially, but I fear that so long as the Post Office remains in the public sector the level of investment will be artificially held down. Privatised industries can increase their investments as soon as they are released from the financial constraints of the Treasury and are able to raise money on the international capital markets.

I remember listening to debates in 1988-89 about privatisation of the water industry. We were told that the industry needed more investment and therefore should stay in the public sector. One might say that argument did not hold water. As soon as the water industry entered the private sector, the level of investment increased, as it did with British Telecom. There has been a 50 per cent. increase in investment in the water industry and a magnificent increase in investment in British Telecom. In Cable and Wireless we have seen investment in a service designed to compete with British Telecom. That would never have happened if both companies had remained in the public sector. The answer to those who say that the Post Office needs an increase in investment to become more competitive and efficient must be to remove the postal services from the state sector and put them into the private sector.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Does the hon. Member accept that the new chair of the Post Office, Mr. Heron, in his evidence to the Select Committee only a few days ago, drew attention to the need for his investment programmes to be free of the present restrictive controls that the hon. Gentleman is rightly criticising? He also said, however, that formulations other than privatisation could give him freedom of investment and access to the capital markets. The hon. Gentleman may be in favour of privatisation, but does he accept that there are other options which would give the Post Office its freedom of investment?

Mr. Marshall: It is terribly easy for those who run a nationalised industry to say that there are other ways to raise money while remaining in the state sector, but we have to consider the Government's borrowing requirement. If the Government were to let rip with the Post Office and introduce some new, ingenious system of financing which meant that they could give it more money, that would not do very much for international confidence in Britain or for confidence in the City and elsewhere in the Government's financial policies. The only effective way to achieve a substantial increase in investment in the Post Office is to put its services into the private sector.

In a labour-intensive business such as the Post Office, it is important to look at the record of productivity. Productivity growth in industries which have been privatised, such as British Steel, British Telecom and the electricity and gas industries, improved massively once they were in the private sector. If we were to apply a similar test to the Post Office, we would find that productivity would increase substantially. Of course we shall be told by existing management that it cannot be done; that is what they said about British Telelcom and British Steel—but as soon as they got into the private sector it was done.

Mr. Cousins: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the evidence, which is attested to by accountants and certified in every way possible, proves that in the past five years productivity in the Post Office, under its existing management, has already increased by 30 per cent.?

Mr. Marshall: It is nice of the hon. Gentleman to point out that under the Government productivity in the Post Office has increased significantly. I thank him for doing that. If one looks at other industries which have already been privatised, however, their record of productivity growth has been even more rapid. I cannot believe that there is not significant scope for increasing productivity still further in the Post Office, given that it has been in the state sector for such a long time.

The opponents of privatisation will ask, "What about pricing?" The history of privatisation has shown that the regulators are even more effective than Ministers in controlling prices. The person who controlled Sir Denis Rooke was not a Minister with responsibility for fuel and power, or the Secretary of State for Energy, but Sir James McKinnon of Ofgas. The regulators are much more likely to be successful at screwing down prices than any Minister, even my hon. Friend the Parliament Under-Secretary of State for Technology, who has appeared diligently this evening to answer the debate.

The life blood of economic progress is a free market economy, based on strong competition. The Post Office is particularly fortunate in the sense that it has been almost absolved from competition. My hon. Friend the Minister should consider the competitive barriers erected against those who seek to compete with it. The private couriers who seek to compete with the Post Office for the dispatch of goods overseas find that, unlike the Post Office, they pay value added tax. I am not suggesting that VAT should be imposed on postal services, but the Government should consider such unfair competition and bias in favour of the Post Office.

My hon. Friend should also consider the restrictions on price competition. Potential competitors with the Post Office must charge a minimum price four times greater than the price of a first-class stamp. It should not be too difficult to remove that barrier quickly.

I apologise to my hon. Friend and to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) for keeping them up, but the issue is an important one. The Post Office serves every household and it would serve people and industry more efficiently if it were in the private sector.

2.47 am

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), not so much on his ill luck in ending up with this time of night for the debate, but on having such a debate. I congratulate him on his excellent judgment in choosing a topic on which debate is long overdue.

The last time that the Minister and I engaged in such a debate was at a similarly unfavourable hour. I then asked him when we might expect the results of the Government's review of the Post Office. He replied—he will put me right if I give a false impression of it—to the effect, "We've had the Post Office for 350 years, so, if we take a lot longer, it won't really matter." At the time, and given my sunny and jovial disposition, I did not contest that proposition. With hindsight, however, I should have done, because the Government have dithered and delayed on that review for far too long.

[Mr. Jim Cousins]

Hon. Members will recall that, on 15 July 1992, the Government announced to Parliament their intention to privatise Parcelforce. The hon. Member for Hendon, South did not occupy himself with that matter, and I understand that. However, it is an important part of the Post Office's activities. On 9 July 1992, after Parliament had gone into recess, the President of the Board of Trade chose to announce by press release his intention for a wide-ranging review of all the Post Office's activities, including the possibility of privatisation.

When we debate the subject again, the House may want to recall that the Government did not choose to make that announcement to Parliament, but, in a cavalier fashion, chose to make it when Parliament was in recess and to do so in the form of a press release. Over an important issue of this sort—I share the views of the hon. Member for Hendon, South about its importance—it was unfortunate and wrong that the Government should have chosen to make the announcement in that fashion, rather than in the form of a statement to Parliament.

What is still more worrying is the fact that no report has yet been given—from 29 July to the present day—about the course, progress, options or more precise details of the matters that are covered by that wide-ranging review of the Post Office. That shows a great disregard for the significance of the issue and it is a further discourtesy to Parliament. The time is long overdue for the Government to come clean about their views on the matter, and to end the muddle and delay that have set in. In the hearing in front of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, to which I have already referred, the chair and the chief executive of the Post Office both described the difficulties that that fact was causing in the management of their business.

The Post Office is not a dead, fixed institution. Its activities, and the way that they are organised, are constantly changing and being adapted. There is always the possibility of new services developing. The hon. Member for Hendon, South took the view that the Post Office was not subject to competition, but clearly it is—both to competition at home and, importantly, abroad. At the same time as the Post Office review has been taking place, there has been a discussion within the European Community of the liberalisation of postal services markets throughout Europe. The Government have never reported back to Parliament on the progress of their review of the Post Office in Britain and, as a consequence, they have not reported back to Parliament on the progress—and their own view—of the liberalisation of postal services markets as part of the developing single market of the European Community. Both those matters are the source of great concern.

It was made entirely clear to members of the Select Committee—of all parties—that the delay and uncertainty were causing the Post Office's investment programmes to be thrown into some confusion. It was made clear that the Post Office's posture on the development of new services was being frozen and delayed. It also became obvious that it was being made impossible for it to develop a proper, commercial reaction to competitive pressures—both the existing ones and those that will soon develop when there is a single market for postal services—because of the Government's failure adequately to determine the matter.

The issue does not rest there. The President of the Board of Trade has given some comments—not to Parliament, but to Radio 4. He gave them not at 6.15 am, but at the far more gentlemanly hour of the lunchtime Radio 4 news programme.

I have here a transcript of the remarks made by the President of the Board of Trade on 1 February to the Radio 4 lunchtime programme. He referred to his press release of 29 July, which was just over six months' behind him. Therefore, in those remarks, he is reporting and rehearsing the product of six months—an enormous time in Government terms—of systematic investigation of the Post Office review, and commenting with the benefit of over £500,000 of private professional advice that had been obtained from a variety of sources, including Kleinwort Benson, Price Waterhouse and KPMG Peat Marwick.

Incidentally, in a parliamentary answer to me, the Government made it clear that that advice is not to be shared with Parliament. I hope that the Minister will give us some assurance that when the review is finally concluded, and the Government's preliminary proposals are made known, the House will be able to share in a scrutiny of that advice. That would be part of the trend towards openness in government, which we welcome. The President of the Board of Trade is making known publicly his advice on other matters, and it is important that he should make it known to Parliament on that matter as well.

He said when asked whether he was still consulting:

"The position is precisely that and I have not taken any decision myself as to where we move from there. I haven't got papers actually in front of me that I could put to colleagues. Colleagues have therefore not been consulted or involved in that process and my preoccupation is to make it absolutely clear that whatever we do there will be a nationwide delivery network with delivery to every address and that there will be a uniform and affordable structure of prices with a nationwide network of post offices. That is what I said at the time. We are looking at options and when The Post Office and my officials come to me I will decide what I think should be the next step."

After six months, and a comprehensive invitation of views and opinions from a wide variety of sources, after the expenditure of £500,000 of public money on private professional advice, we have the poor President of the Board of Trade patiently waiting for the Post Office and his officials to come to him so that he can decide to make up his mind about the issues involved in a process that he launched. That is not good enough. The time has long since gone when the President of the Board of Trade should have formed some opinion about those matters.

It may be that forming an opinion about those matters is not as simple as or uncomplicated as the President might have supposed when he set out on that review. In that case, he must be in a position to come back to Parliament, and if he cannot determine an exact course of action on those matters, he should at least set out a range of coherent alternatives from which he proposes to choose. Those difficulties, the range of the choices, appeared, perfectly properly, in the speech of the hon. Member for Hendon, South. He said that there was the possibility of franchising some of the activities, most specifically in the context of Post Office Counters Ltd. He spoke of privatising—whatever that may mean—the Post Office. It was not clear whether he meant that it should be privatised as a single entity or separate ones—as counters, parcels and Royal Mail. The franchising process to which the hon. Gentleman drew attention seemed to imply that there would be an entity that would act as the franchiser of the franchised services.

These are all practical matters. All the time, sub-post masters and mistresses, new and old, are investing their money in property and facilities and in buying the right to operate post offices when there is uncertainty about what the Government intend for the organisation of the various services. The uncertainty was not resolved after six months, on 1 February, and now over eight months have passed since the review process was set in hand.

We hear rumours. We are told that the Under-Secretary flits about interested Conservative Members presenting a variety of fantastical, chimerical and labyrinthine possibilities. He goes this way and that. The hon. Gentleman is becoming a member of the no-coming-forward group.

The world shares in the fruits of some of the Minister's discussions. Rumours of the Minister's latest idea for the mechanics of the privatisation of the Post Office seep out. Wondering people receive the tiny scraps of information, sometimes with interest and usually with amazement. That is not the way to proceed.

We are talking about more than a state-owned operation. Through Post Office Counters, there is an operation that involves tens of thousands of sub-post masters and mistresses, who are business people and property owners. They have their own small investment programmes. They are not included in the external financing limit, I know. Their programmes are usually with their banks. It is not right, fair or proper that these tens of thousands should still be in a state of uncertainty, awaiting the next insight into what the Government's thinking might be by third, fourth or fifth hand from bits of information that leak out from Government circles.

The time has come for the Minister to declare at least part of his hand. We are talking about more than the potentially global competitive business that we have in the Post Office. The hon. Member for Hendon, South has thrown doubt on its record of commercial success and productivity, but I hope that he agrees that the Post Office is accepted among the public postal services operators of Europe as being by far the most efficient. It is also by far the most cost effective. It is recognised that it offers the best deals on prices.

There is a huge possible postal market. If the Post Office were free to do so—if it were unshackled from the EFL and knew where it stood within the Government's policies—it could become an extremely important and rapidly growing business. We should be planning its success in the postal markets of Europe, which would lead to success for other British businesses engaged in direct mail and publishing. Such businesses work in parallel with the business of the postal services. As I have said, these are important matters. There cannot be total uncertainty for much longer.

We are talking about a business with an annual turnover of £5 billion. It has net assets of more than £2 billion and it employs 200,000 people. It has operated free of subsidy. We are at the start of the 18th year of subsidy-free operation of the Post Office. Far from the Post Office being a burden on the Government, the Government, in their own expenditure planning, intend to increase the negative EFL by more than 250 per cent. in the next two years so that the Post Office will be expected to make, through the EFL system, a contribution of more than £350 million over the next two years to the Government's own accounts.

The Government have chosen to load at least £200 million of extra negative EFL revenue, and to raise that from the Post Office—when the Government themselves have not come clean on their own proposals for the Post Office and its operations over that period. No commercial operation could possibly succeed in that commercial context. The EFL system is not to be compared with a profit system. The EFL is declared in advance—a target set for the Post Office three years ahead of the turnover and commercial operations under discussion. That is a heavy burden to lay on the Post Office at precisely the same time that an open-ended review that has now lasted for more than eight months is in hand.

No sensible public service or commercial operation could reasonably be expected to perform in that kind of context. Even so, the Post Office is continuing to perform and to deliver what the Government want in terms of a negative EFL.

The new chairman of the Post Office, Mr. Heron, made it crystal clear that he does not consider his remit at all reasonable. He challenged head-on, and rightly, the working of the negative EFL system as it applies to the operations for which he is responsible. The Minister must pay some regard to that. If he cannot say where the Government are going with the Post Office review, at least he should respond to direct criticisms of the negative EFL system made by the Post Office's new chair—who described himself as living in a cash book culture that belongs more to the Victorian age. He made the point that that is not a sensible approach for an organisation that should be seeking to develop its activities, and to respond to possible new markets, competitive pressures and the huge opportunity presented by the single market for postal services with new investment programmes.

Mr. Heron made it clear also that a system that requires those investment programmes to be financed in effect out of revenue, which is the working of the negative EFL system, is simply madness.

The Government's autumn statement made it clear that it would be possible for public organisations to go to the private financial markets to raise their capital in a commercial way—yet the Minister made it clear that that new freedom is not to be extended to the Post Office. In the context of the position clearly adopted towards the negative EFL system by the Post Office's new chair, that aspect is one to which the Minister might well direct his thoughts.

The hon. Member for Hendon, South mentioned the use of the Post Office network, which is larger than the combined network of all the banks and building societies, and has more customers. He said that in future people would opt for the important part of post offices' business—handling the payment of pensions and benefits—to be dealt with by automatic credit transfer into their bank accounts.

Clearly that is a growing trend, which may develop as a result of the availability of choice. It is also clear, however, that the Government may well intend to force the hand of those who are receiving pension or benefit payments for the first time, persuading them to choose cash transfer rather than payment through the Post Office. That would be a betrayal of those who operate the Post Office Counters network, most of whom are private business people rather than trade union employees or any of the other figures that the Government like to set up.

[Mr. Jim Cousins]

We must know the direction in which the Minister thinks the Government are going. Does he intend, by negotiation with the Department of Social Security, to allow free choice, or does he intend the Department—by means both direct and surreptitious—to structure choice so that business moves away from the Post Office Counters network?

We do not yet have the transcripts, so I cannot quote from them; but, when the Post Office's director of finance spoke to the Select Committee a few days ago, it was clear that his evidence did not make sense unless he was ignorant of any proposed change in the Department of Social Security's policy in regard to benefit payments through the Post Office network. It now seems, however, that all along the Government have had some plan—a cost-saving plan, perhaps, from their point of view—to structure choice in the way that I have described.

It would be interesting to know whether the Minister was party to the intragovernmental negotiations—whether he was aware of the possibility, or whether, like the Post Office's director of finance, he was operating on the basis that matters would continue according to the present trend, and would not be artificially twisted in some new direction.

I hope that the Minister will give us some idea of the Government's stance on a number of matters, some of which are also of concern to the hon. Member for Hendon, South. There is the question of social security payments through the Post Office network, and the negotiations with the Department of Social Security; there is also the question whether the private professional advice sought by the Government in the last financial year, at great expense, will be sought again in the new financial year on which we have just embarked, involving extra expenditure.

The Minister may not be able to tell us what the options are, but at least he may be able to tell us that there are options—that the President of the Board of Trade has emerged from the period of extraordinary passivity during which he has waited patiently to be told what to say by his officials and those of the Post Office. Have we passed that stage? Are there at least options on paper? Are the right hon. Gentleman's Government colleagues being consulted? How near are we to ending the current prolonged delay? It is not right in terms of parliamentary convention; nor is it fair to the business people whose lives are committed to Post Office services, or to the huge potential business in the Post Office.

The Government have already taken eight months over this matter. Therefore, the Minister ought at least to be able to tell us for how long the Government will allow interested parties, the businesses involved and the British people to mull over whatever conclusions the Government reach. The Government have already taken eight months. They may take nine months, or even longer. The period may stretch into the autumn, unless there is to be a press release the day after Parliament rises for the summer recess announcing the conclusions of the review, thus repeating the very unfortunate and wrong procedure under which the review was started. Will the British people be given an equivalent period of time in which to mull over the very complicated issues involved, so that they can form a proper view about whatever options the Government may put forward?

These are serious matters. We are not talking about a failed public enterprise which is dominated by militant unions, which has had no commercial success and no record of productivity. We are talking about a very important business which has a record of productivity and commercial success and whose operations are directly linked to the operations of tens of thousands of small businesses, which are a structural part of that public enterprise. Much hangs on the review. The time is well past, in every sense of the term, for the Minister to tell us about the Government's view on these matters.

3.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): I thank all those hon. Members who have taken part in the debate. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, south (Mr. Marshall) for making this debate possible and I join him in paying tribute to the staff of the Post Office. It is not often, despite the very long hours that we keep in the House, that we beat Post Office staff out of bed, but as we speak, at 3.16 am, the wheels of that mighty organisation are turning so as to ensure that about 60 million letters are delivered, most of them on time. We should be grateful to the 200,000 members of staff of the Post Office for the dedicated work that they do on behalf of us all.

Since no decisions have yet been taken on the future organisation and structure of the Post Office, I shall have to disappoint the hon. Member for Newcastle, Central (Mr. Cousins) and tell him that I am not yet in a position to announce what the future will look like. It is an important policy area and we are considering a number of factors. However, I should like to address the framework within which the Post Office, whatever the outcome of the review, will operate.

Some people argue—I note that this is the opinion of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South—that the Post Office should be changed, denationalised and demonopolised and that postal markets should be set completely free. They argue that this is the only way in which consumers can have real choice. Others are asking, however, why we are reviewing the Post Office at all. There are people who say that the Post Office should be left well alone, including—as one might expect—Opposition Front-Bench Members.

Mr. Cousins: I do not wish to be misunderstoood on this point. I made it crystal clear in my speech that we want the Post Office to be taken out of the constraints of the negative external financing limit system.

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that. I am also grateful for the advice that he has given us on the workings of the negative EFL system. I take it, therefore, that he is one of those who accept that it was right of the Government to undertake this review. I shall be delighted to give way if the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene to say that we were wrong to do so.

Mr. Cousins: I am most grateful to the Minister. A review was certainly necessary in the context of the commercial possibilities of the British Post Office in the European Community, especially in view of the discussion about liberalisation of postal markets throughout the Community, but that need not have taken the eight months that the Government have already spent—and on the basis of what the Minister has said tonight, it seems likely that many more months will be required.

Mr. Leigh: This is a very complex matter. The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the current review. In fact, the Commission is working extremely slowly on this matter, which is highly complex. Its report is still in draft form. Given the complexity of the Post Office, an eight-month review is not over-long. We are listening to a very wide variety of views and are conducting a very thorough and careful study. I am sure that hon. Members recognise that that is the right thing to do.

The Post Office has made great strides in the last few years—certainly since my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South last raised the subject, in an Adjournment debate in June 1990. The House will want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the very close interest that he has taken in these matters and the great skill and knowledge that he brings to them.

I will reiterate why we are conducting a review of the future organisation and structure of the Post Office. As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said on 29 July last year. The Post Office is facing a period of considerable change. Post Office Counters faces growing competition in a number of its markets. Royal Mail no longer has a monopoly over express products and unaddressed mail. Its direct mail services face competition from other forms of advertising, and competition from the telecommunications sector is ever-growing. Indeed, there is a growing interest world wide in the potential advantages of freeing up postal markets.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Central informed the House about these new opportunities. The time has arrived to consider the potential impact of these changes on the Post Office and, in particular, whether its current organisation and structure should remain as they are. We have to pose the question: "Could the consumer and taxpayer get a better deal?" That is the whole purpose of the review. In short, it is not enough simply to rest on our oars. I am sure that, whatever disagreements we may have, we agree about that.

I must stress that, when my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the review, he emphasised that the Government remain committed to a nationwide letter service, with delivery to every address in the United Kingdom, within a uniform and affordable structure of prices, and with a nationwide network of post offices. He said then, and I repeat now, that those commitments are not negotiable and will remain at the heart of public policy towards the Post Office. All the alternative ownership and structural options are being examined with this in the forefront of our minds. Any reform must satisfy those non-negotiable commitments.

With regard to Royal Mail, I should like to dwell in a little more detail on the non-negotiable commitments to which I have already referred: a universal letter service, within a uniform and affordable tariff structure. A universal service commitment clearly means a delivery every working day to every address in the country. Royal Mail will continue to provide this. Indeed, in most areas of the country there are two deliveries a day, so the commitment is currently not only met, but exceeded.

The Government are committed to an affordable uniform tariff structure. But what is a uniform tariff? Self-evidently, a uniform tariff does not mean that every piece of mail will cost eactly the same to send.

Mr. Cousins: Let me recap. We are trying to put straws together to make a house. What the Minister has just said is of some significance. Does he regard a second delivery each day—a unique feature of the British system—not as part of the universal service but as some optional extra that could be negotiated away?

Mr. Leigh: A second delivery is not available to all households in all parts of the country, but I think that the House is well aware what a universal service obligation means. We shall ensure that it is met.

I was dealing with the tariff structure, which is of interest to the House. Charges may vary with weight steps, and there are discounts for pre-sorting. What we mean by a uniform tariff is that we will not allow the Royal Mail to adopt any form of zonal pricing. It will cost no more to send the same article from the Scilly isles to the Shetland islands than it will to send it from Hendon to Golders Green. When considering the future of the Royal Mail, we asked how best we could satisfy the fundamental social concerns over universal service at a uniform tariff and make things better for consumers.

There are essentially three major issues for the future of the Royal Mail: the competitive structure, the regulatory environment, and the question of ownership. I shall speak briefly about each, as they have formed the main concerns for the future environment in which the mail services of the Post Office will operate.

We believe that the right competitive environment is essential for improving services to the customer, and we began the review with an examination of whether any market restrictions are necessary to ensure a universal service and a uniform tariff structure.

Some have argued that no restrictions are necessary —my hon. Friend may hold that view—that we should allow free competition to enable the most efficient operator to exploit economies of scale, and that we would still be able to offer a universal service at a uniform and affordable price. Indeed, I hear my hon. Friend make these points about the monopoly and argue that the only way to have a Post Office which is efficient and genuinely responsive to consumers' needs is to subject it to full competition. I am always keen to examine the potential scope for liberalisation, but I have to say that I do not think that full deregulation is appropriate here. Some routes would be inherently unprofitable, and a free market would not provide them at an affordable price.

I represent a rural constituency, and I am sure that the House will recognise that I of all people want to ensure that rural areas are not disadvantaged in the future. The Government believe that the outcome of such a free-for-all, at least for some users—I have in mind especially those living in rural areas—would be higher prices and a poorer quality of service. We therefore reject a free-for-all.

Others have argued that we should permit the entry of more than one firm into the monopoly area, provided that they also have an obligation to deliver mail to every address in the country. The argument here is that the efficiency gains which will emerge as a result of competitive presssure will be beneficial. This is theoretically attractive and is certainly not ruled out, but we need to be careful. There is a possibility that the loss of economies of scale, particularly at the delivery end, would lead only to higher costs. We must therefore consider these matters carefully.

[Mr. Leigh]

However, I am certain that some increased competition is possible and desirable. The question then is what competition we can introduce while protecting the social commitments. We are already committed, as part of the citizens charter, to reducing the current £1 monopoly to a level nearer the price of a first-class stamp. My hon. Friend made a particular point about that. But what should the monopoly level be? Again, there are a number of views, and I am not in a position to say what we will do.

The second way of introducing competition into postal services is less direct, but may be just as significant in the long run. It is known, in the usual appalling jargon, as "downstream access". In the citizens charter, the Government proposed to extend the current range of discounts for users such as those who pre-sort their mail. Further discounts will be available to those who also trunk their mail to the final delivery office. Discounts might also be extended in the future to third party consolidators.

However, it would again be important to ensure that this did not weaken Royal Mail's ability to deliver the universal service and uniform tariff. I am sure that there are ways of introducing competition while still protecting the universal service and uniform tariff, and that is what we shall attempt to do, because it is only as a result of competition that we shall ensure that we get a better and better service.

To sum up on competition, we shall consider only proposals which do not in any way endanger the social commitments that we have made. We shall proceed on the basis of known effects, step by step. I reassure the House that we shall not introduce change for the sake of change.

Mr. Cousins: Clearly a major retreat is taking place, and it is causing the Minister some embarrassment. None the less, the retreat is in the right direction, so we welcome it. When the review is concluded, and the results are shared with the rest of us, will there still be options to be taken and resolved? Will the Minister have advanced and completed all those step by step stages that he mentioned, or will there be a concluded package? When the review is over, will there still be steps to be taken—backwards, perhaps, in the Minister's opinion—or shall we then have the final package? It is quite important for us to know that.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman's arguments are becoming somewhat Byzantine, even for 3.30 in the morning. The review is internal and we are considering all the options. We have long since made it clear—we made it clear in our manifesto—that we intended to introduce more competition into postal services. I make it absolutely clear again that that will happen. We said in the manifesto that we intended to set up an independent regulator to report to the Secretary of State—the President of the Board of Trade—to oversee that competition. There is nothing unusual about that, and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not seem to think that competition in that form would be beneficial.

Let me make it clear that we shall not allow the future provision of the social commitments to be a simple act of faith; nor will we allow necessary restrictions on competition to be an excuse for the abuse of monopoly power. It is vital that we maintain a regulatory framework to ensure that the interests of consumers are protected. The framework in which the Post Office currently operates was structured in 1969. Some of the models that we have developed during the 1980s have shown that there are better regulatory regimes than the traditional nationalised industries model of the 1960s.

Before I go on to speak about the question of future ownership of the Post Office, I wish to talk briefly about Post Office Counters. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South started by talking about that subject, and I know that he feels strongly about it.

In our manifesto, we gave a clear, unfettered commitment to a nationwide network of post offices. What does that mean in practice? It means that we are committed to maintaining a readily accessible network which meets the social industrial and commercial needs of the United Kingdom. Post offices and their customers throughout the country can rest assured that, whatever solution we adopt for the Post Office and its constituent parts, whether in the public or the private sector, that commitment will not be compromised.

Any organisation serving 28 million customers a year through a network of 20,000 offices—about twice the number of all the banks put together—clearly has major strengths in reach. But if it is operating in a series of low-margin businesses, not protected by any statutory monopoly, it must be constantly on its guard to keep its costs down and to respond flexibly as some of its products decline and others increase.

Post Office Counters is responding to the decline in some product sectors, such as national insurance stamps, by developing other business areas, such as stationery retailing, and it hopes to make use of its huge network to play an important part in the selling of national lottery tickets. We have recently given it powers to enable it to diversify into that business, which could fit very well with its core businesses.

I note what my hon. Friend has said about the ownership structure of Post Office Counters, and his view that we should continue the process towards full privatisation, which has been continuing for many years, but we need to consider how best we can equip the Post Office to develop new business in a rapidly changing world. Can that best be done in a public sector environment?

Of course, 19,000 of the 20,000 post offices are already owned and run by private business men, and that proportion will increase as the Crown conversion programme develops. I pay tribute to the 19,000 sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses whose commitment and hard work make it possible for the Post Office to continue to serve communities throughout the United Kingdom, even in far-flung rural areas where banks, building societies and most other retailers no longer operate. Our review must help us to determine what structure for Post Office Counters will best secure a bright future for those thousands of small businesses and protect the interests of all their customers.

On the question of ownership, we have to consider whether the competition and regulation framework we decide upon is more appropriate to a Post Office in the private or the public sector. It will come as no surprise that, in general terms, the Government believe in the advantages of private sector ownership. Indeed, I believe our experiences over the last 14 years have clearly demonstrated the enormous benefits, both to the consumer and to the taxpayer, of transferring businesses to the wealth-creating private sector. I have noted the remarks of my hon. Friend about the experience of nationalised industries which have been privatised.

For the Post Office, it is important that we get the sequence of decisions right. We must decide upon a competition and regulatory regime and then consider the alternatives for ownership—again always applying the acid test of what is in the best interests of consumers.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central mentioned Parcelforce on 15 July last year, as he said, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced to the House that it was the Government's intention to sell Parcelforce. Parcelforce operates in a fully competitive parcels market. The majority of its traffic is business traffic. I believe that Parcelforce can flourish in the private sector. It has a distinctive brand image and a large customer base—strengths on which it can build.

We are currently examining the most appropriate method and timing for transferring Parcelforce into the private sector. It faces competition across a range of its activities. The vast majority of its traffic is accounted for by products sent to or from businesses, yet it offers a universal service at a uniform and affordable tariff, which we have pledged ourselves to maintain—another non-negotiable commitment.

We have been considering the future of Parcelforce alongside the future of Royal Mail and Post Office Counters, but our intention to privatise Parcelforce should not necessarily be taken as implying that the rest of the Post Office will be privatised. That will be decided on its own merits. Indeed, when my right hon. Friend announced the review, he made it clear that we would be considering continued public sector options as well as private sector options.

Before concluding, I should like to deal briefly with the views of the Post Office Board. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central made great play of the views of the chairman of the Post Office. As I understand his remarks in the Select Committee, the Post Office chairman made the point that a decision on the review was desirable by the end of the first half of this year. As the hon. Gentleman made clear, the Post Office Board has made no secret of the fact that it is seeking changes in the current regulatory structure. In particular, I note that the Post Office has said that it wants to be free from Government controls on investment and wants more commercial freedom.

I should make it clear that Post Office capital investment has been running at record levels over the last three years. External financing limits which we set last year were specifically designed to enable those record levels to continue over the next three years—some £900 million in total. That sets in context some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Cousins: Will the Minister confirm that the Post Office's investment programme, comparing the current year, 1993-94, with the previous year, 1992-93, shows decline both in cash terms and in real terms? In other words, his assurance that the investment programme is being maintained is not borne out.

Mr. Leigh: Obviously there will be variations from time to time in the capital investment of the Post Office. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He regaled the House for 25 to 30 minutes with a description of the virtues of the Post Office. He said that it was the best in the world, the most efficient and all the rest of it. Has he forgotten that we have had a Conservative Government for the best part of 14 years? We have invested in the Post Office, we have ensured that it is the best, and we intend to leave it that way. We have undertaken a review to ensure that the Post Office responds to the opportunities, referred to by the hon. Gentleman, which are coming into world global markets.

In conclusion, this has been a valuable debate. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South is satisfied with the assurances that I have given. The review has confirmed our faith in the Post Office's ability to rank high among Britain's world-class, world-beating organisations. It will continue to thrive, break more of its records for customer service and pass on the benefits of ever greater efficiency to business and individual customers. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing the House to debate this important subject.

London Ambulance Service

3.39 am

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): It is with no pleasure that I introduce this debate about the relationship of Ministers and their accountability to the London ambulance service. The debate may well be important because it is a classic one for bringing Ministers to account. Although the hour is either late or early, whichever one chooses, our words are being recorded.

The London ambulance service is a tragedy which has focused on failure. The failure of the service was not surprising to many of us, unfortunately, as there has been a long period of decline, disorganisation, disintegration and, indeed, maladministration of a service which was once the best in the world. Alas, we cannot say that today. The decline in standards of public service which the LAS has experienced has been entirely under a succession of Ministers or Secretaries of State of one political persuasion.

I do not want to make too much of political differences tonight, although they may emerge in any investigation which takes place. I had hoped that, in this vital public service in which there can be no disagreement about the need for its presence and efficiency, there would be no difference. If there is a difference—a difference has, unfortunately, emerged—we must draw some bigger lessons from it, but not immediately.

We must draw some lessons from the vital matter of public accountability, especially when such a service is funded by the public and is run in any way other than as a visible public service. The emergency service at least is run in such a way. The service is run in such a way that its efficiency can be measured easily, yet there has been a most tremendous, tragic and, indeed, fatal failure.

Earlier, I said that the failure is not surprising to some of us. One of the reasons why I am both sorry and glad to have this debate is that I have followed the matter closely for more than six years. There have been seven debates on this matter since 1986, excluding all the debates that took place during the tragic dispute.

The first debate I remember was on 15 May 1986. It was raised by a Conservative Member—I think it was the hon. Member for Ravensbourne (Sir J. Hunt). I had Adjournment debates, to which I shall refer in a moment, on 31 October 1986 and 14 May 1987. There were Consolidated Fund Bill debates on 8 December 1987 and 20 December 1989. I presented a petition on 7 December 1989. There was an Adjournment debate on 18 April 1991 and a Public Accounts Committee debate on 17 October 1991 before I asked the Secretary of State for Health a private notice question on 28 October 1992, following the tragic collapse of the system on 26 October 1992.

In passing, I should ask how many debates have taken place about the London fire service. I do not recall any such debate. I wonder how many questions there have been about the London fire service. There have been few such questions.

We must ask ourselves why there is a difference between two services which are not dissimilar. One deals with property and the other deals with life. One would have thought that life and human suffering, distress and grief might have the priority of the two.

The London ambulance service has been a matter not only for debate. Hon. Members, including those who support the Administration, have sent letter after letter to Ministers. They have asked parliamentary question after parliamentary question. As I have just described, there has been debate after debate. However, as far as I can see from the evidence—the Minister may say something to the contrary—Ministers have not taken any notice. Indeed, the Minister who is present tonight, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), has not taken any notice, as I shall proceed to demonstrate.

I take Parliament seriously because ordinary people who pay taxes—however taxes are levied and whether they are fair or unfair—have no other means than Parliament of ensuring that the money which they collectively contribute is administered properly. This is the last place. It is either this or bullets.

Ministers not taking notice also reveals something else. Some time ago I read books about politics, perhaps idealistic ones, which said something like, "A wise Minister uses parliamentary questions as a searchlight to throw light on the nooks and crannies of every aspect of his or her Department." Unfortunately, the searchlight of parliamentary debate and questions in the past six years and even recently has been blanked out by Ministers.

Was it deliberately or through inefficiency? That question must be answered. I will try to answer it. If it is either cause, some action must be taken. That is why London Members signed an early-day motion about ministerial resignations. That is serious and I wish to say why, alas, resignations are necessary.

After that introduction, I intended my speech to have three parts. The first was the events that took place in the tragic run-up to the collapse of October 1992 and the events that some of us almost foresaw. The second was what happened after the collapse, and the lack of action by both the Secretary of State and the Minister. I do not know who was responsible. I suppose that the Secretary of State is responsible in the end. If the Minister did not tell her what was going on, he is responsible. So one of them is responsible.

I know that the Secretary of State and the Minister inherited a situation, but Ministers who inherit a situation have the opportunity and the duty to find out what it is and, if it is unsatisfactory, to do something about it. But, as I shall demonstrate in a moment, both the Ministers who are in office at present did not do so. Indeed, I believe that, although they have taken some action, it was not what is required.

The third matter is the action that the Secretary of State and the Minister did or did not take, subsequent to the inquiry report which was published a few weeks ago. This is the first opportunity that the House has had to debate that report. An unexpected fourth part of my speech is the events of yesterday. A ministerial statement has been made and letters have been sent from the Secretary of State to the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority, which I read about in the newspapers. I obtained the press release on application to the Library earlier today.

The Secretary of State may have sent London Members copies of the press release which have not yet arrived. Perhaps the Post Office, which we discussed in the previous debate, is not efficient. Certainly, I had to take my own initiative to find out what the letters said. Given that we were to have a debate on the matter tonight, that is a little surprising.

Before I embark on the history of the London ambulance service, I want to say something about the staff. I regard the ambulance staff of the London ambulance service as some of the finest people I have met, but they have been denigrated and criticised. In letter after letter and statement after statement, their alleged shortcomings have been made at least part of the excuse for what is going wrong.

I am very sorry that the Minister who is here tonight —I emphasise "the Minister" in his ministerial capacity, not as a Member of the House—was party to that. I do not know who served up that sort of information. I am not going to say that everybody is a saint, but I believe that the collective guilt that has on occasion been landed in the direction of the ambulance staff has no, or very little, basis in fact; certainly not the sort of basis that the Minister, in letter after letter, and the publicity machine of the administration of the ambulance service have implied.

The number of ambulance staff who reach retirement is not very great. The number of ambulance staff who have a very long retirement is very small indeed. You and I appreciate, Madam Deputy Speaker—indeed, I hope that all hon. Members, including Ministers, appreciate—the strain experienced by those emergency staff who have to deal with a succession of human grief and tragedy, not knowing what is coming next. By the very nature of their occupation, the strain is pretty great. It is difficult watching it on television sometimes when we know that it is real; we can only imagine what it is like when one is in the middle of it.

I regard the staff of the London ambulance service as professional Samaritans, and they must be given the tools for the job. I recall that, in interpreting that parable, which one hopes is still a basis of our society, one well-known person was heard to remark that it was very good that the Samaritan had some money to pay the innkeeper. What the person who made that remark forgot was that, in giving the money to the innkeeper, the Samaritan told him to do what was necessary for the man and he, the Samaritan, would repay him. He did not put a cost cap on it. In other words, it was demand-led, and that, until recently, is what the London ambulance service was.

Let us look at what has happened. Up to the mid-1970s, the London ambulance service, was, of course, run by the Greater London council, directly accountable to a committee and to elected members, one per parliamentary constituency. So any shortcomings on any matter relating to things that were going wrong could be dealt with verbally by members, or if necessary by letter to the chairman of the committee—all in minutes, all accountable; a monthly meeting at least, and discussed if necessary at a meeting of the council.

That was changed. I will not go into the details—it may have been a mistake; it may not have been—but things began to go wrong in the mid-1980s, in particular in the summer of 1986. That was when I first became involved.

I began to get heartrending letters from people who, by definition, were sick, and many of them elderly, and who had appointments at out-patient departments. We all know how many people go in and out of hospital pretty quickly these days and have to go back for out-patient treatment. Some of them will not get well. Those appointments were being cancelled because there were no ambulances. I do not mean the stretch-out variety; I mean the ones with tailboards and skilled staff. Many of the patients had crutches, and that sort of thing, so skill was needed. I have heard from the staff that it is not just the emergency people who suffer strain, because there are people up and down stairs and in and out of houses, and people who are very sick and have to be given assistance.

I wanted to find out what went wrong, and that was the subject of my first Adjournment debate, on 31 October 1986. It was replied to by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), a rather well-known personality, now on the Back Benches. I was astounded by the key sentence in that debate, which I will repeat. She said:

> "About 10,500 fewer walking patients were being transported—a reduction of 44 per cent. I am more than happy at that development."—[Official Report, 31 October 1986; Vol. 103, c. 666.]

I nearly fainted when I heard that.

I shall make no further remarks about that particular former Minister except to say that anyone who has the opportunity to use someone who made such a comment should consider whether that remark was a qualification or a disqualification for public office.

I corresponded with the Minister and discovered that the justification for that remark was a belief that there had been abuse of the patient transport service, which was complementary to the emergency service. I believe that it is now put out to tender and that, in certain areas, the London ambulance service has lost to the competition. Heaven knows what will happen to the stability of the service if it comes up for tender every year, but I mention that only in passing.

When the then Minister said there had been abuse of the service, I asked for proof, both in writing and in parliamentary questions. Proof there came none, so I put it down to personal eccentricity. Those who know the hon. Lady—of course I told her that I would be mentioning her tonight—will know what I mean. The other reason she put forward with great eloquence during the debate and subsequently was that the patient transport service needed to be cut to keep the front-line emergency service, which she praised to the skies, running properly.

I believe that the general cuts were due to the Rayner study. A paper was published by an official of the West Midlands ambulance service and that was the beginning of a reduction in resources to the London ambulance service. It was cost-budget capped.

In subsequent debates, the excuse by Ministers was that cost capping was required throughout public expenditure. The Minister would argue that the Labour Government did that, too. That is arguable. However, whatever the arguments about the level of the patient transport service, the emergency service must be demand-led within the Orcon standard, which is well known throughout the country. It is essential to provide the resources to achieve the Orcon standard, which is, by common consent, a reasonable standard of service. That was not happening. The tap was being turned down and the London ambulance service was carrying deficits year after year. I tried with difficulty to find the accounts.

Then the Government had the effrontery to apply a 3 per cent. efficiency reduction. Organisations such as Sainsbury, Tesco and Boots do that to keep the management on their toes, and the Government thought they could apply value for money to that vital service. Of course, it did not work. There were difficulties about pay and so on until the tragic dispute—I use the word "tragic" advisedly.

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

The Secretary of State at the time was the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who had started what I believe and what history will judge as a trail of destruction through the health service and the education service. Now he has been arrested—in the other sense of the word—by the police. We now have the promise of a police board for London to which I hope the current Home Secretary or any future Home Secretary will not repeatedly refer us, rather than to the Minister responsible.

In response to the White Paper "Working for Patients", published in January 1989, under the guise of the rather tenuous paragraphs 2.8 and 2.9, the South-West Thames regional health authority created the London Ambulance Board. Most people would not have a clue about who runs the ambulances in London—they might now, however, because of recent unhappy publicity. They were the responsibility of one regional health authority, which covers only a quarter of the London area and whose area, incidentally, goes well beyond London. The ambulance service was just one of its responsibilities. The money supply went down at about the time that the London Ambulance Board was created. Full members of the regional health authority had been on a panel managing the ambulance service and they were answerable to the Secretary of State.

During an Adjournment debate on 20 December 1989, the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, a most courteous Minister, who is not unacquainted with financial matters, made a remarkable statement about the London ambulance service, when he said:

"It cannot be financed as a demand-led service such as unemployment benefit or the prescription of drugs."—[Official Report, 20 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 528.]

A doctor is free to prescribe drugs—apart from being subject to sensible limits that are set after certain procedures have been followed—but he cannot even prescribe an emergency ambulance. That is what the junior Minister for Health, the predecessor but three or four of the Minister now present, said in 1989. We were then cost-capping an emergency service.

I know that the Government have changed their view a bit since then, but only after enormous pressure. But even today, after the tragedies that we have seen in London, in some respects their view has not changed.

Things got worse. The poor staff were at their wits' end and they petitioned Parliament. On Friday 7 December 1990, I presented a petition on their behalf which had been signed by more than 300 members of the London ambulance service. It said of the dispute:

"the root causes of that dispute have not yet been addressed and therefore unless and until there is a full and proper public examination of the financing, organisation and operation of the London ambulance service there remains a great and continuing risk to the health and welfare of all Londoners."—[Official Report, 7 December 1990; Vol. 182, c. 563.]

The petition also called on the Select Committee on Health to consider the matter, but, unfortunately, the then Select Committee did not do so. I helped to create the departmental Select Committee system and I deeply regret the fact that that Committee has postponed its study of the London ambulance service yet again. I hope that this debate will help it to reconsider that decision, because things went from bad to worse.

Between December 1990 and January and February 1991, we were back in the cancellation game. On Thursday 18 April 1991, I initiated a debate on several matters relating to the ambulance service. They included up to 10,000 cancelled out-patient journeys a month; extended response times to emergency calls, which were getting longer and longer; telephone stacking of 999 calls, which was becoming increasingly common, and the limit on ambulance crews to two hours voluntary overtime a week.

In addition, some 50 dedicated and experienced ambulance officers were made redundant due to the prospective privatisation of some of the service. An error was made in ordering a computer in 1991. An application was made for self-governing status—I know that that is more political, but it was a complicating factor because the patient ambulance service was to be subject to competition, which meant that people were worried about their jobs. The London Ambulance Board was invisible and virtually unaccountable to the London public.

The debate took place, another junior Minister was in the hot seat and none of those accusations or criticisms was questioned or dealt with. The only comment was, "We will do better." At the end of the debate—surprise, surprise—the Minister announced that £5 million additional capital had just been voted a week or two earlier by the South West Thames regional health authority, of which £3·5 million was for vehicles. If that money was necessary then, it should have been necessary before. In order to get the headlines on the accepted deficiencies, the Government threw money at them. But they did not necessarily provide money for more crews—just replacement vehicles and other capital equipment.

We were told that the provisions were due to the whizzo new chief executive, Mr. Wilby, who had been appointed by South West Thames regional health authority to make everything right. But the Opposition had had some contact with that gentleman—both on paper and in other ways. We knew that he was having to act on instructions cascading down from the Secretary of State—it was national policy. The Secretary of State appointed the regional health authority, which appointed Mr. Wilby—who was accountable to the authority. The authority also appointed the London Ambulance Board. Therefore, those involved were appointees of appointees.

If, in a private capacity, you, Madam Deputy Speaker, or the Minister wanted to see the Secretary of State on behalf of a number of Members, and were told that a meeting would be granted with the Under-Secretary, I know what the response would be. We had the same response; we wanted to see the then Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), but he would not see us and said that we must first go to see Mr. Wilby. We said that we would not because, politically, the Secretary of State was responsible. Some time later, I had a long conversation lasting two hours with that gentleman, in which we discussed his programme and his plans for executing it. I was not convinced at all by what he was saying, which did not add up in practical terms.

We tabled an early-day motion stating that the Secretary of State was undemocratic because he would not see us. We were going to tell him what was going on. Later, there were more delays, which became longer and longer and there were more and more reports. Last summer I wrote three letters—one to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health who is present tonight, and, in desperation, a third one to the Secretary of State.

The present Secretary of State is a well-known character who is always on the radio. She always looks as though she could join the ambulance service herself. I thought that she might be being over-protected by her private office, which is not unknown, as you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will know. I took special steps to ensure that my letter to the Secretary of State of 4 September would be read by her. I shall not quote the whole letter, but parts of it. It said:

"Can you doubt that consequential long and unjustifiable delays in attendance over the Orcon standard of 14 minutes is and will cost lives?"

The letter continued:

"Apart from admission of inadequacies in electronic equipment, official statements from the LAS have concentrated on alleged absenteeism and a need to re-roster duties. However the Chairman of the London Ambulance Service will neither confirm nor deny my allegation to him that service is being cut by up to 20 per cent. reduction in overtime necessary to keep within budget limits."

In other words, budget capping was stopping staff doing voluntary overtime. I know that there is controversy about what is necessary over the weekend, but that concerns the national agreement.

Again, I went back to the question of demand-led service. I concluded:

"Will we have to wait until some celebrity dies after a delay of half an hour or more for an ambulance after a heart attack —as two ladies, now dead, had to do in Newham recently —before an enraged electorate discovers that contrary to their assumption resources for the emergency ambulances are not geared to the actual demand."

That was my third letter on the subject in that dreadful summer.

I had to wait 24 days for an answer. I had expected that the right hon. Lady, who is well acquainted with London affairs, for obvious reasons, to reply. Instead, it was the Under-Secretary, who is here to reply to the debate. I shall read some of his letter, which is dated 28 September. He said:

"The information the computer holds about ambulance status and availability may, therefore, be out of date. LAS is still, therefore, having to use allocated/despatchers to check out the status of the ambulances, when it would prefer those allocated/despatchers to be reassigned to call-taking."

That was a staff matter. The next part is the most important. He said:

"The problem currrently faced is behavioural rather than technical and lies with a proportion of the crews failing to use simple procedures to notify their status. The CAD system itself is functioning correctly at a technical level."

The crews were telling me that it was not. I said to Mr. Harris, whom I met that summer, "If you try to put this computer in, it might work, but it won't do awfully much for getting people to hopital better because of the lack of crews on the ground. Re-rostering, whatever you do with it, won't do the trick." I had hoped that the computer might work, but it did not, and we all know the result.

There was then this sentence from the Under-Secretary, who is another Derbyshire echo:

"The NHS, as you know, is cash limited. The onus is on NHS services to meet the demands made upon them, within budget. This cannot be achieved without good management and co-operation from staff. These expectations must apply just as much to ambulance services as they do to other elements of the NHS.

In the LAS we have the technical means and human and vehicle resources to make the emergency service demand-led in the only way that makes sense, that is that ambulances are sent, quickly, to everyone who asks for one. But we need the full involvement of staff in notifying their status and within a few weeks accepting new rosters."

Within a month, the whole thing broke down. The Minister apparently did not even look at the problem to find out what was going wrong—as it was, and as most people knew that it would.

What was worse was that, between January 1992 and the failure of the system entirely, over 40 delays were associated with death. I am not saying that there were 40 deaths due to delays. We do not know, do we? However, I wonder whether any of the 40 sets of relatives think that. I have a list here, which was compiled from local newspapers, of those incidents, which occurred before the thing went wrong. Irrespective of the computer failure, things were going wrong.

Subsequent to the collapse on 9 March 1993, a written answer from the Under-Secretary showed that, in June 1992, 90 per cent. of the calls were within 25 minutes, but 10 per cent. were after 25 minutes. That means that one in 10 ambulances called arrived at the scene 25 minutes or more after the call went out. That does not include the time that some callers had to wait listening to a recorded message. Instead, I am talking of the time from when the control room received the call.

The story becomes worse as it continues. I had asked for information about the number of ambulances that arrived half an hour after a call. I wanted to know the exact intervals. I am sure that the Minister, when he was a Back-Bench Member, would not have accepted what he wrote to me. Unfortunately, it is an answer that all Back-Bench Members receive from time to time. His response was:

"A breakdown of call response times above 25 minutes could be obtained only at disproportionate cost to the London ambulance service."—[Official Report, 9 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 499.]

As I have said, 10 per cent. of ambulances arrived at the scene 25 minutes or more after being called in June 1992. The service could not give a more precise distribution of the times taken for ambulances to arrive at the scene. The Minister had the neck to allow that answer to leave the Department. I wonder whether he asked the service why there would be a disproportionate oost. It shows that those involved were not on the job. How can anyone who is in charge of a London ambulance service be ignorant of the extent of delays of half an hour or longer? Of course, the Minister's answer appeared in Hansard.

The real answer came to me in a plain brown envelope. I suppose that my question had been spotted. My goodness, the ambulance people watch this place now. I was sent a clipsheet and a five-bar-gate form. The times in minutes are entered after the first response. At the end of the form there is "26+". The form starts with 0, 1, 2, and 3, and at the end of the page there is 26. In other words, the LAS records the number of response times after 26 minutes. If the Minister had obtained an answer to my question, the LAS would have had to go through all the forms, which of course would have cost a great deal of money. It is clear, however, that the service was not monitoring what it was doing. Is that the public administration and efficiency for which we are looking?

Some London Members had had enough. The report of the inquiry showed what had gone wrong so often. Early-day motion 1498 read:

"That this House deplores the absence of preventative action that should have been taken by successive Secretaries of State and their departmental Ministers subsequent to receive warnings".

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

We listed all the things that had gone wrong and said that someone should resign.

Each month there were 10,000 cancelled patient journeys. That means that over three or four months there would be 30,000 to 40,000 cancellations during 1992. That means 40,000-plus emergency service serious delays. But before things went wrong in 1992, what about 1991? Does that mean 80,000?

I tabled another question about overtime:

"To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will now make it her policy to ensure that all offers of voluntary overtime by ambulances crews that would fill gaps that would otherwise occur in the scheduled rostering are not subject to budget restriction."

The question was answered by the Under-Secretary as follows:

"All national health service providers, including ambulance services, must provide services within the resources allocated to them. It is for individual ambulance services to manage overtime levels within the overall staffing budget and to ensure that staff are rostered to provide services to the public."—[Official Report, 3 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 172.]

My goodness me! The Minister who let that by—his name is on the answer—is sitting on the Government Front Bench. This is accountability at work.

The delays are continuing, but they are fewer than they were because there has been some tightening up. The staff are keen and there is a new atmosphere. Why not let the service have the money to enable it to get crews out in ambulances, crews who are willing to do the work? I know that there are industrial relations problems. One reason for them is that the late Mr. Wilby—he is not literally dead, but he is as far as the service is concerned—would not meet people to discuss them.

It is about time to place all this on record—that is what Parliament is all about. There was an unexpected development yesterday as a result of the inquiry, which recommended certain actions. The Secretary of State wrote to South West Thames regional health authority requesting details of its plans. Yesterday, the Secretary of State wrote back to Dr. Marion Hicks, the RHA's chairman, and was pretty sharp in what she said.

The Secretary of State referred to the London Ambulance Board as something of an experiment and stated that the board and the RHA were "unclear about their respective roles and responsibilities. Nor were they robust enough to respond to the computer problem facing the LAS. It is therefore right that you should replace them with a clearer and simpler set of arrangements."

I understand that the London Ambulance Board has disappeared in a puff of smoke. It was fairly irregular anyway—founded upon a couple of lines in a White Paper. I tried to ascertain its statutory basis in either the 1977 or 1990 Act, but was unable to do so. Perhaps the Minister can inform the House. It was one of those hands-off affairs, but that was Government policy—originally under the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe when he was Secretary of State for Health, and continued by successive Ministers.

If there was a lack of public accountability—clearly there was, because the Minister said so—that was the responsibility of the Government. Only a few years ago, a councillor in West Ham or East Ham in my constituency could have knocked on the council's door to find out why the ambulance service was not working properly. Now that has to be done in the House. What a way to run an ambulance service and a health service.

The Secretary of State's letter goes on:

"In the medium term, the aim must be to move the LAS towards Trust status as soon as possible, creating the normal pattern of accountability of an NHS provider."

I do not know what is

"the normal pattern of accountability", but it is certainly not trust status—not for that sort of service.

The Secretary of State goes on:

"This means abolishing the Board and making the LAS Chief Executive directly responsible to the Regional Health Authority for all aspects of LAS management and performance."

I thought that that was what already happened. The board appointed Mr. Wilby and he tendered his resignation to the board. What was the board doing? Presumably the board resigned so that it could be trumpeted round the country that something had happened, when it appears that the board did not have much power anyway. It was a phantom board that was not in control. Mr. Wilby was in control, but hardly anybody else.

I tried to find out from the RHA whether the public minutes recorded anything to do with the LAS, but I do not think that there is much there.

The Secretary of State's letter continues:

"We both recognise that to make the new arrangements work will require thorough and rigorous public scrutiny of the LAS by your Authority."

That presumably means that the board of South West Thames regional health authority appointed by the Secretary of State will act for the public in scrutinising the LAS. I thought that public scrutiny related to elected representatives—whether in respect of borough councils, county councils or Parliament. How can appointed representatives scrutinise a public authority when they are accountable only to the Secretary of State who appoints them?

We have the Secretary of State trying to reassure us as recently as yesterday. The last sentence of her letter reads:

"I shall expect regular reports on progress from the NHS Chief Executive and will hold the RHA rigorously to account for its performance in managing the LAS."

I think that we should call Ministers to account for the way in which they have mismanaged things.

I was not going to say this before I read that document, which is now in the Library. Overtime is still being capped, despite two or three requests in letters and questions; a phantom board, which did not have much responsibility anyway, has resigned; and the Secretary of State talks about confidence. In, I believe, a press release, she said that there would be no more confidence in the LAS until the appropriate steps were taken.

I suggest to the right hon. Lady that there will not be much confidence until she changes her policy, or we change our Secretary of State. In early-day motion 1498, we asked the responsible Minister to depart. The Secretary of State and the Minister are both people of integrity, but I do not think that they understand the jobs of Secretary of State and Minister if they can write such tosh in an attempt to get off the hook. For years, thousands of people in London have been subjected to suffering, grief and difficulty.

I quoted from the Minister's letter. Either he did not find out what was going on—which he should have—or he mentioned it to the Secretary of State and she did nothing. One of them is responsible, and for that reason one of them must go.

4.26 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): The London ambulance service operates within the national health service on the same basis as any other directly managed service. It is accountable to Ministers, and therefore to Parliament, through its relevant health authorities—in this case, South West Thames regional health authority.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): May I intervene before the Minister gets into his stride? He may be wondering why my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) is not in his place on the Opposition Front Bench. No discourtesy is meant to the House, the Minister or my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing); my hon. Friend's wife has been taken ill, and at the last minute I agreed to sit on the Front Bench. Of course, the rules of the House do not permit me to speak.

Mr. Sackville: I thank the hon. Lady, and ask her to pass on our sympathy to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

London has four regional health authorities, and four regions together fund the revenue and capital requirements of the LAS. The service is managed by South West Thames on behalf of the other three health regions.

All large organisations—the NHS is no exception—must operate through devolved responsibility, with clear lines of management accountability. Considerable management responsibilities are delegated to the appropriate levels of the NHS—regions, districts, family health service authorities and now trusts. Ministers are accountable for the performance of the NHS, but local management is responsible for ensuring that services are delivered. The front line of the NHS cannot be managed from the centre; it is the responsibility of the centre to see that services are well managed.

The medium-term aim for the LAS must be for it to achieve NHS trust status. Yesterday, a further 132 hospitals, community units and ambulance services achieved trust status. It is sensible to expect the LAS to achieve the same status as the great majority of NHS service providers. Until trust status is achieved, the LAS will continue to be directly managed by South West Thames regional health authority.

The recent report of the independent inquiry into the LAS identified management failures within the service, especially surrounding the implementation of a computer-aided dispatch system. The LAS has recognised that it must learn from the mistakes that have been highlighted and implement the report's recommendations if it is to achieve its main aim, which must be to improve its performance for Londoners.

As the inquiry report says, the best way, and the only way, in which the London ambulance service can regain public confidence is by making significant improvements in performance. Since the failure of the computer-aided dispatch system in October and the resignation of the then chief executive, John Wilby, performance has already improved. In the summer of 1992, a figure as low as 54 per cent. of crews were being dispatched in response to 999 calls within 14 minutes of the call being received. At the end of February, that figure had improved to 65 per cent. That is still below the patients charter standard, which is 95 per cent., and it is clearly unacceptable, but the achievements of the LAS since last summer, in particular since the failure of the computer-aided dispatch system in October, should be recognised.

The need for further improvements has been recognised by both the LAS and the South West Thames regional health authority. We should not underestimate the task facing the LAS in securing improvements in its service. When the planning of the computer-aided dispatch system began in 1990, a long and bitter industrial dispute had just concluded, leaving a legacy of very poor management-staff relations. Performance levels were poor. The LAS management had to work within that context to provide the improvements in performance which Londoners and Ministers expected to see.

Local managers are responsible for the day-to-day operation of their services. With respect to the computer-aided dispatch system, as implementation neared in 1992, the then LAS chief executive gave categorical assurances to the regional health authority that the chosen system would be introduced successfully and would contribute to improvements in performance. Given these assurances, the system was implemented. When it became clear that the computer-aided dispatch system had failed when it was reintroduced on 4 November, it was abandoned, and ambulance control reverted to a manual system. The chief executive of the LAS resigned and the deputy regional general manager was appointed in his place.

The system was introduced as a key element of the LAS plan to improve performance. The failure of the computer-aided dispatch system led directly to the independent inquiry, which was established to look into its failure and to make recommendations for changes within the LAS, in the light of its findings.

The inquiry report was published on 25 February. It identified several areas where the LAS must make practical changes to improve industrial relations, revise management accountability and reintroduce a computer-aided dispatch system. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health reported to the House at that time and requested the regional health authority to report within one month with proposals on strengthening management accountability for the LAS.

On Wednesday of this week, my right hon. Friend announced the new arrangements for the accountability of the LAS which she has agreed with the regional health authority. The LAS had been managed by an arm's-length board, to which the chief executive was accountable. The board was chaired by a non-executive member of the regional health authority and had five non-executive members nominated by the four Thames regions. The LAS chief executive and other senior LAS managers sat on the board.

It is now clear that these arrangements left the members of the board and the regional health authority unclear about their respective roles and responsibilities, in spite of the fact that the individuals concerned worked extremely hard to make the arrangements work.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister said that the chief executive was responsible to the board. Was he referring to the LAS board or to the board of the South West Thames regional hospital authority? The accountability difficulties that the Secretary of State has now admitted turn very much upon that matter. Can the Minister clarify the point?

[Mr. Spearing]

Mr. Sackville: The chief executive reported to the board, which itself was appointed by the board of the regional health authority. I agree that there is ambiguity about the extent to which the board was responsible and the extent to which it was advisory. That is precisely why the new arrangements making the chief executive of the London ambulance service directly accountable to the regional health board represent the proper way forward. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to identify the ambiguity in this relationship.

I believe that the regional health authority exercised due diligence in its management role through the annual review of LAS performance and the individual performance of the chief executive and through the monitoring of financial performance. However, the regional health authority has acknowledged that the arm's-length arrangement meant that some of the problems identified in the inquiry report were not being acted upon adequately.

As I have said, the relationship of Ministers to operational services is based on the principle of delegating responsibility for those services to the appropriate levels of management. It is important in this relationship, that, within the objectives laid down by Ministers, operational managers should have the freedom to use their delegated authority and actually manage the service.

Within that framework of accountability, the public and Ministers expect to see services delivered to as high a standard as possible. I take a very serious view of the failures highlighted by the inquiry report. My right hon. Friend has made known her determination that the mistakes identified in the report must not be repeated. Yesterday, she agreed with the regional health authority new arrangements for the management of the LAS.

The region has acknowledged that the previous, arm's-length relationship is to be replaced in May by direct-line accountability, for LAS performance, of the LAS chief executive to the regional general manager. This accountability will include routine financial monitoring, performance monitoring, the monitoring of complaints and untoward incidents, annual corporate reviews, individual performance reviews and the observance of regional health authority standing orders and standing financial instructions.

The LAS chief executive will attend regional health authority meetings, and progress reports will be submitted to the authority. These reports will be considered in public at authority meetings. In recognition of the fact that there is a need for more detailed scrutiny, in addition to the full RHA meeting, a sub-committee comprising senior directors of the RHA will be established. This sub-committee will be able to draw on advice from a group of external specialists in, for example, information technology, finance and human resources.

The advisers will advise the LAS directly, and will also have access to the regional chairman should they think that an issue is not being dealt with adequately through normal line management agreement. The LAS sub-committee minutes will be received and discussed at full regional health authority meetings. The regional health authority will be accountable to Ministers for the LAS, within the existing framework.

The virtue of the board was that it brought non-executive assistance to the LAS and gave delegated authority to the chief executive. The regional health authority does not want to remove authority from the LAS chief executive to manage the service. Interference should be kept to a minimum, and the balance of this continued delegation will be the objectives for performance agreed between the region and the LAS. These objectives will also be incorporated into the annual corporate contract between the LAS and the management executive of the national health service and will be monitored throughout the year.

The London ambulance service is not committed to producing an annual report concentrating on performance data and agreement against plan targets. The management of the London ambulance service, in conjunction with staff, are currently preparing an action plan, which will contain objectives for improving the performance of the service—improving management arrangements, reintroducing a computer-aided dispatch system, improving industrial relations and improving financial performance. More specific objectives will be agreed when the action plan has been finalised.

I am sure that hon. Members will welcome the increased openness of the LAS to public scrutiny. Regular copies of performance reports will be available to hon. Members, local authorities and interested public bodies. Emphasis will be placed on clarifying the contractual relationship between the four regional health authorities and the LAS.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, because I know that there is little time. He has not mentioned finance. Surely, half the basis of this issue is the petrol supply to the engine. The management jargon that he is using does not inspire confidence in me. Will he respond to the request that the budget be increased to cater for overtime? How is the future funding of the complex machine that he has outlined going to work? Will it be determined by the Treasury, the Secretary of State, the South West Thames health authority or at a meeting of the new panel?

Mr. Sackville: It will be determined in exactly the same way as in the 41 other ambulance services in this country: through contractual negotiations between the purchasers—in this case, the four regional health authorities—and the ambulance service. In that connection, the hon. Gentleman should compare the level of finance per 1,000 of population for the London service with the other metropolitan services in the west midlands, Greater Manchester, West Yorkshire and so on. He will find that the financing of the LAS is very much in line with that of other ambulance services which are turning in performance figures of 90 per cent. and 95 per cent. against a current perfornace figure of 65 per cent. in London.

That is the nub of the argument. The resources are there, and we are trying to find out why there is a problem in London.

Mr. Spearing rose—

Mr. Sackville: I should like to press on.

The new arrangements are a first step towards restoring public confidence in the LAS. We recognise that that is the goal towards which we must strive. As the inquiry report pointed out, that will be fully achieved only by improved LAS performance. I recognise that considerable progress has been made since October, but a great deal more needs to be done. The new objectives for the LAS will be delivered within a time scale agreed by Ministers.

My right hon. Friend has also told the regional chairman that she will be looking to her and her management team to ensure that the main recommendations of the inquiry report are swiftly implemented and that the LAS begins to move as quickly as it can towards providing the quality of service that Londoners have a right to expect. A report will be published in the autumn, which will detail progress in implementing the report's recommendations.

I remind the House that the inquiry report stated:

"it is not possible to turn around LAS performance overnight . . . the public and its representatives must be prepared to allow the LAS breathing space to put its house in order."

We shall therefore guard against unrealistic pressures on the LAS, but we shall contiue to keep its performance under careful scrutiny. It is vital that the LAS should make sustained progress towards improving its service to the public. I believe that the arrangements put in place by the region provide the right framework to enable that to happen.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister is now talking about a policy programme. Let us deal with the emergency ambulance service. Whatever the merits of joining or splitting the services, the emergency service is quite different from the patient transfer service. How can a single provider, established and working, bargain with four different customers, only part of whose areas are within the LAS area, and come to an agreement? Surely the service must reach the Orcan standard, say how much it costs and then apportion the money more or less equally among the population of the four authorities. Is there any other way of doing it? How can there be bargaining about such a contract?

Mr. Sackville: It is happening across the health service. Health authorities are demanding a certain level of service and reaching agreements with providers on the price. As I said, the financing of the LAS is be no means out of line with that of other services. It receives more money than several comparable metropolitan ambulances services, some of which have performance figures that are way ahead of patients charter standards of 95 per cent. There is a great gulf.

I should like to deal with more of what the hon. Gentleman said. He has given us a long political history of the last few years in terms of contacts between him and Ministers, Adjournment debates and other such matters, but he has not tackled the question of what the fundamental problem of the LAS is, and what differentiates it from West Yorkshire, Greater Manchester and other similar ambulance services in places with similar problems.

There is general agreement that there is a long-standing problem involving industrial relations in the LAS. I do not believe that there has been total co-operation between staff and management, and excellent performance cannot be achieved without that. We hope that the current arrangements will work towards such co-operation, but we all need to come out of the trenches, and those of us who may have been tempted to support one line or the other must meet in the middle and decide how, together, we can achieve the sort of performance in the LAS that almost every other ambulance service in the country is achieving.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority has invited him to meet the authority and to give it the benefit of his undoubted expertise and long interest in the matter. A letter written to him by Mr. Spry, the regional general manager, says:

"Professor Hicks and I have only been involved in the LAS for a relatively brief time. You have a far more extensive experience of observing the problems of the LAS. We believe that we could benefit from learning from your experience."

So far the hon. Gentleman has not taken up that offer, and he replied to the original invitation with the words:

"I thank you for your courtesy; it may be that you are not fully aware of the long period for which I have been involved in matters relating to the London ambulance service"

He also gave the fact that

"there may be other proceedings in Parliament"

as a reason for not meeting representatives of the LAS. I suggest that that is not a good reason for not meeting them. It would be most helpful if he would sit down with the chairman and the chief executive of the regional health authority and share his expertise and his ideas about what he believes is wrong. We have not heard many solutions from him tonight.

Mr. Spearing: I am extremely glad to respond to that request. But, as I made clear, I thought it right that the debate should take place first——

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): No.

Mr. Spearing: Oh, yes. I hear a sedentary interruption from a well-known voice. The debate had to take place first because the people whom the Minister has mentioned, and for whom I have personal respect, are the Minister's appointees. They have to carry out a policy directed from Richmond house by the Secretary of State and the Minister, whose performance and conduct I have described—perhaps at length, but necessarily so. I shall be glad to meet those people after the debate, but it is right that the matter should be dealt with first in Parliament, where the real responsibility lies.

I conclude—I hope—by telling the Minister, if he has not already seen it, that I wrote a long piece of evidence to the inquiry, which is public, and an appendix on the need to set up machinery to determine the finance necessary to meet the Orcon standard. I should be pleased to meet the Minister, the Secretary of State or the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority, initially to discuss my evidence and my constructive proposals within that evidence, which is now public; indeed, it has been public for some weeks.

Mr. Sackville: I cannot see why this debate in the middle of the night should have delayed the hon. Gentleman meeting the regional health authority in order to give it the benefit of his expertise on the subject. I hope that the meeting will take place soon. I extend an invitation to the hon. Gentleman to come to see me any time to give me all the information. Rather than chronicling his many Adjournment debates and his various contacts with Ministers over the years, he should give us some hard facts about what he sees as the solution to the problem. We all agree that there are serious problems with the service which are not shared by almost any other ambulance service. We have got to get together to decide what they are. Political posturing will not help.

[Mr. Sackville]

Mr. Spearing: We want funds.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Hon. Members should remember that seated interventions are to be deplored.

Mr. Sackville: We must get together to decide what differentiates London from the rest of the country. If the hon. Gentleman has something to say, let him come and say it.

Retirement Age

4.49 am

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I propose to discuss an age-old problem—when are we officially old? In this age of equal opportunity and equal treatment for all, is it fair that a man can be deemed old at 65 and thus eligible for a state pension, but a woman is considered so old at 60 that she can skip a five-year wait and collect her pension then?

I have absolutely no intention of retiring at 60. That is barely 12 years from now. I must inform my constituency that I have every intention, barring illness, of carrying on working at least until 2017, by which time I will be a sprightly 73-year-old. Without giving away any secrets, I might point out that the House already has some splendid, lively women Members around their seventies. Like old soldiers, they show no signs of fading away, so hon. Members have been warned.

The reality is that we are mentally and physically delaying our aging process. We have better diets, healthier foods, more exercise and improved medicines, so much so that today there are 2,500 people alive who have celebrated their 100th birthday. A considerable number go on to celebrate their 105th birthday, and even their 110th. Most of those people are women.

Life expectancy for those born in 1841 was less than 40 years for a boy and 43 years for a girl; indeed, many children died in infancy. By 1941, life expectancy was 70 years for a boy and 75 years for a girl. I am happy to report that 50 years later there has been a dramatic increase. A son born in 1991 can expect to live to 76 and a daughter born in the same year will, on average, live to about 81 years of age. In other words, people born today can on average expect to live about six years longer than those born 50 years ago. That justifies the proposition that women form what I call the first estate. We are tougher, more resilient and more active. I should make another plug: we are harder-working.

Is it right, therefore, that women should be pensioned off at 60? The timing for paying retirement pensions has varied over the century. When pensions were introduced in 1908, they started for both men and women at over 70. In 1925 the age went down to 65. However, the pension age for women was lowered to 60 by the Old Age and Widows' Pensions Act 1940. The new inequality was a response to a campaign in the 1930s by unmarried women, many of whom had cared for dependent relatives for most of their lives. It also recognised the fact that, on average, married women were several years younger than their husbands. It must also be admitted that the Government hoped that lowering the age would be a sweetener to encourage more women to work in war factories. That was blatant sex discrimination, but the level has rested there for 50 years without change.

Today, the average woman is mortified to think of herself as old at 60, yet the state does. The time has come to think the unthinkable: raise our retirement age to that of men—65. It would be fairer and would not be breaking new ground, only restoring a former status quo.

More than that, the time has come to recognise that, with rising numbers and their survivability, women are putting an enormous strain on the rapidly diminishing working population which must sustain them. I congratulate the Leader of the House on having the courage, when he was Secretary of State for Social Security, to raise the issue in his document, "Options for Equality in State Pension Age." He broke new ground by saying that the question today is not whether we should equalise the retirement age at 65 but how and when. The case is powerful.

The number of people over state pension age will increase significantly from 10·3 million in 1990 to a projected 13·3 million in 2050, peaking at 14·4 million in 2034. The peak in the number of pensions is caused by the aging of those born during the 1960s baby boom, which will lead to a corresponding increase in the number of people who will reach state pension age in the third and fourth decades of the next century. At the same time, the population of working-age people—the so-called support ratio—is expected to fall. All that will put added pressure on the social security budget, which is already the largest single item in public spending.

In short, can we possibly expect and demand that a much smaller work force should bear such a burden? Is it realistic to expect every pensioner aged 60 in 2010 to be supported by only 2·6 workers, whereas women, who are a much fitter generation now, would be supported by a wider and fairer spread of four workers if they waited until 65? As I said, the peak will be reached about 2030—I will be 86 and still going strong—and three people will be needed to support each pensioner, even at 65.

Let us turn to the European dimension. Our problems are not unique in squaring up to the matter. Others also have to adjust their state pensions. Many European Community countries have already moved towards equalisation. Germany plans to have a common pension age of 65 by 2012, when every pensioner will be supported by barely two workers. Italy will equalise at 65 by 2016. By that time, 2·4 workers will be needed to support retired people. Having gone against the trend and opted for retirement at 60, France has recently reopened the question.

We are all faced with the combined effects of low birth rates and increasing life expectancy which serve to slow the population growth rate and increase considerably the proportion of elderly people. In Britain, the proportion of people over the age of 65 is expected to rise from 14·9 per cent. in 1980 to 20·4 per cent. in 2040. In comparison, the proportion in France, which is starting from a lower base of only 14 per cent., is expected to rise to 22·7 per cent. in 2040. The proportion of people aged 65 or more in Japan will more than double in the next 40 years.

Some European countries have already seized the nettle. In Norway, the pension age of 67 applies to both sexes. Other Scandinavian countries and Cyprus have an equal state pension age of 65. Recognising similar trends, the United States has introduced a reform package to be implemented in stages between 1983 and 2027. Over the period 2003 to 2009, the pension age will increase to 66, and from 2021 to 2027, it will increase to 67.

There is more than one way of tackling the problem. We could use the much-favoured "flexible decade" system. But I do not believe that that is realistic. It sounds attractive. Everyone would be satisfied, so they think. People would choose their retirement age over a decade —say between 60 and 70 or 55 and 65. The attraction is that those who are fit and wish to remain happily at work until they are 70 or so would earn an additional pension when they retired. Those who wished to retire at the earliest opportunity would be able to do so, but clearly on less income. On that score, the system could create problems. I appreciate that Sweden operates flexible decade retirement, but Sweden has a different culture and a different social security system. It does not bear direct comparison with Britain.

Alternatively, we could reduce the male pension age to 60, in line with women. Or we could split the difference and opt for 63. Or we could raise the pension age for women to 65. It has to be said that 60 is no longer the most realistic option. It would cost the Exchequer at least £3·5 billion a year, at current prices. It would fly in the face of international trends, which are mainly upwards.

The choice facing us and the decision-makers is simple: either we give extra money to men by reducing the male pension age from 65, or we make savings from women by increasing the female pension age from 60. Equalisation at 63 brings neither joy nor tears. There is no real gain either way. The economic effects are pretty neutral and little would be achieved.

However, a common pension age of 65 would bring savings of at least £3·5 billion a year. That would be enough to cut 3p in the pound off income tax. That must be a mouthwatering prospect for our Treasury Ministers. My guess is that the common pension age of 65 would be the most attractive proposition. Not only will the pension age be fairer, but pensions will no longer be a drain on the economy. More than that, the common pension age could bring real dividends, ensuring that the released money could be diverted and targeted to those most in need, for example, the very carers who look after the frail and elderly. None of the other options remotely offers this remedy and help.

Such a programme, on a considerable scale, involving women born in the 1950s will take adjustment. It will take at least 15 years to phase in. The first women likely to be affected by the full impact of the change would have been born in 1954 and will reach the new pension age of 65 in 2019. The full impact of the change would hit women now under 40. It is not a programme to be launched in haste. It will have a fundamental effect on society. Many women will be delighted to be able to continue working on the same basis as men.

We spend all our lives seeking equal treatment and status. There is no reason why retirement should be any different. However, we should not forget to take into account the women who have spent years in low-paid work, from which they may not qualify for a retirement pension and who do not have an occupational pension. Perhaps they have heavy home caring responsibilities. Such women could be forced to seek income support before they reached the official retirement age. I know, from the feedback that I have had, that they would regard this as demeaning.

We should examine carefully how vulnerable groups would be affected. We should be aware of the women who could be disadvantaged. They should be protected and compensated where appropriate. Of course, the other side of the coin is that, with the decline in the working population, there will be more demand for senior citizens to work and be recognised for all their skills and experience. At long last, the "Oldies", as signified by the satirist Richard Ingrams, will have the last word. The able-bodied are vibrant, alive and extremely well. It would be a great pity if we did not take advantage of that talent.

[Lady Olga Maitland]

Agism, as far as I am concerned, has spun out of control. The great god youth will now be focusing on its seniors and appreciating them for their own worth.

I very much hope that more thinking will develop along these lines. The pensions field is a daunting area of social policy, the numbers involved are very high and the financial calculations are highly complex with so many pensions to be juggled around. This debate has been going on now since 1991. For two years, we have been airing these matters. We should now initiate, I believe, a comprehensive public information campaign and condition ourselves to these fundamental changes.

I congratulate the Social Security Advisory Committee, the independent body set up by the Government, on drawing on 4,000 comments and contributions from individuals, companies and organisations. Of these, there were 22 major ones, and it is interesting to look at the breakdown: 13 of them recommended pensions for all at 65, only one wanted retirement at 63, and just five sought a full basic pension at 60. I note, too, that the Labour party chose not to make any contribution or submissions at all to the DSS, although I understand that it is not averse to re-examining the issue.

I believe that the time has come to take the brave step and bring women's pensions up to date. The urgency is clear to all of us and it is my sincere hope that the Minister will give us some guidance on Government thinking.

5.6 am

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on obtaining this very important debate. I listened with interest to her views and I have to declare an interest: I am a little older than she is. However, most of the women in my family live well into their 90s, so I have a long way to go yet.

I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me for not commenting in detail on her interesting, if somewhat single-track, argument, enabling her to arrive at her conclusion tonight. She may be aware that the Labour party is consulting widely on this complex subject of the equalisation of pension age. There is much to discuss, as I am sure that the Minister will be telling us when she responds to the debate.

The Government intend, I believe, to bring forward a proposal some time later this year and the Opposition look forward to debating the issue. I am sure that the hon. Lady will have much to contribute. She has obviously done a great deal of research on the subject and I look forward to hearing her views. As I have said, I hope that she will forgive me if I do not take this opportunity to reply to her in detail tonight; I intend to keep my powder dry, but I look forward to debating the matter with her at a later date.

5.7 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on obtaining this debate. With not only Britain but the rest of Europe now facing major demographic challenges, my hon. Friend is quite right to invite the House to consider future patterns of retirement and their effect on generations of both workers and pensioners to come.

The Government, as my hon. Friend has said, in the person of my right hon. Friend the present Leader of the House, then Secretary of State for Social Security, announced in June 1991 that we would equalise state pension age, and our manifesto at the last election reaffirmed that commitment. But we have not yet taken a decision on how we intend to achieve equalisation. We are, as my hon. Friend pointed out, considering four basic options, these being retirement age at 60, 63 or 65, or a flexible period, often referred to as a flexible decade. As I said, we have not taken a decision among those options, and it would be wholly improper for me to speculate on future legislation.

The 4,000-plus responses to the consultation document that we issued in December 1991 and the large volume of correspondence received by hon. Members demonstrate the public interest in the matter, and my hon. Friend's speech is a most helpful contribution to this wide debate.

My hon. Friend has referred to population changes forecast in Britain over the next few decades. She is right to predict a large increase in the number of elderly people. Since it has become fashionable to declare our interests tonight, it would appear that I have rather longer to wait for retirement age than my hon. Friend or the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding).

As the national insurance fund works on a pay-as-you-go basis, whereby today's workers pay today's pensions, the support ratio is fundamental to our thinking about pensions and retirement. It is therefore worth taking a few minutes to examine that ratio.

Throughout the industrialised world, people are living longer, healthier lives. As a result, an increasingly large proportion of the population are over the existing state pension ages. Our consultation document noted that, in 1990, there were on average 3·5 people of working age for every retirment pensioner in the United Kingdom.

Assuming that no change were to be made in state pension age arrangements, that ratio would drop to 2·5 to one by the year 2030. As my hon. Friend pointed out, the fewer workers there are supporting each pensioner, the more each will have to pay to maintain the same level of pension.

Since the publication of the consultation document, the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys has issued fresh population projections for the next century. They show an even more marked increase in the proportion of people over state pension age.

We had previously estimated that there would be 11·3 million pensioners by the year 2010; we now calculate that there will be 11·7 million. We had previously estimated that there would be 14 million people over state pension age by the year 2030; we now calculate that there will be 15·5 million. Again assuming pension age status quo, the support ration would drop to 2·2 people of working age per pensioner by 2030.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, those changes are not merely a British phenomenon. In the EC, 19·2 per cent. of the population, or 61·9 million people, are over 60. By 2010, that will rise to 23 per cent. Although we should not take it as an indication of what Britain will do eventually, because we have not yet taken a decision, we should be aware of how Europe and the industrialised world are responding to that phenomenon. My hon. Friend provided some information, and I can add that Denmark and Norway already have a state pension age of 67, the United States is moving towards 67, Germany is moving up to 65, Japan and Italy are increasingly their state pension age, and Austria has equalised state pension ages at 65.

The problem is recognised by the European Commission. In a recent report on Communitywide retirement age policy, it noted:

"radical changes in the demographic situation" will have a major impact on

"the balance between resources and expenditure in social security sytems".

Any country must take into account for the future the necessity and the moral imperative of providing for a sound pension system that guarantees security in retirement. It must also take into account the equally compelling necessity and moral and practical imperative to achieve that without placing an unacceptable burden on the workers of that time.

When we come to resolve that question, we will face the awesome responsibility of handing to future generations a solution to the question of state pension age that must stand the test of decades to come. Any costs or savings will be largely borne or enjoyed by future Governments, not by this Government. The policies that we hand to those of the future must be sound and safe. Costs or savings of between £3 billion and £4 billion are not prospects that we can treat lightly. Our discussion document sets out our calculations in respect of all our options, between which we have yet to choose.

The debate has placed much emphasis on the increasing numbers of the elderly. However, the wider debate develops, I would make one strong appeal: we should not regard our elderly as a burden, but a resource. We must surely all be grateful that we are living longer, healthier, more active lives. I for one will rejoice if the number of pensioners enjoying greater longevity and medical advances grows even more than we already predict.

The one thing that I cannot undertake to equalise is the imbalance of longevity between men and women, but both sexes now enjoy increased life expectancy, which we welcome. The use of those years over the age of 60, whether in remunerative or voluntary work or actively enjoyed retirement, is the subject of increasing study and interest. It is in that positive vein of not always associating advanced years with absence of contribution to the common good, while at the same time recognising every citizen's right to security and rest at the end of his or her working life, that I have addressed the issues raised by the debate.

It is also important to consider the necessity of not always confusing state pension age with an individual's retirement age. The state pension age is the age at which someone becomes entitled to the state retirement pension, but retirement age is the age at which a worker chooses to retire. For many workers that may be a different age from the pension age. Retirement age depends on a number of factors relating to the employment situation and individual choice. It is not something that can be imposed by the Government and it is not something that the Government, in sorting out state pension age, will seek to impose on individuals. We believe, however, that those who wish to remain in the labour market beyond state pension age should be encouraged and enabled to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam referred to the option of a flexible retirement. We are studying that along with the other options, and we have not yet reached a final conclusion on it. My hon. Friend is right to say that, faced with a choice of retirement ages, many might choose to retire early on reduced state pension, which would, of course, then involve a future Government in heavier income-related benefit expenditure. That option, like others, has attractions as well as drawbacks. I assure the House that, when we come to choose among the four options, which we are studying closely, we will bear in mind the points made in tonight's debate and in the wider debate.

My only regret tonight—I am making a carping point—is that we have not had much of a contribution generally from the Opposition.

Housing

5.18 am

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): I am pleased to have this opportunity to raise the important subject of affordability in housing—albeit not at the hour that I, or I suspect the other participants in the debate, would have chosen.

I start by declaring an interest as the director of a housing consultancy which has advised a number of organisations on matters germane to the debate. It is an important subject, which has become a matter of grave concern in recent years. There have been problems of affordability in all tenures. In the home ownership market, there has been a crisis of debt and repossessions. The number of home owners facing the prospect of losing their home through repossession rose from 16,000 in 1989 to 75,000 in 1991 and 68,000 last year.

At the beginning of last year, the Prime Minister made the rash claim on, of all places, the radio programme "Desert Island Discs": "We have stopped repossessions." Some 68,000 households bear witness to the Government's failure to honour that pre-election promise. Although the rise in repossessions has been stemmed, that cannot be said of the problem of mortgage debt. At the last count, 350,000 households were more than six months in arrears with their mortgage, and 147,000 of them were more than 12 months in arrears.

Many of those households will face the misery of repossession and the loss of their home—sadly, some of them already do so. They are the victims of the failed economic policies of the 1980s, which were claimed as an economic miracle on the basis of a credit binge that came to a sickening halt in 1988, leaving all too many people with debts that proved to be millstones round their necks.

Many home owners were left with properties that were worth less than the mortgage outstanding on them—a problem that has become known in the trade language as negative equity. On the latest estimates, that problem affects at least 1·5 million householders, who are locked into the unwelcome trap where they find it virtually impossible to move because the sum that they would receive from selling their house would be substantially less than the amount that they have outstanding on their mortgage for it.

Affordability problems are not confined to the owner-occupied sector. They are seen just as starkly in all parts of the rented sector. Council tenants have faced continuing steep rent increases as a direct consequence of Government policy, specifically the new subsidy framework introduced by the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Under that framework, the Government have been able to determine, to all intents and purposes, the level of rent that each local authority has to set.

One of the curious features of the subsidy framework is that the Government set notional rents for each local authority in the country—an extraordinary example of centralisation, where the gentlemen in Whitehall claim to have a better knowledge of what the rent levels should be in any area of the country than do those people who have been democratically elected from the local communities. Those in Whitehall use formulae that are so confusing and arcane that they produce complete nonsense. They claim that the rent levels will reflect market values, but produce results that lead to higher rents in areas where market values are patently substantially lower than in other regions.

In my local authority district of Greenwich, rents have had to rise this year by £4, to an average of £41·65 per tenant per week—an increase of more than 10 per cent, which is more than three times the inflation rate. Most scandalous of all is the fact that the forced rent increases have both enabled, and provided the vehicle for, the Government to offload on to council tenants an ever-increasing proportion of the cost of housing benefit. In the coming year, £790 million of housing benefit costs are being forced on to the rents of council tenants. That will result in an average increase in rent of £3·85 a week for every council tenant in the country to meet the cost of housing benefit for other tenants.

Not only is that monstrously unfair, but in no other tenure is a similar provision applicable. There would be a national outcry if it were suggested that similar provisions should apply in other tenures. Imagine the alarm if it were suggested that every home owner in Britain should pay a surcharge on his mortgage equivalent to £200 a year—that is the exactly equivalent figure—towards the cost of income support payments to other home owners in financial difficulties. That is the framework that the Government have introduced in respect of council tenants, forcing some to pay higher rent than they would otherwise need to pay so as to meet part of the cost of benefits to other tenants.

That is not only grossly unfair, but involves a scandalous breach of faith. When housing benefit was first introduced, the Government repeatedly pledged that the full cost would be borne by central Government and not offloaded on to local authorities. The Prime Minister, then a mere Back Bencher, speaking in a debate on what was then the Social Security and Housing Benefits Bill, asked specifically for an assurance on the point:

> "If 2·3 million people on supplementary benefit are likely to be transferred to a local authority rebate scheme, are the Government proposing to accept 100 per cent. liability for the costs of that scheme"?

He was given an assurance by the then Minister, Mr. Hugh Rossi, in the same debate:

> "The Government have undertaken to local authorities to reimburse to them 100 per cent. of any additional costs that they incur under housing benefit . . . When I talk of the costs, I am talking of the 100 per cent. rebate on rents and rates that will be granted".—[Official Report, 23 November 1981; Vol. 13, c. 674-707.]

We have a clear and categorical assurance, given in response to questions from many people, including the present Prime Minister, that central Government would reimburse the cost of housing benefit 100 per cent. Now, we see that the reality is different.

Some 20 per cent. of the total cost of the housing benefit paid to council tenants is not being met by central Government but is being charged to the rent accounts of tenants—a flagrant breach of a clear pledge, given by the Government of the time. It is rather a sad comment that the Prime Minister who presides over that was party to the original pledge that it would not happen.

If council tenants are facing a raw deal because of the Government's actions, so, too, are tenants of private landlords. Deregulation of the private rented market has opened the door to massive increases in rents, when properties are offered on the market not as regulated tenancies but as assured or assured shorthold tenancies.

Even those properties subject to rent regulation are seeing steep increases when rents come to be re-registered. On average, they are re-registered at a level 25 per cent. higher than previously.

Recently, I was approached by tenants in Greenwich, whose rent had been increased by 58 per cent. To add insult to injury, the increase was almost double the amount that the landlord had requested. The rent officer and rent assessment committee mechanism has produced an extraordinary increase in rents, even above the levels sought by the landlord. There can be no justification for rents being pushed up in that way. Those increases are far in excess of the rate of inflation, and bear no relationship to what is happening in the property market.

The Government have often enjoyed making the case that rents should enjoy a closer relationship to market values—they certainly argue that forcibly in relation to their new regime on council rents. However, in the past two years, market values have been declining. Indeed, there has been a significant reduction in house prices.

If the relationship to market values were to be sustained, we should now be seeing reductions in the rents that are fixed by rent officers and rent assessment committees, instead of which we see a continuing, inexorable upward trend, which is increasing at a faster rate than previously. In 1988, average registered rents increased by 18 per cent. whereas the increases in 1989, 1990 and 1991 were 19 per cent., 22 per cent. and 25 per cent. During a period when the housing market was declining and capital values were decreasing, rent increases accelerated in the sector that is subject to regulation.

The problems are serious for council and private sector tenants, but it is housing association tenants who feel most keenly the issues that surround affordability. It is worth putting the figures in context. When the Housing Act 1988 introduced a new financial framework for housing associations, fears were widely expressed that it would lead to steep rises in association rents. Responding to the expressions of anxiety, Ministers were emphatic that housing association lettings would be "affordable". They added that tenants would be protected by a tenants' guarantee, which among other requirements would insist that housing associations set their rents so that they would be in reach of those in low-paid employment. As with so many other pledges offered by the Government, that promise was not worth the paper on which the tenants' guarantee was written.

In 1988, the National Federation of Housing Associations set up a regular monitoring system to record rents being set by associations and the incomes of tenants moving into new lettings. The system has been in operation since the second quarter of 1988. The most recent figures, for the third quarter of 1992, show that, in the intervening four years rents for all housing association lettings increased by a staggering 112 per cent. Housing association rents have more than doubled in just over four years. Yet over the same period, the average income of tenants rose by only 25 per cent., rather below the increases in the retail price index and in average earnings. That reflects the well-known fact that housing association tenants are among the least well-off in Britain.

As a consequence of rent levels increasing by more than four times the average income levels of tenants, the affordability ratio has increase. That means that housing association tenants are having to allocate an ever larger proportion of their income to meet their rent. The figures show that about 26 per cent. of their income is taken by rent. That does not take into account other related costs that are incurred through occupation of their homes, such as council tax, water rates and heating costs. In London, where costs are higher, the National Federation of Housing Associations' CORE—continuous recording—monitoring system records that, on average, tenants are putting about 29 per cent. of their income into meeting their rent. The figures are rising all the time.

The figures reflect a period when housing association grant rates, on average, were about 75 per cent. of the capital costs of new schemes, but the rates are changing. Last year, the rates were reduced to 72 per cent., and in the coming year they will decrease to 67 per cent. The Government justify the reductions on the ground that building costs have been falling during the recession, so the procurement cost of new housing has been decreasing. It has been possible to get homes more cheaply than previously, and the Government argue that grant rates can be reduced accordingly.

There is some truth in that, and it would not concern me, if the Government were ready to increase grant rates when building costs rise—as they inevitably will. Most people familiar with that sector except, once recovery begins, a significant rise in building costs as firms that have cut their margins to the bone to keep alive during the recession attempt to restore profit margins to protect their financial position. As they do so, the procurement costs to housing associations will inevitably rise.

While Ministers have been quick to use reduced procurement costs as an explanation, excuse or justification for reducing grant rates, they have been coy about giving the corollary assurance that, in the event of procurement costs increasing, grant rates will rise again to reflect that situation. When the Minister replies, it will be interesting to see whether he can give an assurance that when procurement costs rise again, the Government will accept the need to increase grant rates, to ensure no deterioration in the affordability of homes.

We have not received such an assurance so far. I hope that the Minister will cast some light on that aspect, but if not, we will think the worst—that the Government are only too happy to find reasons and excuses for cutting grant rates but far less willing to protect the interests of tenants and housing associations in different circumstances.

In the past few months, we have seen different indications of the Government's intentions. The autumn statement signalled the Government's objective of reducing grant rates to 60 per cent. in 1994-95 and to 55 per cent. in 1995-96. The National Federation of Housing Associations analysed the implications, and reached the stark conclusion that the consequence would be an increase in average rents to a level 75 per cent. higher in 1996 than those measured in the CORE monitoring system in 1992.

In particular, working households becoming association tenants would face an average rent of £84·37 in 1996, compared with £48·11 in 1992. On average, that group would spend 39·3 per cent. of income in rent in 1996, compared with 28·9 per cent. in 1992, and the percentage of new working tenants spending more than one third of their income in rent would rise from 27 per cent. in 1992 to 76 per cent. in 1996.

Those are staggering and depressing figures. It is clear that, with rents being pushed up to those levels, some 89 per cent. of housing association tenants moving to new lettings are expected to be people dependent on housing benefit to meet all or part of their rent.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

The consequences are clear. Only those people likely to be receiving housing benefit, or who are relatively well off and are able to afford large rents without assistance, would be able to consider housing association lettings. That will inevitably exclude significant numbers of people on modest incomes—in middle to low-paid work—who cannot afford the extraordinarily high cost of renting from housing associations under those terms, and who will not qualify for housing benefit towards the cost. People in need on modest incomes and in low-paid work—the very people that the tenants guarantee said should have access to housing association lettings—will be squeezed out. That is a complete and fragrant breach of the supposed tenants guarantee.

Those who cannot afford to enter into housing association lettings because they qualify for housing benefit will be caught in a wretched poverty trap—unable to improve their income and living standards because they will lose almost every penny from every extra pound they earn through the withdrawal of their means-tested benefits on top of their tax and national insurance liabilities.

A couple with a low income will lose 30p of every extra pound that they receive in tax and national insurance—assuming, that is, that they are subject only to the 20 per cent. tax band. That is a generous assumption, because the band is very narrow. National insurance will rise to 10 per cent. under the arrangements announced in the Budget. That will leave the couple with 70p, 65 per cent. of which will be removed by the housing benefit taper and a further 20 per cent. by the council tax taper. So 85 per cent. of that 70p will be taken away, leaving the couple with precisely 10·5p.

If that couple are unwise enough to have children and hence to receive family credit, a further 70 per cent. of the residual 10·5p will be taken, leaving them just 3p from every extra pound they earn. That is a monstrous poverty trap. When the Government came to office, they complained that the richest people in Britain were subject to a penal and confiscatory tax rate of 83p in the pound; now they have created a far more penal and confiscatory framework for the lowest-paid people in employment, who depend on benefits.

That cannot be right. No one in his right mind can justify creating an arrangement that catches people in such acute poverty traps, giving them no incentive to earn more: such people will lose virtually every penny they earn, through the withdrawal of means-tested benefits and tax and national insurance contributions. They are condemned to a life of benefit dependency, with no incentives.

I remind the Minister that, when Labour was last in power, although income tax was higher—the standard rate was 33 per cent. rather than 25 per cent.; the lower rate also applied, but I am not taking that into account—a person in low-paid work would still have kept 37p out of every extra pound that he earned, because the reduction in benefit was so much less steep than it is now.

That is a very interesting difference. Someone in low-paid work, receiving help with housing costs through housing benefit—or rent rebate, as it was then—and rate rebate, but also paying tax and national insurance, would have been subject to an income loss of 63p in the pound. Currently, the equivalent figure is 89·5p in the pound. The Government should be ashamed of having plunged so many low-paid people into such a poverty trap.

This unhappy situation cries out for a new approach, and I have a series of specific proposals for action to tackle the problems. First—remembering the problems of mortgage arrears and repossessions—I believe that we need a mortgage benefit scheme to help home owners in low-paid work who are struggling to cope. For those who are unemployed, income support may well be available; if so, it will meet their mortgage interest payments up to a reasonable limit. But there are no arrangements to help those who are in work, even if—as is so often the case—the mortgage arrears are attributable to a reduction in earnings, perhaps when a member of the family ceased to work or went on to short-time work, or when his hours or earnings were reduced.

People who are in employment, but whose earnings are reduced, will have serious difficulty in making their mortgage repayments. It is precisely those people who receive no assistance under the current arrangements. The mortgage benefit scheme, which has been researched very thoroughly for the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, offers an intelligent way forward, concentrating help on those most in need. The savings that the Chancellor will make by restricting mortgage interest tax relief to 20 per cent.—that move, announced in the Budget, is very welcome—should be diverted to help the poorest home owners through a mortgage benefit scheme.

Council tenants must also be liberated from the monstrously unfair housing benefit clawback. This requires a simple adjustment to the subsidy rules to exclude housing benefit from the formula, thereby putting council tenants on exactly the same footing as everyone else. Benefits to council tenants, private tenants and housing association tenants and income support for home owners should be the responsibility of society as a whole, paid for out of national taxation, not selectively offloaded on to individual sectional groups within the community. It is wrong that that should be done. That practice should be changed as soon as possible.

Local authorities should be allowed once again to determine rents locally, in the light of local circumstances, rather than be forced by Government to push rents upwards, on the basis of a mechanistic Whitehall formula which, as is so often the case, bears no relationship to local reality. With private tenants, Ministers should now act on the consultation exercise that they undertook some months ago. The evidence—which I am aware of from talking to people, not just in my own constituency but in many other parts of the country—is absolutely clear: that rent levels for private tenants have been rising by unacceptably disproportionate levels, far ahead of the rate of inflation, and that they bear no relation at all to what is happening to capital values.

Action is needed urgently to halt, if not reverse, the unjustified rent increases being imposed on private tenants. New guidance should be issued to rent officers and rent assessment committees. The latter are often the cause of the problem. Rent officers tell me that they often have no option but to increase rents far more than they would like because, if rents are referred to a rent assessment committee, they will simply be put up on appeal. Rent assessment committees have the unenviable reputation of being seen as the party of the landlord rather than as a group of people trying to be impartial and scrupulous and trying to find an appropriate and fair balance between the interests of the two parties.

New guidance is needed to discourage these unjustified rent increases, and also proper safeguards, including appeal procedures that work for those tenants who are not in the regulated sector—tenants who have assured tenancies or assured shorthold tenancies—and who usually have no effective redress whatsoever against extortionate rents imposed and charged by their landlords. A proper mechanism for appealing against such extortionate rents and unreasonable increases is long overdue.

I believe that the Government must act immediately to reverse the very damaging threat of further reductions in grant rates to housing associations. The current figure of 67 per cent. grant rates should be taken as the absolutely minimum base line, and should be increased if either construction costs or affordability problems make that necessary. The threatened reduction of grant rates to 60 per cent. and then 55 per cent. must be repudiated as yet another of our failed Chancellor's foolish foibles. He may be unable to tell his threes from his fives, but it is time that someone else in the Government—in this case, I suggest, a Department of the Environment Minister—taught the Chancellor a few basic lessons.

At the same time, the Department of the Environment must come clean about affordability. For years, Ministers have talked about affordability but have never come up with any definition. We notice from other issues that Department of the Environment Ministers are all too keen to prescribe performance indicators to others. It is high time that they set a performance indicator in relation to affordability. Tenants of housing associations throughout the country deserve to know what is an affordable rent. They deserve to have the opportunity to challenge rent increases that are unreasonable and beyond the means of people in low-paid employment.

To do that, it is necessary to have a clear indication and a clear definition of affordability. The Government should come clean about it. In the absence of any clear criteria and a clear definition, it is possible for people to say one thing to one group of people and something else to another group, and to preside over a framework in which rents are clearly escalating and going through the roof—far beyond the means and reach of people in low-paid employment, without their having any come-back. We need some honesty from Ministers, and we need some clear definitions of affordability.

I am conscious of the fact that this debate is taking place at the end of a very long night. However, we have at least had an opportunity to air what I believe to be one of the most vital housing issues of today. I hope that, in his reply, the Minister will be able to offer some positive responses, and not just trot out the old excuses for the failure of current policies—excuses that we have heard so often. I hope he will accept that, even at this hour of the morning, lame excuses will not be good enough. We want a new approach that will bring hope to people who are desperate because of affordability problems.

5.50 am

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): It is appropriate that this debate on affordability follows one on retirement and pensions. It is also appropriate that it should be taking place tonight, of all nights. I believe that when we look back we shall see 1 April as a key date with regard to housing and the homelessness crisis. I make that point because it is the date of the introduction of community care. That may not seem immediately relevant to affordability, but I suggest that it is indirectly relevant. From 1 April, people already in private residential care will not have the full cost of their care met; unlike those who enter homes after 1 April. In this of all years—it is the European year for solidarity between the generations—elderly people will find that, as a result of that policy, they cannot afford places in residential homes. If their families are unable to match the costs, they will have to leave and look for accommodation elsewhere, turning back to local authorities. Why? Because the housing benefit system will not cover the full cost.

Similarly, in the case of community care, the discharge of people from hospitals will put pressure on housing. The Government take a good policy and, somehow, manage to turn it inside out and corrupt it. They have a knack almost of corrupting the language. The very words "community care" may well turn out to mean the opposite. It may well be that there is no care and that the community is not there for the provision of support. The document on community care contained the helpful words:

"Housing is the key to independent living."

That is fine, provided that there is sufficient housing. But, without a door, what use is a key?

In the context of this debate, the primary concern of society must be the absolute shortage of housing to rent. The Audit Commission, the Institute of Housing and the Housing Corporation all come up with a figure of 100,000 when considering the number of units of accommodation that need to be provided each year. The Government's plans for this year may produce, at best, 53,000 new homes. There is a desperate shortage of housing to rent.

For another reason, tonight is an appropriate occasion for a debate on the affordability of housing. On 31 March the Government closed the severe weather shelters. I am glad that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment is present, as he went on record in The Times, and elsewhere, in an attempt to assure us that the 400 people in the nine shelters provided as emergency accommodation throughout the winter would have places provided for them or would find spaces in the voluntary sector. On the very last day—31 March—we checked and found that 133 people in some of those nine shelters had to leave, without anywhere else to go. As we debate in this Chamber, those people are spending their night on the streets of London. That is a disgrace.

Of course, we accept that it is a good policy to have severe weather shelters, but why on earth could not the Government have made provision to ensure that people being turned out had somewhere else to go? They knew who the people were. What we have is a good policy corrupted.

The Government's housing policies are now effectively pricing people out of renting. They are making it impossible for many people to rent in the private sector, the local authority sector and the housing association sector. I remind the Minister that the housing association sector is only 3 per cent. of the stock, the private rented sector only 7 per cent. and the local authority sector 21 per cent. All in all, about a third of the population live in rented housing and they have a right to know whether their homes will be affordable in the years to come.

[Mr. John Battle]

I suggest that there needs to be some joined-up thinking between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Social Security. The affordability crisis in housing is also a housing benefit crisis. The Government are pursuing a low-wage policy and there is a fundamental contradiction between low wages and high rents. The Minister may reply that high rents will be met by high housing benefit.

The problem is that, for some people, wages are dropping. The Government claim that the average wage is rising and that is true, but they do not seem to realise that the average rises because the highest wages go up while, at the same time, people at the bottom of the scale see their incomes declining. That is where people hit the poverty trap.

The poverty trap is not for those on benefit but for those who are literally trapped between benefit and work income. They are caught coming off benefit. The Government must tackle the issue of housing benefit and the Minister should not glibly assume that social security will pay the bill. He will learn the hard way. People have to take up work—and so they should—but when they are offered a low-paid, part-time or temporary job, they will find that the income from that job will float them out of housing benefit through the tapers. They will be caught in the poverty trap because they will have to decide whether they can afford to take the job. If they cannot afford to take the job because it would mean that they were unable to pay the rent, they will face the worst double jeopardy. They will face the choice of losing their home because they cannot pay the rent or not taking a job. In other words, a work disincentive is being built into the Government's high-rent, low-wage policy.

The Government also need to make it clear whether the Treasury is giving carte blanche to the housing benefit system. From some of the statements made by the Secretary of State for Social Security, I am not sure whether the benefit tapers will be changed in the next Budget in November. If the tapers are changed and the situation becomes harsher, people will receive less from the benefit system to support their rents and will be forced to pay a higher proportion of their incomes in housing costs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) referred to the iniquitous system of local authorities effectively subsidising the income support system. When the Government ring-fenced the housing revenue accounts, that is how they insisted that the system worked. Local authority tenants not on housing benefit make up the cost of local authority tenants on housing benefit. Of course, the Government know that that is happening. That is why they have recently changed the rules for large-scale voluntary transfer. They know that the rent accounts of local councils are receiving a subsidy from tenants not on benefit to cover the deficits which the Government should be making up through housing benefit and income support.

Why should some council tenants be subsidising the housing benefit of others, who ought to get proper support through the social security system? In other words, other renters are being forced to subsidise the income support system rather than the housing system. That is iniquitous and unjust. The Government recognised that fact in connection with large-scale voluntary transfer, which is why they changed the rules for that and introduced the levy. They should scrap the system now and return to local authorities the money that is due for paying out full housing benefit.

The Government are still operating a policy of pricing people out of renting local authority properties unless they are on high or medium wages. There is almost a deliberate edge, to force people to buy by pricing them out of renting. The guidelines set by the Government for local authority rent increases this year assume a 9 per cent. increase. That is well above the rate of inflation, yet those are the costs that tenants are asked to pay; that is the money that local authorities have to raise to balance their housing revenue accounts.

On 24 March my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) asked the Secretary of State

"what assessment he has made as to the likely effect on the building of houses by housing associations of the reduction of housing association grants."

The Minister for Housing and Planning replied:

"Increasing the private finance input into housing association schemes enables us to produce significantly greater numbers of new homes with the available public resources. The reduction in the average housing association grant for rented schemes from 72 per cent. in 1992-93 to 67 per cent. in 1993-94 was achieved through lower costs without any significant impact on the affordability of rents implied."

—[Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 625.]

A lot of meaning must be attached to the little word "implied". It is not the view of housing associations or their tenants that there has been no significant impact on affordability. There has indeed been a significant impact and not only I but many other hon. Members, including Conservative Members, are receiving letters from tenants in housing associations saying that they are finding it difficult to meet their rents.

On 24 March the National Federation of Housing Associations launched its affordability campaign, because it believes that the affordability crisis is now undermining housing association provision of housing to rent. If the housing associations constitute the only social rented sector that the Government are prepared to support, where does the Minister expect people to go if he prices them out of housing association properties? Even the Government's 1988 deregulation of the private rented sector did not revive it; there has been no substantial increase in properties available for private renting. There is a massive shortage of properties in the public, council rented sector. If people cannot afford their housing association flats and houses, where are they to move to? Where else can they go?

The housing associations' campaign on affordability points out that since 1989 housing association grants, the Government subsidy to housing association development, had been fixed at an average level of 75 per cent. throughout the country, but that in 1992-93 it fell to 72 per cent. and that it is now scheduled to fall to 67 per cent. But in the Department of the Environment's public expenditure announcement following the autumn statement the Government set an objective of reducing the grant to 60 per cent. in 1994-95 and to 55 per cent. in 1995-96.

The Government have not previously set grant rates for subsequent years. In a parliamentary reply on 24 March to a question from me suggesting that grants were projected to drop to those rates, the Minister said that it was alarmist propaganda. If he believes that the public expenditure statements of the Department of the Environment are alarmist propaganda, he should eat his own words, because it is there in black and white. It says that that is the Government's objective. In a speech at the London School of Economics the Housing Minister confirmed that that reduction in grant rates was his objective.

The consequences of the reduction in grant rates will be higher rents, the growth of dependency of housing association tenants on housing benefit, housing association revenue streams increasingly dependent on housing benefit and difficulties faced by housing associations in sustaining levels of private finance. If the grant rate changes take place, it is estimated that housing associations will need to raise an extra £400 million in private finance in 1995-96 simply to maintain a stable programme. Have the Government done the arithmetic on that? Do they believe that they can raise that money? Will not the Minister concede that it is an unrealistic additional amount for housing associations to find?

What will happen? There will be a vicious circle of higher rents, housing benefit dependency and reduced loan security, all as a result of a reduction in grant rates in the Government's attempt to push the housing association movement further in the direction of raising private finance.

The National Federation of Housing Associations commissioned UBS Phillips and Drew to forecast the factors that are incorporated into the grant rate and the total cost indicator systems which govern the costs and rents of housing association production. The calculations based on those forecasts are that rents are likely to increase by a further 70 per cent. on average and dependency on housing benefit will increase to 85 per cent. of housing association tenants. It will be 90 per cent. for two-parent households.

Such percentages of incomes spent on housing costs are well beyond what is expected anywhere else in the world. The OECD suggested that if a person or a family spent more than 30 per cent. of income on housing costs, there would not be sufficient left to feed and clothe themselves, apart from the cost of travel to work.

The Government have not revealed their estimate of an acceptable percentage of income to spend on housing costs, but the Treasury has assumed a figure of 34·7 per cent. since 1989. Under the proposals for one parents and single people, that figure will be over 40 per cent. For pensioner households the position will be even worse. If grant rates drop to 55 per cent., according to the UBS Phillips and Drew survey, pensioner couples will spend 45 per cent. of their income on rent and single pensioners 52 per cent. Single people under 25 will pay 48 per cent. Those levels are unsustainable.

I hope that the Minister has seen the background briefing notes of the National Federation of Housing Associations which give figures based on the federation's continuous recording of lettings data on new tenants supplied by the associations that make up the federation. They show that 76 per cent. of new working tenants will spend more than one third of their income on rent. The question that must be asked is: in those circumstances, how could the new rents be considered affordable on any reasonable interpretation of the word? Working households becoming association tenants will face an average rent of £84·37 in 1996, compared with £48·11 in 1992. On average that group will be spending 39·3 per cent. of their income on rent in 1996, compared with 28·9 per cent. in 1992.

In other words, the percentage of new working tenants who spend more than a third of their incomes on rent will rise from 27 per cent. in 1992 to 76 per cent. in 1996. Is that the Government's intention? If so, the only conclusion is that they assume that the bill will be picked up by the Department of Social Security in housing benefit, because 89 per cent. of new tenants will be on full or partial benefit. I should be interested to know whether the Department of the Environment and the Housing Minister have clearance from the Secretary of State for Social Security to escalate housing benefit in such a way. If 89 per cent. of all new housing association tenants moving into new homes in 1966 are on housing benefit because of the change in grant rates—reducing them to 55 per cent.—they will qualify for weekly housing benefit of £30·72 in 1996, compared with £13·28 in 1992. In that case, the Government will have to pay drastically more in housing benefit.

When we look at the annual report of the Department of the Environment, we find that the increase in housing benefit for private tenants and housing association tenants in the past 12 months is incredible. I cannot see the Treasury allowing the Department of the Environment to get away with a policy of simply saying that it will jack up the rents and the Department of Social Security will pick up the bill. I suspect that the Government will start to claw it back.

If everyone is pushed into housing benefit, the question again arises: in those circumstances, is it worth new tenants having a job? In other words, if they are offered a job, they are put in the real dilemma of having to refuse it because they will not be able to make up the difference between the high rent and what they would have got on housing benefit.

Pensioners will face worse affordability problems. In 1991-92, pensioner households, except housing association lettings, paid an average of 38 per cent. of their net incomes in gross rent, compared with 25 per cent. for households under pensioner age. We all know that, because pensioners who visit our surgeries or write to us often set out their payments in detail. They can tell us their weekly milk bills. They do the arithmetic because they must pay the price of increasing bills. Pensioners will be hard-pressed if rents increase in this way because not all of them are on full housing benefit: some get a modest supplementary pension which, effectively, eliminates them from access to housing benefit. They then have to find the rent. Pensioner households pay higher average weekly gross rents than non-pensioner ones—in 1991-92, the figure was £42·49 compared with £38·30.

Are the Government suggesting that housing associations will provide welfare housing with a vengeance only for those on housing benefit? The trend is already shifting in that direction because 70 per cent. of tenants in housing associations are on benefit, compared with about 66 per cent. of council tenants. If they are saying that, there is another twist because the housing will be available only for pensioners on housing benefit.

If unemployed people on benefit are offered a job, they must accept it, regardless of how low paid it is, or they will lose the benefit. That is the new trap under the social security rules. The double-jeopardy is that, if people accept a part-time, temporary, low-paid job, it may float them out of a benefit but not give them sufficient to make up the difference in rent and they will have to move out. Even for the elderly, a bit of supplementary pension from a partner could mean that housing association properties will need notes in the windows saying "DSS only apply", which we have seen previously. If people cannot guarantee that they are on full housing benefit, they will not be able to afford the rent.

[Mr. John Battle]

So what is the future of housing associations? The Mail on Sunday on 21 February said:

"Private developers could be given Government cash to build low-cost homes for homeless and poor families. Ministers may allow builders to compete with housing associations for a slice of £2 billion of Whitehall funding. Tory MPs pushing for the change are concerned that housing associations are failing to give value for money. They believe that savings could be made by 'cutting out the middleman' and funding developers directly. They argue that private developers could build more homes with the money through greater expertise and lower costs."

The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford) said in the article:

"I understand from the private sector that value for money is not being given. Many of the builders concerned claim they could build more homes for the same costs."

I should like the Minister to confirm whether that is Government policy. Does he see the housing association grant going directly to the builders when it drops to 55 per cent?

So the great honeymoon of the housing association world which the Government supported seems to be coming to a close. What are the Government's intentions for the housing association world? Do they see it having a future, providing what they would describe as "socially rented housing", or do they see the grant going direct to the builders to provide more housing at lower cost?

The race for market rents was set off by the Housing Act 1988, which was to free the private rented sector. I remember asking the Housing Minister during proceedings on that Bill whether he had persuaded the Department of Social Security to agree to underwrite the housing benefit bill if landlords decided simply to jack up the rents and charge what they wanted. I remember the Minister saying that of course landlords could not put the rent up to £100 or £150 a week and simply claim that the person was on housing benefit. What have we seen happen?

We were given another notion—market rents. What do we get now? Week after week, I receive scores of letters from people who went to the rent assessment committee because the landlord proposed to increase their rent and found that the committee agreed to increase the rent by even more. What is happening in the private rented sector is exactly what was predicted would happen. Rents are going through the roof. So far, the Government simply say that it is deregulation and that those who cannot afford rents can obtain housing benefit. How long will it be, I am worried to ask, before the Treasury cuts the housing benefit bill? Will it be in November, when the tapers are reduced, that people are told that they have to pay more rent?

I conclude with a remark that the Minister made to me when I put it to him in environment questions on 24 March that the housing association grant reduction would cause real hardship. He replied:

"I reject the alarmist propaganda that the hon. Gentleman has just revealed to the House."—[Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 906.]

Is the UBS Phillips and Drew survey alarmist? Are the housing associations being alarmist? They tell the truth about the arithmetic and who will pay the price if the Government press ahead with their proposal.

When we talk about propaganda, the Minister should look at his Department's news releases, in particular the one of 18 March which committed the Government to spending £1·4 million on an advertising scheme to remind tenants of their right to buy. The news release which relaunched the campaign said:

"Many council tenants could find that the costs of buying compare very well with the costs of renting. In fact, an average Right to Buy mortgage repayment will be less than the average rent as from April."

Of course it will if the rents are increased to price people out into taking on mortgages. I suggest to the Minister that that statement says a lot more about the increasing costs of renting than about the availability of cheap mortgages. That is the problem. When we have a Government abolishing wages councils and driving wages down, of course the rents will be beyond people's means and the equations start to look different.

The Minister says in page 3 of the press release:

"Rents however have risen and now average rents are £33·00 a week (expected figure for April 1993) or £145 per calendar month. So mortgage costs could in fact now be less than renting costs."

I am tempted to add that it is almost like an advertisement for a timeshare. It is certainly not a commitment to a decent, affordable renting policy; it is simply suggesting that people should get out of renting and take themselves into mortgages as quickly as possible.

There we have it. That is the real propaganda, the real direction of Government policy. There is a fundamental contradiction between a Government's economic policy developing a low-wage economy and a Department of the Environment insisting on high rents. We need more rented housing; that has to be the primary position; but we also need to tackle affordability, or, in effect, people will be priced out of renting.

If the Government pursue the present policies in the public sector, the housing associations and the private sector, people will be priced out of renting. The only conclusion can be an increase in homelessness as people try to live with others, on sofas and floors, or take to the streets. What worries me is that this time it could mean homelessness among the elderly on a scale which, so far, our society fortunately has not had to face.

That might sound alarmist to the Minister, but I suggest that he does his homework on the figures. The Government could, and should, act now to pre-empt that potential scandal. The primary need is for homes to rent. The Government should ensure that people can afford to pay their rent according to their real income and means; if they do not, they will be culpably compounding the homelessness crisis and rendering the word affordability totally void of meaning.

6.22 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to respond to the debate.

On the Order Paper, the debate is entitled "affordability of housing". The question what is the right price level for social housing is not an easy one. This is not a simple matter of deciding that it would be nice if accommodation were cheaper, and legislating to that end. Indeed, it could be argued that many of the current inequalities in the housing market have their roots in decisions taken on past occasions, based on precisely that sort of ill-considered wishful thinking.

One of the reasons why this country has one of the smallest private rented sectors in Europe is that the artificial rent controls effectively destroyed the private rented sector for the decades after the first world war.

Mr. Battle rose——

Mr. Baldry: I have hardly started my speech before the hon. Gentleman invites me to give way, but I am happy to do so.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful, but it is one of the big myths that Government keep running, and it ought to be nailed as a lie. The reason why the rented sector declined is that landlords sold the houses to put the money in the bank. It was cheaper, when interest rates were high, to sell the property and accumulate money that way. Was not the cause of the gentrification of inner cities and the decline of rented housing the fact that the amount of housing to buy went up?

Mr. Baldry: That is a total canard, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The private sector declined from the first world war onwards because of rent controls which artificially kept down the return that landlords were able to make upon their investment—rent controls that were maintained by successive Labour Governments, which effectively destroyed the private rented sector. It has only been since the 1988 housing legislation, when we freed rents to proper market levels, that we have begun to see, for the first time for many decades, a private rented sector in which new tenancies equal those that are falling in.

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Baldry: No. I have listened to a lot from the hon. Gentlemen. They have both made very long speeches. They have both made a lot of points to which they want me to respond. It is a complex subject, and one on which I wish to respond in my own time and in my own way.

To begin with, housing is not, like some other goods such as education or health services, predominantly a public sector matter. Most households prefer to own their own homes, and a major element of our housing policies has been focused on enabling them to do so. The right to buy for council housing, and now our rents-to-mortgages proposals; cash incentive schemes to enable public sector tenants to move out into owner-occupation; shared ownership schemes—these are all important parts of our commitment to empower those who want to own their own homes to do just that. With affordability levels high, with mortgage rates at their lowest for 25 years, and with some impressive fixed rate mortgage deals on offer, now is an excellent time for those thinking about buying into the market to do so.

Not every household will want, or be able to afford, owner-occupation, so our policies also address the demand for rented accommodation; but here as well we must remember that housing for rent is not a public sector monopoly; although the private rented sector has been a declining force in housing provision throughout the century, there is now evidence of an increase in private lettings in response to the measures we have taken to encourage the private rented sector. Housing benefit means that tenants who rent from private owners are not left on their own if they face difficulty in meeting their housing costs.

Therefore, the question of affordability in the social housing sector is not something which can be treated in isolation. Not only do we need to remember the interaction with the other housing sectors; we also need to consider what the nation as a whole can afford to spend on housing programmes; to make sure that what we can afford is targeted as closely as possible on those in the greatest need; and to use it as efficiently as possible.

In the local authority sector, we have intentionally been moving towards a more market-based system of rents, where the rent the authority charges reflects the value of a letting. Instead of subsidising the bricks and mortar of the property itself, we have been subsidising the people who matter—individual tenants. That approach means that where local authority tenants can afford to pay more towards their housing costs, they do so.

In the past, there has been a great deal of emphasis on keeping down gross rents. However, that policy has produced some pretty odd results. In the local authority sector, rents have tended to reflect historic investment costs and arbitrary decisions on rent levels by local authorities rather than the intrinsic value of the housing on offer.

Thus, it has been common for local authorities to charge a high rent for a virtually uninhabitable system-built flat simply because the investment was recent and the debt charges high, and a much lower rent for a pleasant, traditional older house built some time ago. It is no wonder that some estates have been hard to let. As well as relative rents being out of line with reality, the average level of all gross local authority rents had reached an artifically low level by the time we took office in 1979, so we have been pursuing a policy of gradually increasing local authority rents in real terms.

Ring-fencing the housing revenue account has put an end to arbitrary subsidies to or from the ratepayer or council tax payer, and by shifting subsidy from bricks and mortar to people, we achieve a fairer distribution of the available subsidy.

The increases have not been severe, as we accept that tenants who do not receive housing benefit need to be protected from too steep a withdrawal of the subsidy to their rents. In order to move towards a more rational pattern of local authority rents, we have been targeting our guideline rent increases according to the capital value of different local authority housing stocks, so the authorities with the most valuable stocks are those that increase their rents the most.

We have also encouraged all authorities to move towards a more rational pattern of rent among their different properties—a pattern that reflects the value rather than the cost of different local authority homes. A tenant who is unable to meet the full cost of the rent gets means-related help from the housing benefit system. Some 70 per cent. of local authority rent increases are met by rent rebates.

Since 1989, local authorities have faced the discipline of the ring-fenced housing revenue account. It increases the focus on the delivery of housing management services, which are properly chargeable to rents. It means that authorities cannot bail out an inefficient housing operation at the expense of the local council tax payer, as too many did in the past. The need to make sure that rental income, together with the support we provide through the housing revenue account subsidy, meet outgoings provides a vital check. I make no apology for moving the subsidy away from the buildings and towards the people who live in them; and away from the suppliers and towards their customers. That is a crucial step towards a more efficient local authority housing sector. As local authorities grow into their role as enablers, and as the pressures of compulsory competitive tendering for housing management improve performance, I hope to see further improvements over the coming years.

[Mr. Baldry]

While local authorities account for the bulk of the existing social rented sector, they are, of course, no longer the main suppliers of new social housing for rent. That role has been taken on by the housing associations, which have been able to make use of private finance to ensure that the funds they receive from the Government through the Housing Corporation are translated into the maximum number of good-quality homes.

Since 1988, public spending on housing association grant has been supplemented by more than £2 billion of private sector finance—a clear gain to housing output at a time of public spending restraint. That large sum of private finance has enabled a great deal of additional investment in social housing to take place. The average housing association grant rate for this year is 72 per cent. Private finance enables a third more homes to be built with the available public money than would otherwise be so. For 1993-94, grant rates have been reduced, without any impact on rents, because of competititive prices and low interest rates.

Our manifesto promised 153,000 new homes to rent over a period of three years. I am confident that we shall do much better than that, partly because of the housing market package announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in November. I shall outline the outstanding success of that package in a moment. The private funding that housing associations can raise, however, also makes a vital contribution. The reductions achieved this year through lower interest rates and competitive prices have enabled us to reduce the rate of housing association grant from 72 to 67 per cent. without any significant impact on the affordability of the rents implied by those grant rates. That has improved output—an extra 3,300 new homes provided this year as a result of the increase in private sector funds levered in.

We must strike a balance between rent levels and the number of homes provided. There is no magic wand that we can wave to make it possible to provide decent homes more cheaply. If we choose to provide subsidy at a higher level, we must forgo the extra output, which, I am sure that hon. Members would agree, is badly wanted by those in unsatisfactory accommodation. [Interruption.]

As with local authority tenants, it is only those on incomes high enough to be outside the housing benefit system who will face the full impact of higher rents. It is, of course, important that they do not face unfair rises or increases that are too steep. Where resources are available to tackle housing need, it must be right that we increasingly move towards directing them, through the housing benefit system for poorer tenants, at those who have the greatest need, and make new homes available to those who are not satisfactorily housed.

Housing associations have been able to take advantage of low interest rates and low building costs to build more homes and house more people. Opposition Members will hear concerns about affordability from housing associations—as I frequently do. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) referred to the lobbying that housing associations have been carrying out in recent days.

What is most significant and at the crux of the debate—although housing associations have not made it clear in their various representations—is that this year, at a time when those associations have been expressing concern about affordability and the housing association grant rate, those self-same associations have put forward more than four and a half times the number of schemes that can be supported by the resources available for this year. At those grant rates, their bids have been four and a half times the amount of the money available. That clearly suggests that, whatever concerns they may express in public, housing associations have confidence in their ability to make use of the resources available at those grant rates and to achieve the higher outputs that we have sought.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) argued that 67 per cent. was the minimum grant rate that it was possible to sustain. I simply invite him to explain how, when housing associations are bidding at levels of four and a half times the money available through existing grant rates, one can possibly justify saying that 67 per cent. is the absolute minimum for housing association grant.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister answer the following question, which will help him to resolve the question that he has put to me? Has the Housing Corporation—which, as he knows, recommends to Ministers the appropriate grant rate for housing associations—recommended the reduction of grant rates from 72 to 67 per cent? If it did not, the Minister will have to explain to the House why he and his colleagues ignored the advice of the Housing Corporation, which was concerned about the affordability problems that were being caused by reducing grant rates.

Mr. Baldry: Before I answer that question, the Official Report will show that the hon. Gentleman completely ducked and evaded the question that I asked him, which is the core question. I will answer his question about the advice from the Housing Corporation as it raises the issue contained in his speech—and about which he has been muttering sotto voce ever since—about whether we would contemplate increasing the housing association grant rate.

We have repeatedly made it clear that, year on year, we make no final decisions about the grant rate until we have all the evidence and advice, which obviously includes advice that we receive from the Housing Corporation. This year, I suspect that it will also include the advice that may be offered by the Select Committee on the Environment, of which the hon. Gentleman is a member and which is currently conducting a study into the Housing Corporation and its work.

We have made no shadow of a secret of the fact that our objective is to increase the proportion of private financing put into new schemes in future by reducing grant rates to 60 per cent. in 1994-95, in line with the wider initiatives to expand the role of private finance announced in the autumn statement. But final decisions will be taken only when we have assessed the likely impact on housing associations' ability to raise the private finance necessary. Those decisions are taken year on year, and they will be taken against the background of that available information. Within that context, the Housing Corporation's advice will always be listened to carefully, as it was last year, but we will also bear in mind the need to make sure that the resources available go, as far as possible, towards helping those who need a home.

With a finite amount of capital for investment, we have to examine the trade-off between how much we can do and how much we ask tenants to pay for it. At whatever level of capital spending, we are forced to choose between building fewer homes with lower rents or more homes with higher rents. Some large numbers are involved in that trade-off. Quite small reductions in the subsidy that we pay to suppliers of housing association homes, in the case of new housing, can have a major impact on output.

This year's reductions in average housing association grant level by just 5 per cent. will enable an extra 3,300 homes to be built. In that case, rents will not have to rise, because the grant rate reductions have been made possible by cost savings. If we had followed the policies advocated by the Opposition, those extra houses would never have been built.

Recently, there have been some encouraging signs emerging from the statistics of families accepted as homeless by local authorities. The number of homelessness acceptances in 1992 was 2 per cent. less than in the previous year—the first year-on-year reduction. The signs on the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation are even more encouraging, with only 7,500 households housed there by local authorities, compared with more than 12,000 a year ago, and that is a drop of 38 per cent. We hope that, as the new homes made available through the housing market passage come on stream, the figures will continue their current hopeful trends.

I am happy to be able to tell the House that the housing market package has exceeded our expectations, and I should like to take the opportunity to congratulate all those who have been involved on the work they have done. Around 18,000 homes for rent will be made available in England, well exceeding the target of 16,000; grants to local authority and housing association tenants will enable some 3,500 households to move into the owner-occupied sector, freeing their current homes for those in need.

The 80 housing associations involved deserve great credit for their achievement. What they had to undertake was not inconsiderable within the time scale, and purchases have been made right across the country in almost all local authority areas, making a vital contribution towards meeting housing need, and often bringing on significant numbers of new houses for rent within particular areas.

However, we shall never allow ourselves to become complacent. Homelessness is still a significant problem, which demands tough decisions on how we use the resources at our disposal. The families who are still in unsatisfactory bed-and-breakfast accommodation, and who need a home of their own to give them a chance to bring up their children in the way they would want, will not thank us if we allow concern for existing tenants who are already comfortably housed, and who can afford to pay a little more towards the cost of their housing, to dominate our thinking at the expense of building new homes.

It is not just those who are unsatisfactorily housed in temporary accommodation who should be at the front of our minds. We must also remember the needs of those who have no home at all. Our rough sleepers initiative has made a significant impact on the problem of rough sleeping in central London. We have spent over £96 million. That money will provide nearly 1,000 hostel bedspaces, 700 places in flats and houses leased from the private sector, and more than 2,000 places in permanent move-on accommodation.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West made various assertions alleging that those who had been housed in rough weather shelters had not been provided with accommodation when they left. His figures are badly wrong. Only about 10 people were refused further accommodation, but I do not intend to have a spat about that at this early hour in the morning. I will arrange to have the information that we have made available in the Official Report so that it can be seen on the record, and there can be no doubt of the success of those involved in those schemes.

These measures have been having success. Independent research suggests that the number of people sleeping rough in central London has more than halved from its level of three years ago. We need to do what we can to ensure that the figures continue to reduce, and it is vital that all the agencies concerned with rough sleepers co-operate to achieve that end. At Lincoln's Inn fields, for example, Camden council, the Government, and voluntary organisations have co-operated to ensure that everybody formerly living there was offered alternative accommodation.

Tackling rough sleeping is not a simple task. It requires close co-ordination between central Government and local government, housing associations, and voluntary groups, to ensure that the needs of those sleeping rough are tackled in the round, and to make sure that rough sleepers have the opportunity to start a new life with more secure housing. The work of the rough sleepers initiative is not just the work of central Government; it depends on all the agencies involved working together with those who need shelter to find the right solutions.

I have talked about the needs of those who are without a proper permanent home to emphasise that, when we talk about affordability, we need to remember the purpose of our housing policy. It is to ensure that a decent home is in reach of every family. That is not wishful thinking—it is a substantial commitment—but it involves hard choices. It requires us to make sure that the resources that we can afford as a nation are targeted as closely as possible on the real problems, and on those in greatest need, and we are determined to do that.

Child Support Agency

6.45 am

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I am pleased to have secured a debate on the operational guidelines for the Child Support Agency. The agency will come into operation on 5 April and I have already heard advertisements for it on the radio which have a background of reassuring, soft-soap music that is intended to assure the public that it will be of assistance to them. The adverts hide, however, the operation of a potentially vicious piece of legislation, especially for many of the women whom it is intended to help. I think that it will help many women to obtain maintenance payments from the father of their child and it will also help some fathers. At the same time, it is potentially vicious for some women. I shall set out the reasons for that when I refer to the operational guidelines.

The Child Support Act 1991 passed through the House without the detailed scrutiny that such a measure should have received. That was probably because it passed through this place shortly before the general election. It was the strategy of the then leader of the Labour party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), not to make matters such as child support issues in the election campaign. He decided to concentrate on the main areas of difference between the parties, such as unemployment and the national health service, and to avoid other arguments. In some instances it was felt that the Labour party would have problems in defending itself and in others it was considered that the issues could be distorted. We know, however, that my right hon. Friend did not concentrate entirely on unemployment and the NHS and that he introduced proportional representation at the end of the campaign, but that is history. It was the tactic not to make the Child Support Bill an issue.

The principle that a father should pay for his child is generally accepted. I do not think that there is any doubt about that. It is only unfortunate that the details behind the principle were not examined in detail. For example, the Treasury will be the main benefactor when the agency comes into operation. We know that 70 per cent. of all single mothers are on income support. Every extra penny that they obtain through the agency will go to the Treasury. The guidelines were not issued at the time that the Bill passed through the House, so the intimidation aspect was not given proper consideration. Nor were the family poverty consequences of the benefit penalties considered. If a woman is deemed not to have co-operated, she can lose £8·80 per week from her income support for six months and a further £4·40 per week for the next 12 months. That can push a woman and her family below the poverty line, so both her welfare and that of her child or children may be jeopardised. The House did not give the Bill the scrutiny that it deserved.

There is no advantage to pursuing a maintenance claim for the majority of the 70 per cent. of single mothers on income support because any maintenance would be set off against their income support. Many of those women would not receive an extra penny, yet they would confront a panoply of threats and risks. The operational guidelines will discourage genuine income claims from many women.

Intimidation by DSS or Child Support Agency officers, however well they have been trained, will inevitably occur. The woman could be "locked up" in a DSS office, perhaps with her child, until she gives the required information. Under the guidelines, she can be pursued at her home or at work until she provides that information. She may be at home and without any support while the interview is conducted. She may be asked intimate questions about her sex life that she does not want to answer. She may be told that she has no good reason for refusing to give information, even if she fears that to do so might have violent consequences for her and her children. She can also be threatened with the benefit cuts to which I referred earlier. Women in that situation must take on the new role of informers to the DSS part of the police state that is being established in that respect.

The message to women with children on benefits is that they cannot be independent—they must disclose information about themselves and about the father of their children, or they will lose a substantial proportion of their benefit.

The guidelines place a woman and her child or children at personal risk. The Child Support Agency leaves women in the lurch and accepts no responsibilty for the consequences of a woman disclosing information that the agency requires. Under the application of the "Requirement to Co-operate Policy Guidelines", which were recently published, the parent with care—PWC—must show good cause for refusing to co-operate, or she will lose benefit. Even if she fears that making such a disclosure is against her own best interests, she must do so. The guidelines give many examples of women being forced to disclose.

The beginning of the guidelines refers to a parent not having to give the information if she will suffer "harm or undue distress" as a result. That seems reasonable, but no technical definition of harm or undue distress is given: a good deal of discretion is given to the Child Support Agency and the DSS officer concerned.

The guidelines give the dictionary definition of harm—

"to hurt, injure or damage"— and of undue distress—

"excessive, unjustifiable or disproportionate strain, pressure, anguish or pain".

What the guidelines do not mention is the woman's fear of those experiences. That is an unsatisfactory start: the guidelines do not provide the necessary get-out for the woman who could become a victim if she discloses information about the father of her child.

The guidelines give the DSS the opportunity to "doorstep" a woman at her home, perhaps to snoop on her —that has happened in the past—or even to knock on the door of her place of work. Paragraph 7 states:

"several important points . . . should be borne in mind"—

I shall return to that phrase—

"the welfare of any children living with the PWC must be considered."

That is not a factor that would allow a woman not to disclose if the children's welfare would be damaged; it need only be "borne in mind" by the DSS officer. In many ways it is a meaningless guideline and the DSS is likely to go ahead and cut the benefit anyway if it so chooses.

Paragraph 7 states that

"the PWC has a right to be believed unless what she says is inherently contradictory or implausible".

Implausible to whom? To the DSS officer. If he takes a hard line, the phrase "borne in mind" will not fit the bill.

There is another interesting aspect of paragraph 7, which states:

"a reduced benefit direction is a strong sanction and will have an important impact on the income of a PWC".

In the context of paragraph 7, that is a threat: a DSS officer can say, "I am going to impose this sanction to make you give the information."

The paragraph also states that such reductions should not feature in any benefit savings statistics. That is disingenuous: over time, pressure could still be imposed for cutting benefits. The Government have published league tables in every other area; they may do the same in this regard, thus putting pressure on DSS officers to cut benefit.

If the woman fails to complete and return the form she will be penalised. She will be deemed to have refused to co-operate. Paragraph 12 says that the Child Support Agency is supposed to help a woman who does not want to fill in the form—for reasons connected with her own safety—to obtain maintenance. That is a lie, for 70 per cent. of women will obtain no extra maintenance. That money goes to the Treasury. Women will see through that deception.

The paragraph also says that the absent parent will not be given the woman's address by the DSS officer, or even information about the town where she lives. That would be a welcome statement, if it were true. In most circumstances, however, the absent parent will know the woman's address. I have already asked why the Child Support Agency does not pick up the consequences of its actions. It does not offer any support to women who want to be rehoused if they have been forced to give this information. In the majority of cases, the absent parent is likely to know the address. The Child Support Agency does not help the woman to find safe housing when her address is known to the absent parent.

The paragraph goes on to state that the payment of maintenance does not give the absent parent the right to contact the child. What help is there with legal fees in those circumstances? The social fund does not make it a priority for the DSS to obtain an injunction against the absent parent to prevent him from gaining access, if that is what the woman wants. The Child Support Agency washes its hands, even though that is the consequence of what it forces upon women in a number of cases.

In addition, the paragraph states that the mother may want more flexibility in her life and that maintenance will help her to get it. In the majority of cases, that is a laughable statement. If a single mother is on income support, any maintenance is matched by a cut in her benefit. There is no flexibility for her. The extra money goes to the Treasury.

Paragraph 13 states that if a woman still refuses to co-operate, despite knowing of the help that she can obtain from the Child Support Agency, consideration will need to be given to whether the parent with care and/or any children living with her will be at risk of harm or undue distress. Again, that sounds all right, but it could be interpreted as the DSS saying to the woman, "You're not a proper mother. You haven't co-operated." My reading of that paragraph is that the kids could end up going into care. Co-operation with the Child Support Agency is regarded in the guidelines as more important than a woman's perception of the harm or damage that might be done to her or her children. That is not satisfactory.

According to paragraph 14 of the guidelines, there will be no definitive list of circumstances. Each case will be taken as it comes. That could lead to considerable inconsistency in deciding who must disclose and who does not have to disclose. A woman in one area may have to disclose, whereas a woman in exactly similar circumstances in another area may not.

The guidelines deal also with the question of fear of violence. In this regard, there is the matter of the victims of sexual abuse, including rape and incest, resulting in the birth of a child. Pressure is put on the woman to name the father, even in those serious and fearful circumstances. Again the Child Support Agency washes its hands of the consequences, saying that they are a matter for the police and that it will not reveal the woman's address. That might well be ludicrous, for obvious reasons. In such circumstances the Child Support Agency makes absolutely no commitment to provide safe housing—another appalling fault. Paragraph 18 says that, although cases must be handled with extreme care, the information must be obtained. It must be obtained despite the woman's fears.

Paragraph 19 provides that it is for the officer of the Child Support Agency, not for the woman, to determine whether there is a risk of harm or undue distress. What will be the level of an officer making such decisions? I expect that it is likely to be a relatively low level on the administrative scale, yet the officer will have enormous discretion in cases of considerable sensitivity.

Paragraphs 20 to 24 relate to an absent parent who may want to see his child. Paragraph 20 deals with the fear that if the absent parent is required to pay maintenance he will demand to see the child, even if that is considered to be disruptive. The woman may wish to sever all links with the absent parent. These are very good reasons for not having to provide information, but it is not recognised in the guidelines. The guidelines state that maintenance is entirely separate from access. They also state that many parents with care and absent parents "are known to link the two but it is important to stress that both the parents are responsible for maintaining the child subject to their financial circumstances."

In other words, it is admitted that parents link the two issues. That is right, because, in many cases, if the absent parent pays maintenance, he will demand access and thus come back into the woman's life, which could cause great problems for her. In any event, that will be her fear.

Once again, the Child Support Agency washes its hands of the matter. There is no comment on what happens if the woman's fears are realised and the father demands access. The guidelines contain no help for the woman or child whose lives might be disrupted. They take no account of the possible consequences of its demands.

Paragraph 22 states:

"A belief that an approach to an AP would result in demand for contact should not, on its own, normally be sufficient to enable a PWC to succeed in a claim that harm or undue distress" would be caused. Again, the guidelines ride roughshod over the mother's fears. It is for the courts, or someone else, to take up the issue of access, but there is no help for the woman to get a court injunction. She will get nothing from the social fund in those circumstances. Often, it will be too late for her to go to court because the damage will have been done.

Paragraph 23 states:

"The PWC's wish to sever links with the AP should not normally provide grounds for her to succeed in a claim of harm or undue distress. There would normally need to be additional factors" for that to be the case. The wishes of the parent with care are being overridden by the DSS, with the result that she must make a disclosure.

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

Paragraph 24 states that PWCs

"may refuse to co-operate because it could cause them or their children undue distress to re-open any degree of contact after a lengthy period."

In that case, additional factors would be required for the case to be made. Paragraphs 22 to 24 reveal that the Child Support Agency could not care less about the children's best interests.

Paragraph 26 is interesting. It states:

"Sometimes, a PWC will wish to protect an AP . . . because he is living in a stable relationship with someone else', but the guidelines do not care about that. The paragraph continues:

"It would be unusual for this situation to justify a claim that co-operating would cause undue distress".

even though it might be a genuine reason for not making a disclosure. Why should a state agency disrupt a stable relationship in another family?

The same paragraph also states:

"The PWC should be reminded that the CSA will act as a buffer between her and the AP and that . . . contact with the AP will be on a confidential basis."

A lot of women will not believe that that will necessarily happen. There is no guarantee of confidentiality, and the CSA is not liable if it breaks that guideline. That is not satisfactory.

Paragraph 27 is about parents who are juveniles—that is, parents who are either under 16 or, although over 16, are still classed as children for income support purposes. They do not have to disclose who the absent parent is, but they will have to do so as soon as they put in their own claim for income support, when they become 16 or when they leave school, so they could well face threats and intimidation along the lines of, "Disclose the parent now, because you will have to tell us when you are 16 anyway." So juvenile mothers could be put under great duress.

Paragraphs 29 and 30 refer to those who may face criminal prosecution. Again, juveniles may be involved. One or other of the parents may have been under age, so there could be a prosecution. Paragraph 29 says:

"Other than in the most exceptional circumstances"— which it does not explain—

"information obtained by the Child Support Agency will not be passed to the police."

Again, there is no guarantee of that. A lot of DSS information is passed to the police, via a telephone call from police officers to the DSS office, for example. Many parents will not believe that the information will not be passed on and that prosecution will not result.

Paragraph 30 says:

"it is unlikely that these circumstances"—— that is, the fear of being prosecuted—

"on their own, will be sufficient to justify a refusal to co-operate."

Again, people are being forced to co-operate on pain of losing their benefit.

Paragraph 31 is about artificial insemination. There has been extensive correspondence, in which the Minister has been involved, on that subject in The Guardian. I shall not go into detail about that, but perhaps the Minister will comment on it, because he remarks in his letters to the newspaper have provoked further correspondence saying that people who have had artificial insemination still have to name the father.

Paragraph 31 also says that the former husband may have to pay maintenance. That is incredible. The former husband may have opposed the artificial insemination, or it may have taken place after the relationship had broken down. Yet he will still be pursued for maintenance. That is most unsatisfactory.

Paragraph 35 is concerned with cases in which the parent with care wanted the child but the absent parent did not. The guidelines say that, regardless of those circumstances, the absent parent still has to pay. That could be unfair in many cases. For instance, there could have been deception. There is an argument that it would be unfair for the father to have to pay in such a case.

Single women, and their freedom of choice to have a child, are the real target of the guidelines.

If a single woman—perhaps a lesbian—wants to have a child, but does not want to name the father, she will be forced to go with someone anonymous so that she cannot provide a name. That is forcing that woman into something even more immoral and denying her freedom of choice. Again, that is not acceptable.

Paragraph 40 refers to voluntary arrangements under which the parent with care may not wish to co-operate because she considers that she already has a satisfactory arrangement with the absent parent and does not wish to disturb it. According to the paragraph, she should co-operate. The disturbance of a voluntary agreement would not on its own be sufficient to justify a claim of harm or undue distress. Again, the woman will be forced to go against what she considers her own best interests.

Paragraph 41 deals with a parent with care who is mentally ill or handicapped. That might prevent her from understanding what was required, so that she might seem unco-operative. Officials are advised to treat her with patience and sensitivity because she may have given as much information as she could. The clear implication is that the DSS will still force a mentally ill or handicapped parent with care to provide the name of the father. At least, the paragraph is ambiguous and could be interpreted in that way by a hardliner in the Child Support Agency.

What about the woman who has had more than one lover around the time of conception? What will the agency do in those circumstances? Will the woman be forced to name one, both or more? Will the agency pursue the alleged absent parent and inform him that the woman slept with more than one man at the time? What will be the moral code in dealing with such cases? If either side wants DNA testing to establish the father's identity, will the agency wash its hands of the test and tell the person to pay for it if he is rich enough, or will it just label him as the parent? The Minister should answer that point. That will affect the father, but again the woman will be the victim: the DSS will be judgmental because she has had more than one lover at the time of conception. She will probably be deemed not to have co-operated and will therefore lose her benefit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) wants to know what will happen in cases where there is a variation in the maintenance which has already been agreed by the courts. According to her constituents, already the courts are telling people that they will not deal with the matter and that it is being referred to the new agency. What is happening? Is the agency usurping the role of the courts? That is a fair point.

There is the matter of a clean break. I shall read a passage from a recent issue of The Big Issue:

"One of the more disturbing aspects of the New Act . . . is its retrospective powers. Over the past 20 years the divorce courts have favoured the clean-break principle. To guarantee a roof over the child's head, and ensure the mother was entitled to state benefits, the courts encouraged and, in many cases, ordered men to agree to clean breaks.

Usually this involved the man moving out of the matrimonial home and giving up his equity in it as an alternative to paying maintenance. These couples who made a clean break settlement will now have their agreements torn up by the CSA."

An article in The Guardian of 19 January says that the alternative will be exacerbated tension and wrangling over access, despite the fact that the clean-break principle was agreed. It interferes with the woman's right if she wants a clean break. The court was the final adjudicator on the matter, yet it will not be: the Child Support Agency will have the role retrospectively. It is forcing the woman to have economic dependency on a partner who is perhaps long gone from the relationship.

I shall say a word about men in such circumstances. They may have acquired the responsibility of a new family which will be disregarded in many respects by the Child Support Agency. Such men may be on income support or students with a loan, small grant or low wage which will be reduced. They may find themselves below the poverty level.

I quote a case referred to in the same issue of The Big Issue:

"Rob, 37, lives in Sheffield. He left his wife, Lynn, three years ago. Since then he has paid no formal maintenance.

As part of a clean break agreement he moved out of the house, took on the family debts and agreed to share the care of his two daughters, who now split their time between their two parents' homes. In return he was given one third of the equity of the house and awarded a nominal maintenance order . . . Everyone thought the matter was settled.

But Lynn is now on Income Support. 'Already' Rod says, 'the DSS has intimidated her into giving them my address. My understanding is that any money taken from me will reduce Lynn's benefits. At the same time it will reduce the amount of money I have to spend on my children.'

Rod is unmoved by the suggestion that the taxpayer is supporting his children. 'I'm a taxpayer myself. I'm on low income and I pay tax at the single person's rate. I also spend money on my children. The Government has a responsibility to ensure that people do not fall below a minimum standard, children included.

The effect of the Act will be to make my children worse off. I'll do all I can to resist the Child Support Agency—not because I refuse to look after my children's interests, but because I want to look after them.'"

That situation could be repeated in a number of circumstances.

The Child Support Agency and the guidelines to which I referred extensively could have some bad consequences for a large number of men, women and children. They could even result in violence as the bitterness which has long since been buried brought back to the surface. If that happens under the guidelines, the Child Support Agency will wash its hands of the consequences. That is immoral. The Government should re-examine the legislation, which in the next century may well be regarded as Dickensian.

7.28 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): First, I apologise to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) for being a moment late arriving for the debate. I congratulate him on securing the last Adjournment debate of the night, and I am pleased to have an opportunity to respond to him.

The hon. Member and I know each other extremely well. I fully appreciate the sincerity with which he put his case. I hope that he will accept that I have the same degree of sincerity. I am worried about exactly the same people about whom he is worried. But I feel that the hon. Gentleman's fears are overblown. I hope to demonstrate to him in the next half hour or so that we have considered those fears carefully, and that they are met by the workings of the agency.

I begin by setting the Child Support Agency in context. The new agency is unique among the next steps agencies which have been set up by the Government, because it builds a new service from scratch. The service will create a new system for the assessment, collection and payment of child maintenance. The service will not only be available for those who usually come to the Department of Social Security and the Benefits Agency—those who receive benefits. It will also take over the role of the courts in assessing and enforcing maintenance for all parents who wish to take advantage of the new arrangements.

The aims of the agency are to deliver on behalf of children a consistent, effective and efficient service for the assessment, collection and payment of child maintenance. In addition, the agency aims to help parents with the care of children to make informed choices about whether to take up employment.

To achieve those aims, the agency's objectives are to implement the Child Support Act 1991 under agreed plans for the phased take-on of clients and ensure that maintenance assessments are accurate and payments are regular; to provide a service to clients which is accessible, courteous, prompt, fair and efficient, and seen by them as such; to provide clear and accurate information to clients and the public about the child support system and the services and benefits available to clients who are in work; to establish and maintain an effective working relationship with the courts, advice agencies and other organisations with an interest in the agency's business; to contribute to the Department's evaluation and development of policy and ensure that the agency can respond to change; and to make the most efficient and effective use of available resources.

The hon. Member began by saying that the purpose of the Child Support Act 1991 was not necessarily to benefit children but to benefit the taxpayer. In the case of those on income support, the broad principle behind the Child Support Act is that all parents have an obligation to maintain their children. A child has the right to be maintained by each of its parents financially, if the parents can afford to do so and no matter what the relationship between the parents has become.

The interest of the taxpayers is that, although all taxpayers would like to assist children when they need help and no other help is available, most taxpayers feel that, when the parents can meet an obligation to their children, they should do so. As the hon. Gentleman said, many taxpayers are low paid. They have their own families to look after. It surely cannot be wrong, then, that, if the obligation towards a child can properly be met by the parent, it should be. If the money that is taken from the father is used to reduce the income support pound for pound, others are relieved of a burden which they should not have.

[Mr. Alistair Burt]

I also remind the hon. Gentleman that family credit —the "in work" benefit—has a £15 a week maintenance disregard, so there is an encouragement for a woman to go back to work. We recognise, as the hon. Gentleman will, that the majority of lone parents do not wish or intend to stay on income support for ever. Most lone parents want to get back into work. As their children become older, obviously it becomes easier for them to return to work.

Establishing maintenance in the first place is an important part of that process. Even if at first the woman receives no immediate benefit by way of an increase in the amount of money received, should she go back into work, the maintenance will provide an extra source of income. As time goes on, having that maintenance right established and being paid will add to a woman's options. The hon. Member will agree that we want women to have the maximum range of choice in circumstances such as he has described. I feel that that choice is extended by establishing maintenance at an early stage and maintaining it throughout the child's life. That is one of the purposes of the Act, so even if some women do not see an immediate benefit to themselves financially, the benefit can accrue in the medium and longer term, and can be a real and genuine benefit.

The hon. Gentleman spent some time dealing with the guidelines for the requirement to co-operate, which I fully understand. I will come to those in some detail as time goes on, but I should like to start with some general remarks about the requirement to co-operate and why it is there; and also place it in the context of some of the remarks that he made at the beginning of this debate about the way in which Opposition Front-Bench Members had dealt with the matters throughout.

It is not the first time, as the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, that the requirement to co-operate has been raised, either with me or with my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Social Security. I am, however, absolutely clear that the agency has put procedures in place to ensure that the policy of the Government is delivered, and that the policy is that the requirement to co-operate which applies to certain people receiving benefits will be waived if there are reasonable grounds for believing that there will be a risk of the parent with care or any child living with her suffering harm or undue distress as a result of authorising the Secretary of State to take action.

The hon. Gentleman questioned the need for the requirement to co-operate. I do not believe that that view is sustainable under any reasonable scrutiny. We have made it plain, and the hon. Gentleman accepts, as do his Front-Bench Members, that both parents are responsible for the financial support of their children.

During the consideration in Committee of the Child Support (Miscellaneous Amendment) Regulations 1993 on 17 March, the Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) said:

"the Labour Opposition support strongly the principle of the Child Support Act of forcing financial responsibility on the absent parents".—[Official Report, Third Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c., 17 March 1993; c. 7.]

In another place, on 25 March, Baroness Hollis, took the same line in general, recognising that

"both parents, have an obligation to maintain children and that when husbands walk away from wives, or when wives walk away from husbands, they do not also walk away from their children".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 March 1993; Vol. 544, c. 500.]

I do not believe that these general statements of support for the policy would bear any examination whatsoever if there were not some requirement on a parent with care to co-operate with the agency in seeking maintenance. If that were not the case, surely the hon. Gentleman would concede that those would just be hollow words. If it were possible for either parent, solely at his or her wish, to walk away from their obligations to their children merely because of a change in relationship between them, there would be a danger that the child would miss out. There has to be some consideration of sanction in order to give those general words of support any meaning.

I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that that form of sanction was very clearly designed in the Act, but it was precisely because we sought to explain to hon. Members throughout the House the way in which we would deal with that sanction and the sort of things that we would take into account that the Act attracted such all-party understanding and support.

Much of what the hon. Gentleman said this morning questioned the basis of the way in which we intend to apply those guidelines and deal with this difficult issue of the requirement to co-operate, but in his remarks he really did seek to present a classic worst case scenario at every step. I put it to him that we have taken sufficient care and concern to ensure that that should not happen.

I believe that it was precisely because of the intentions that we explained to the House during the passage of the Bill that it received all-party support. I do not think that it is now right for hon. Gentlemen to seek to suggest that they did not raise too much of a fuss about it because they did not know how it would work. If the words about the responsibilty of parents were really meant, they were meant with an understanding that there would have to be some consideration of sanctions should there not be co-operation with the agency.

I believe that the general welcome was given because hon. Members understood how we intended to apply the legislation. I now wish to turn to that in seeking to help the hon. Gentleman this morning. He wondered whether officers would be given sufficient training to enable them to interpret the guidelines correctly. I can assure him that staff conducting interviews will have been thoroughly trained not only in the correct procedures to follow, but in how to conduct the interview.

Great care and attention has been paid to preparing the agency's staff to deal sensitively and sympathetically with the situations. All staff who meet the public will receive training in specialist interviewing skills developed and delivered with the help of Relate, which has substantial experience of interviewing people in sensitive situations.

I am quite satisfied that the way in which we have approached training has been with the understanding in mind that women in the most sensitive and difficult circumstances may be approached. That is precisely why officers have been trained extremely carefully.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that a woman might be interviewed alone, and he used the phrase "locked in a DSS office". I am sure that he will concede that that is not my intention or that of anyone involved in the agency. I can assure him, first, that any woman who so wishes can be accompanied to an interview, and need never be alone in those circumstances. Secondly, there is no question of anyone being locked in the DSS office to complete the giving of information.

The work that we have completed on the requirement to co-operate has been carried out with the assistance of the National Council for One-Parent Families and the Child Poverty Action Group. I pay tribute to Sue Slipman and Fran Bennett, who have been extremely helpful. I do not suggest in any way that either organisation has agreed with the Government on every jot or tittle of the legislation, but they have understood what we were trying to do and how we have been trying to make our procedures as fair and resonable as possible. They have helped us immeasurably in looking at the forms, the guidelines and the statement that women would receive before interview informing them of their rights. They have been reassured of our intentions at every stage, just as the House was previously reassured.

The steps we have taken demonstrate the intentions behind the legislation. The training undertaken with Relate is part of that process, designed to reassure on the way that we handle the work.

The hon. Gentleman also suggested that the reduced benefit direction may be given at the whim of an officer in the Child Support Agency. That will not be the case. It may reassure him if I detail the steps before any reduced benefit direction might be taken.

If a parent or a parent's partner claims benefit or is in receipt of benefit, a maintenance application form will be sent out by the Benefits Agency or the Child Support Agency for completion. With that initial form requiring that an application for child maintenance should proceed, the accompanying letter includes the following provision:

"Under child support law you are required to apply for child support maintenance and to provide information to allow us to recover child support maintenance, unless doing so would put either you or any children living with you at risk of suffering harm or undue distress. If you believe you have good reasons on these grounds not to apply for child support maintenance, please let us know."

At the first step, a parent is informed that if she is in difficult circumstances we are there to assist.

The help notes that accompany that letter, under the section headed, "Absent parent's details" state clearly:

"You will not be required to fill in this form if there is a risk of harm or undue distress occurring to you, or any children living with you, as a result of your providing information about the other parent, or authorising the Secretary of State to seek maintenance for you."

If we had not been genuine in our intentions concerning the legislation, and if it had been a large cost-saving exercise, surely the warnings would not have been published. Those warnings are included because we understand the circumstances with which we are dealing. We wish to make it clear that, if there is any problem of the manner described by the hon. Gentleman, consideration will be given to our waiving the right to co-operate and pursue maintenance.

When the maintenance application form is returned with the absent parent details uncompleted or incomplete —or if it is not returned—a parent with care will be asked to attend an interview or will be visited at home or, if necessary, at work. The hon. Gentleman suggested that that was a form of pursuance—not so. It gives the woman maximum opportunity to be seen where she wants to be seen so that the matters can be discussed.

If, at that stage, a parent with care shows good cause why she should withhold details of the absent parent—because she has satisfied an officer that there is a reasonable chance of harm or undue distress—no further action will be taken. If she fails to show good reason why she should withhold details of the absent parent or fails to attend for interview, a letter is sent on behalf of the Secretary of State to tell her that she has not shown good reason for failing to co-operate. The parent then has six weeks in which to consider her position and make further representations to us.

If, at the end of those six weeks, the parent with care has either not co-operated or failed to show good reason, the case is referred to a child support officer, who considers all the details afresh. That officer will then write again to the parent with care and give a further 14 days in which to comply with the requirement to co-operate or give good reasons for not doing so.

After that 14-day period, if, after careful consideration, a child support officer is satisfied that there is no reason to waive the requirement to co-operative, that officer may then issue a reduced benefit direction and send a copy to the parent with care. The hon. Gentleman wondered whether, at that stage, the officer would consider the welfare of the child. Regard to the welfare of the child can be considered even at that stage—even if no co-operation with the agency has been forthcoming, and the ability to issue a reduced benefit direction has come into play. The reduced benefit direction can be stopped even at that stage if an officer considers that the welfare of the child will be adversely affected. Once the reduced benefit direction has been applied, a further appeal process is still allowed.

There is a lengthy period during which a parent's case would be considered by a number of different people before any consideration were given to a reduced benefit direction. At each stage, there would be time for a parent with care to consider her position, and advice would be open to her, from her own sources and elsewhere, on whether it would be right for her to proceed in the way in which she should.

I must make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that more than adequate cover is provided in a situation in which a woman might be unclear or unsure in any way. No sudden, out-of-the-blue, reduction of benefit will be announced. Before that step is taken, a variety of opportunities offer the chance to consider what course of conduct has been followed and why co-operation with the agency is the better step.

I should like to go through the guidelines that we have issued, in the same manner as the hon. Gentleman did. He wondered why we had not spelt out even more clearly the details relating to harm or undue distress, and why we left it at the dictionary definition. We have done so precisely because we do not wish to exclude any circumstance from our consideration.

If we try to provide an exhaustive list of examples and to define too tightly the term "harm or undue distress", there is a danger that we might miss some circumstances in which harm or undue distress is caused to parents who come before us. We made the definition as wide as possible because we wanted to leave all the options open to ensure that officers would be able to consider all the cases on an individual basis.

[Mr. Alistair Burt]

The sequence of events that I have just set out is detailed in the guidelines, which we have published. We made them available precisely because we wanted those who advised women to know what the precise circumstances would be. We have tried to be as open as possible in dealing with the circumstances. Paragraph 5 sets out in detail the way in which an application will be treated. It shows that we want the agency to act with good intent.

Paragraph 6 clearly sets out the opportunities of appeal. A woman need be under no fear that a sudden reduced benefit direction will come upon her with no warning, leaving her with no opportunity to do anything about it. The hon. Gentleman said that several important parts of paragraph 7 should be "borne in mind". That phrase means exactly what it says—the issues are to be in officers' minds at all times as they deal with people who come before the agency. The welfare of any children must be considered. The parent with care has a right to be believed unless what she says is inherently contradictory or improbable.

A reduced benefit direction is a strong sanction and will have an important impact on the income of a parent with care. It is very much a last resort, not something that will come quickly to an officer's mind. It is there to remind him of the impact of a benefit directive. As the hon. Gentleman said, the guidelines state.

"a reduced benefit direction should not be counted in any benefit saving statistics."

That section was designed deliberately to provide a reassurance that the benefit direction will not be included in any targets.

We are caught in a cleft stick—if we had not included such a provision in the guidelines, the hon. Gentleman would have asked, "What about the savings that will be made under the scheme? The Government will try to ensure that plenty of women are placed in that position so that savings can be made." In order to make it clear that that is not our intention, and will not be the case, we have included that passage in the guidelines. Once we have done so, the hon. Gentleman picks on it as one of the reasons for the measure, so we cannot win.

All that I can do is to ask the hon. Gentleman to accept my assurance—as I know he will—that we will not make any savings, which are not the point of the measure and will not be included in any targets. We set out the points to be borne in mind as we wanted to show what officers should consider when they are talking to parents with care who may have difficulties.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to paragraph 12, which deals with the fact that a number of matters must be made clear to the parent with care. It states that the Child Support Agency "exists to help her obtain maintenance".

I have dealt with the issue of income support. A parent with care who said that there was nothing in the measure for her would be told that there is. We ask her to consider not just short-term, but medium and long-term, factors. We ask her to consider what she will want to do when the children are older and at school. If she wants to return to work, maintenance will help her. Acquiring maintenance at an early stage will open up her options for the future.

The guidelines state:

"she need not see the absent parent", which is absolutely right. The Child Support Agency operates as a buffer if a woman does not want to have any contact with the absent parent. While I recognise that there will be a number of circumstances in which her address will be known, there will be occasions when she will have moved away and will not want any contact, but will still feel that a man has an obligation to maintain her child. We make it clear that, in those circumstances, we act for her. We can collect the maintenance from the other parent and deal with the administration; the money will be paid to us and then paid to the woman. We can reassure her that she will not have to have contact with the absent parent if she does not want to see him.

The next part of the paragraph states that the absent parent will not be given her address or even information about the town in which she lives, which is absolutely right. The system that we have devised ensures that all correspondence goes out not from individual Benefit Agency offices in towns up and down the country but only from six regional centres. That means that an absent parent who may be looking for his former partner in circumstances in which she does not wish him to find her cannot even discern from the address of the letter from the Child Support Agency where she might be. We have tried to cover that as well. Everything in paragraph 12 is designed to enable an officer to tell a woman the sort of points that we have considered on her behalf, and that is why it is there.

Then we go into the circumstances that we have detailed in paragraph 13 and beyond, setting out some examples. In it, we stress our understanding of the difficult nature of some of the interviews and some of the situations in which we find women. We say:

"The interview to discuss this must be handled with care and sensitivity—many PWCs will be genuinely distressed about having to discuss the circumstances surrounding a former relationship. It will, however, be necessary to obtain enough information to enable a decision to be made about the case."

That is it in a nutshell. That is the point between us.

The gist of the hon. Gentleman's argument was that he feels that in some circumstances, there should be almost automatic right of non-disclosure and, providing that certain words are used by a woman, that will automatically ensure that no further steps are taken. I cannot think that that is the correct way to proceed, or that it would be a positive step. The guidelines show flexibility in implementing the policy sensitively.

It would not be useful to have a list of good grounds after which no discussion could take place. That could lead to problems by spelling out just what an absent parent might need to do, or say, or threaten to do, just to avoid maintenance. That is why we feel that it is better to leave it as we do, setting out clearly how we feel about harm and undue distress, and saying how officers will be trained. I hope that that shows the hon. Gentleman that we feel that an automatic right is not correct.

In setting out the circumstances afterwards, all that I ask the hon. Gentleman and others to do is to use their plain common sense about obvious circumstances that, when information is presented to officers, will enable them to act straightforwardly and say that there is no doubt that there is good cause why they should not pursue maintenance on the woman's behalf, and will not do so. I am clear that, in the vast majority of cases that come before officers, they will be able to make that judgment, sensitively and correctly.

In the paragraphs after that, we detail some examples. The list is not designed to be exhaustive because we do not wish to exclude anything. I ask any reasonable person reading the guidelines to draw the inference that these are circumstances in which officers will act with consideration and sensitivity and where anyone given a reasonable presentation of the facts will respond by saying, "That is enough. This need go no further. No problem. We shall not be pursuing maintenance in the circumstances that you describe." That is what we have tried to set out.

The minimum number of questions will be asked to enable officers to reach a decision that tells them that those grounds have been satisfied. There is no desire to be over-intrusive. All that officers need to do is simply to establish that the requirement behind the Act has been satisfied, and that reasonable cause has been shown. In the varying circumstances that have been brought to us, a judgment will be made in each case as to how much information is provided. It will depend entirely on the circumstances.

We deliberately try to cover many aspects in paragraph 41. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the mentally ill or handicapped. I appeal to his common sense and obvious decency. He must understand that an officer will be in a position to judge in such a case just how much information that person will be able to give and at what stage he or she will be able to say that there is no need to go any further.

We must remember that an interview is not necessary in all cases. If sufficient information is provided in the form in the first place to enable the officer to form the judgment that there will be no question of pursuing maintenance because reasonable grounds have already been established, then some interviews may not need to take place. I suggest that, when dealing with the mentally ill or the handicapped, all the officers will be able to decide at what stage any questioning should ease because there is no need to pursue it. That is not designed to imply that officers or the agency will press or harass the mentally ill or the handicapped to pursue maintenance for our purposes.

There are other circumstances that are described in the paragraphs that the hon. Gentleman went through, but the same general principles apply. As for access and contact, the position is, as the hon. Gentleman is aware—

It being Eight o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, pursuant to Order [26 March].

Animal Aunts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

8 am

Mr. Iain Sproat (Harwich): I am grateful for the opportunity at this early hour in the morning to raise the important subject of the treatment of Animal Aunts by the Department of Social Security. I shall start by explaining what the firm does. If a family has a pet or pets, whether dogs, cats, fish, a pony or whatever, and the family goes on holiday, Animal Aunts arranges for an animal carer to go to the family's home and to stay there while it is on holiday to look after the animal or animals and the house.

The firm was set up in 1987 under an enterprise allowance scheme. It obviously found a valuable niche in the market because it has prospered greatly. The aunts or uncles are placed in all parts of the country. When a family contacts the firm and says, "We would like someone to look after our animals while we are away on holiday", the aunt travels to the family's home and stays there while it is away. She is paid by the family, not by Animal Aunts. Over the six years or so since the firm began, it has found about 10,000 clients and it has about 300 animal carers. As I have said, it arranges for them to go to the homes of the clients to look after their pets. The firm provides a useful social service.

What does the Department of Social Security want to do? After six years of the firm's existence, the Department has decided that it believes that the animal carers are not self-employed, although that was the basis on which the firm was set up. As I have said, it was established under an enterprise allowance scheme with the full co-operation of the Department of Employment. For six years the Inland Revenue has agreed that the carers are self-employed. Customs and Excise has similarly agreed that that is the position. The Department of Employment set it up initially, it being the structure of the business plan that the carers should be self-employed. And so they have been for six years. Only then does the Department of Social Security say, "No, we believe that under the 1978 regulations dealing with the categorisation of earnings, the carers should be employed. We shall say to Animal Aunts, 'You must pay us the relevant national insurance contributions.'" I understand that the Department is asking Animal Aunts to pay those contributions from 1990 to the present day.

The results will be disastrous. The firm will go out of business and the 300-odd carers will lose their jobs. Everything that the Government are trying to build up, and have successfully built up under the enterprise allowance scheme, will be destroyed. It is a classic example. It is astonishing—almost not to be believed—that a Conservative Government, having set the firm up under an enterprise allowance scheme, should then decide to destroy it. The Department is seeking to destroy that company at a time when there are 3 million unemployed, we are emerging from the longest and deepest recession that almost anybody can remember, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has just launched a campaign to get rid of burdens on business and has instructed my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to make one Minister responsible for deregulation.

My hon. Friend the Minister may say, "There is nothing that we can do. That is the law, and we must obey the law." But it is not the law; it is an interpretation by my hon. Friend's Department of a regulation—and in my view, it is a false interpretation. Presumably I am supported in that view by the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise, and the Department of Employment—who for six years have gone along with the idea of animal carers being self-employed persons.

[Mr. Iain Sproat]

Time does not allow for close textual analysis of the relevant statutory instrument, the Social Security (Categorisation of Earners) Regulations 1978, but I draw the attention of my hon. Friend to schedule 1, part I. As is so often the case with regulations, the regulations are written in such a complicated way and have so many overlapping qualifications that although it is easy to find one part which appears to support one's argument, it is equally easy to find another part which does not.

Paragraph 2 of column (A) of the regulations obviously applies, as it uses the words

"where the person employed is supplied by or through some third person".

However, that is preceded by wording stating that the employee

"is under obligation to render personal service and is subject to supervision, direction or control, or to the right of supervision, direction or control, as to the manner of the rendering of such a service".

Clearly, that does not apply. An Animal Aunt is in my home at this moment, as I speak—and I have no control over that person. I only say, "I have six dogs. Look after them using your professional knowledge, in the way that you think best."

I have no supervision and am not physically present. I have no control over that person. My right of direction is exercised only in so far as I say, "Look after these animals."

Nor does the firm of Animal Aunts, which is even further removed from my house, have any supervision or control. The interpretation of my hon. Friend's Department is therefore wrong.

Even if there were some doubt, I would want it exercised as a principle by all Departments throughout Whitehall that where there is any doubt about the applicability of a regulation, the benefit of that doubt shall go to the side of the argument that is producing the jobs and the wealth creation—not the other way around, as my hon. Friend's Department seek to do in this case.

If doubt existed, presumably the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise would not have agreed that animal carers are self-employed and the Department of Employment would not have helped to establish the firm in the first place under the enterprise allowance scheme. Self-employment was the basis of the company's structure. We would not still be arguing the case six years on if doubt did not exist.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, there is a parallel case. Let us suppose that a farmer goes on holiday, requiring a stockman or herdsman to look after the stock while he is away. That stockman or herdsman is rightly regarded as self-employed, but he is doing exactly the same job for animals outside as most animal carers do for animals inside—although animal carers also look after outside animals if they have to. There is another element of doubt: the herdsman or stockman has agreed to be self-employed, yet for some reason, after six years my hon. Friend's Department is saying that animal carers should not be regarded as self-employed.

There is a difference between the relationship between the agency Animal Aunts and animal carers, and a normal employer-employee relationship. In the former case there is no discipline and grievance procedure, no provision for notice, and no regular or assured hours of work. Animal Aunts, for example, is allowed to arrange for a substitute if an "animal aunt"—for instance, the one whom I had arranged to look after my dogs—is unable to turn up. The arrangement would not be made by the agency. The "animal aunt" whom I had hired and who could not turn up would pay the other one personally; payment would not be made by the agency.

These "aunts"—it is a ludicrous name—are in business on their own account. There is a financial risk; in fact, a case is in progress now. An aunt who looked after some pets in Scotland was not paid by the family. In such cases, the aunt does not go back to the agency and say, "I want my money"; she—or he—must get the money from the family for whom the work was done. Aunts also pay their own insurance. In one case—there are a number of others—an animal under the control of an aunt got out of control and bit a teenager. The teenager sued the aunt, not the agency.

There is no doubt in my mind, at any rate, that these people are self-employed. But even if my hon. Friend does not agree with my opinion, she cannot deny that there is doubt about the matter. I think it extraordinary that she should seek to exercise her judgment on that doubt against a company which creates jobs and wealth.

My hon. Friend's Department has displayed some of the most objectionable aspects of bureaucracy in its handling of the matter. First, it has shown an extraordinary combination of dilatoriness with a ferocious persistence in hounding the firm. My hon. Friend made a noise when I used the word "dilatoriness". I have a letter here: its authors took five and a half months to answer a letter from the lawyer acting for Animal Aunts. On 28 August 1990, they wrote—I speak from memory—"Thank you for your letter of 13 March. I am sorry we have not replied earlier." They did not explain why they had not done so. The firm had to hire accountants and lawyers and fire off letters; the Department of Social Security did not even bother to reply and then did not explain why it had not done so, but it still goes on hounding the firm.

The matter has been dragging on for six years. I think it intolerable that a Government Department should hound a firm for so long without resolving the problem: it has had to come to the Floor of the House because of the Department's threats. The letters are so carelessly written that, even after two years, there are fundamental mistakes. I have one letter in which the writer—a civil servant in my hon. Friend's Department—says that of course Animal Aunts are paid by the agency. That is a fundamental misunderstanding of the matter, even after two years of investigation.

Is my hon. Friend happy that an official in her Department, or the Contributions Agency, can decide to attack this firm? What can the firm do then? It can refer the case to an inquiry. But the inquiry is not an adjudicative one; it is only investigative. The inquiry therefore looks at the original decision made by an official in my hon. Friend's Department. It then goes back to her Department and another official in her Department decides whether to uphold or overturn the original decision of an official in her Department. In other words, the Department is judge and jury in its own case. That must be wrong.

I tried to get statistics from my hon. Friend regarding the percentage of cases in which the Department had ever overturned decisions. As far as I could gather, in 85 per cent. of cases the Department, perhaps not surprisingly, had reinforced the original decision. I do not think that that is the right way to judge a case upon which somebody's livelihood depends.

As for the huge expense incurred, this firm amounts, really, to just two or three women somewhere in Hampshire. They had to hire lawyers and accountants. They instructed a barrister to represent them at the inquiry. I understand that they have spent thousands of pounds, just this year alone, on fending off the attacks of my hon. Friend's Department.

After I had set out much the same complaints as I have made in this debate, my hon. Friend wrote me a letter of some 1,000 words. I had said in my letter to her that she was about to destroy 250 to 300 jobs and to put a firm out of business. My hon. Friend's 1,000-word letter in reply contains not a single word about the loss of jobs, the worry and hassle for the business, the expense to the firm, or the firm being made to close down. No attempt was made even to answer the argument I put to her about the parallel between the relief stockman and the animal carers. Although there was not a single word about all that, my hon. Friend devoted a whole paragraph to saying that her officials were doing very well and that I must not attack them for hounding this company.

That is the sort of insensitivity and crass behaviour that infuriates businesses and individuals and which the Prime Minister is trying to sort out by means of the deregulation campaign. This is important for Animal Aunts, but it is also important as a signal to the outside world that people can take seriously what we are trying to do about removing burdens from business. I hope that my hon. Friend can give me some comfort on both grounds.

8.17 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat) for providing an opportunity for me to respond to the points that he has somewhat vehemently raised in the case of the firm of Animal Aunts, and also for the opportunity this gives me to say something about the importance that I attach generally to the correct determination under the law of individuals' employment status for national insurance, while at the same time seeking to ensure that the mechanisms for doing so are not unduly bureaucratic or burdensome.

This case is all about whether pet and animal sitters —or "aunts", as they are called—supplied by the firm Animal Aunts are to be treated as self-employed earners responsible for their own national insurance contributions or, as my hon. Friend vigorously contends, are to be treated as employed earners for national insurance purposes, with the firm of Animal Aunts being liable to pay full class 1 contributions on their behalf.

Class 1 national insurance contributions are, of course, the most widely paid class of contribution, paid by virtually everyone in a job and by office holders, such as company directors or, indeed, Members of Parliament. Well over a million employers regularly deduct and pay over these contributions to the tune of nearly £40 billion per year. It is virtually part of our culture to pay these contributions. If anything, attention often focuses on instances in which employers fail to meet their obligations to pay contributions in respect of their employees. We have seen, for instance, reports by the Comptroller and Auditor General pinpointing certain shortcomings in the contribution collection system, and it is to the public credit of my Department's Contributions Agency that it is addressing these with vigour, and is meeting or exceeding the various high-level targets that are published.

In saying that, I seek not to undermine my hon. Friend's stance in the Animal Aunts case, but simply to place it in context. I should also like to remind the House of the purpose of national insurance contributions, which are at the very centre of this debate.

Unlike taxes, which are raised by the Crown with the consent of Parliament, to provide moneys for the general purposes of government, the national insurance system is entirely separate, providing pensions for the retired and short-term contributory benefits for those who are sick or unemployed. These benefits are covered by the national insurance fund, which is directly financed by the contributions of employers and people in employment. As its name denotes, the national insurance fund is an insurance fund over which the Secretary of State has powers of control and management. Entitlement to benefits from the fund depends upon the amount and class of contributions paid.

There is an important distinction here. Employed earners who have paid full class 1 contributions are entitled to the full range of contributory benefits. However, the class 2 contributions paid by self-employed persons do not earn entitlement to unemployment benefit or to SERPS. Moreover, self-employed persons who suffer an accident at work cannot qualify for disablement benefits under the industrial injuries scheme, so it is very important from the individual contributor's point of view that he or she be correctly categorised for national insurance purposes. We have heard much about the interests of the firm, but we need to consider also the interests of individuals and the benefits that may or may not accrue according to which contributions they pay.

Indeed, a considerable number of disputes arise from cases where workers have been treated as self-employed persons, suffered an accident at work and then found that they are not entitled to benefits under the industrial injuries scheme. Of course, in the vast majority of cases it is abundantly clear which is the correct class of contribution due: usually a person is either working clearly under contract of service to an employer or is on business on his own account, and therefore an independent contractor.

However, the Government are conscious that there are grey areas, and, picking up the deregulation point that my hon. Friend made, we have sought to make it as easy as possible for people to get authoritative advice on their status. Thus, in each tax and social security office one person is responsible for all inquiries and decisions about employment status. Anyone in work can get a written decision on their employment status from either the Inland Revenue or the DSS. My Department and the Inland Revenue have got together to produce a joint leaflet giving extra guidance.

[Miss Ann Widdecombe]

I will come later to the special position of employment agencies, but, while on the subject of deregulation, I should just like to mention my Department's employers panel, with whom we consult regularly on a wide range of issues. The next meeting of the panel is to be on 25 May 1993. Sub-groups of the main panel meet on specific issues, and small businesses are represented on the panel. Arising from our commitment to the Government's deregulation initiative, we are eliminating, from this April, some annoying differences in definitions of earnings and expenses between tax and national insurance.

I have described in some detail the general provisions that govern employment status, but there is a particular provision that is relevant to this case. It deals with the special circumstances of employment agencies that supply workers to third parties. By way of further background, the House should be aware that the special provisions embodied in the Social Security (Categorisation of Earners) Regulations exist with the aim of achieving parity of treatment for workers under the social security scheme.

Thus, for example, a relief typist or secretary supplied by an agency and working alongside other office workers under similar conditions is treated as an employed earner for the purposes of national insurance by virtue of the regulations, notwithstanding that she would otherwise be a self-employed earner, because she is not under a contract of service to either the agency or client firm.

Following a query from one of the "aunts" late in 1987, my Department made detailed inquiries into the terms of engagements and eventually concluded late in 1989 that the provisions of the regulations to which I have referred were satisfied, and that the aunts should be treated as employed earners for national insurance purposes.

I should like to say a little about the Contributions Agency's conclusions. Regulations 2(1) and (2) of the Social Security (Categorisation of Earners) Regulations provide for persons to be treated as employed earners in respect of any employment falling within column A of part 1 of schedule 1 provided the person is not within the exceptions specified in the corresponding paragraph of column B.

It was concluded that the aunts fell within paragraph 2 of column A, but that the exceptions in column B did not apply. In particular, one condition that had to be satisfied was that there was no on-going financial interest on the part of the third person. However, under the terms of the contract with the client, Animal Aunts collects further fees if an engagement is extended or renewed at a later date, and therefore maintains an on-going financial interest in the employment. Subject to the ruling being operated by the firm, the Department agreed not to pursue the question of arrears at that time.

Rulings of this sort are administrative in nature and carry no force in law. However, there is the right to have the question formally determined by the Secretary of State, as provided by section 17 of the Social Security Administation Act 1992. The Secretary of State's function is to determine a question raised by a contributor. There is no provision for the Department to raise any question itself, or to participate in the proceedings as an interested party.

The jurisdiction is not to adjudicate in a dispute between the contributor and the Department, but to investigate afresh all the facts relevant to the question and to reach a conclusion as to its appropriate determination in the light of all the relevant facts and applicable law.

In carrying out those functions, the Secretary of State has power to appoint a person to hold an inquiry into the question and report to him. Such inquiries are inquisitorial and form part of the process of determination. The possibility of a formal determination in the Animal Aunts case was quickly mentioned in ensuring correspondence between the Department and the firm's accountants, but the correspondence became somewhat protracted as the accountants queried the application of the regulations and the Department responded.

Far from hounding the firm as my hon. Friend has suggested, I think that it would be right to say that the Department took considerable time and trouble to examine every representation made on the matter, but finally remained of the view that the facts did not allow another conclusion to be reached. It was more than two years later that the firm eventually applied for the matter to be formally determined last May. Further delays took place, but the inquiry was held last month, and I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the inquirer's report and recommendation have been received, and it was possible for the formal decision to be given yesterday. This has been dispatched to Animal Aunts and will, I hope, arrive in the first post this morning, but I have pleasure in informing the House that the "aunts" who were the subject of the application have been found not to be included, or treated as included, in the category of employed earner for the purposes of social security Acts——

Mr. Sproat: Hear, hear.

Miss Widdecombe: ——and, on that announcement, I am pleased to hear the first kind words in this debate from my hon. Friend. In other words, the Secretary of State found in favour of Animal Aunts. If I may say so, I think that that is particularly significant, given my hon. Friend's concern about the independence of the decision-making process when the Secretary of State might be held by some to be judge in his own cause.

It is not uncommon for the Secretary of State to overturn the Department's view. The "improvement" rate —as it is called—by the Secretary of State, for instance in 1991-92, was such that 36 per cent. of employment status decisions resulted in the Department's view being overturned. That is a very much higher percentage than my hon. Friend suggested.

My hon. Friend made the point that where there is reasonable doubt about the applicability of a regulation, the benefit of that doubt should be in favour of the side that creates or preserves jobs and profitability. There are wider issues here which it would not be appropriate for me to try to answer, but I do think that if one were making such a proposition then an equally strong argument could be made for giving the benefit of the doubt in such a way as would protect the benefit rights of the individuals concerned.

Finally, I pay tribute not only to my hon. Friend's enthusiasm in pursuing the Animal Aunts case so vigorously, but also to the entrepreneurial spirit of its proprietor. Let there be no doubt about that: the last thing my Department wants to do is to harass small businesses.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Eight o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 2 April 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Iraq

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

9.34 am

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): We have started our debate, as we always do, with Prayers, and as I said the Lord's Prayer this morning, the words, "deliver us from evil" struck hard in my heart because it is an evil upon which I ask the House to concentrate.

May I match that Christian prayer with the cry that is on the lips of the marsh Arabs and which echoes Allah's words revealed in the Koran 1500 years ago:

"He is Allah most gracious: we have believed in Him, and on Him we have put our trust, so soon will you know which of us it is that is in manifest error. Say, 'See you? If your stream be some morning lost . . . who can then supply you with clear flowing water?'"

The House has been kind to me in allowing me time for debate over the two years during which I have been working for the people of Iraq, and especially for the people of southern Iraq. It is their needs on which I ask the Minister to concentrate. I shall compare them a little with the needs of northern Iraq, which are large. Today I want to focus upon the forgotten people, the marsh Arabs, the Ma'dan, and the people who are sheltering in those marshes with them. In all, there are about 600,000 people.

The debate is timely, because it takes place in the wake of a special meeting that the Foreign Secretary and subsequently the Prime Minister held with the Iraqi National Congress. The Minister of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who is here for the debate, was also present. I should like to put on the record the keynote points that the delegation representing Iraqis from the north, the centre and the south through membership of the new Iraqi National Congress, which is fully representative of all the opposition bodies, raised with the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary on 30 March.

First, they called for a new United Nations Security Council resolution to enact resolution 688. Secondly, they asked for the full implementation of resolution 688, and they asked the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary to concentrate on discussing methods of reversing the current repressive measures instituted by Saddam's regime.

Thirdly, they asked for the removal of the extensive and ecologically destructive activities of the regime in the marshes, such as on the dams and drainage channels. I shall return to that. Fourthly, they asked for the removal of the economic blockage against Iraqi Kurdistan in the north, especially the denial of petroleum products, without which people there cannot keep warm. They also asked for the cessation of arbitrary executions in Baghdad, the release of all political prisoners and the return of the hundreds of thousands of Iraqi deportees to their homes all over Iraq.

Manifestly, these last two right and proper requests are beyond us in the House just now, but the extension of the no-fly zones to include all of Iraq is a possibility. More important would be the adoption by the Security Council of the recommendation of the special rapporteur on human rights in Iraq to place human rights monitors all over Iraq. In the wake of that, the delegation requested a security zone, a safe haven, in southern Iraq. Finally, they asked for a war crimes trial for Saddam Hussein himself.

I know of the sympathetic hearing and the deep understanding which the Foreign Secretary, the Prime Minister, the Minister of State and Foreign Office officials extended to the Iraqi National Congress at the meeting. This morning gives me an opportunity to put on record in Hansard some of the reasons that lie behind the congress's requests. They are the sufferings of the people in the marshes; the destruction of a wonderful historic part of the world that can never be re-created; and the problems that face the United Nations in its legal tangle, which seemingly prohibits it from helping the Arabs who are locked into the marshes and facing destruction by Saddam Hussein's forces.

A little while ago, by courtesy of Iran, I and my colleagues in Tehran and in the south of Iran managed to arrange a 10-day visit by a very brave journalist from The Observer—its senior foreign reporter, Shyam Bhatia. His report was published in five pages of The Observer five days ago. Last week, the paper allowed me to describe my thoughts in an article. The situation is truly desperate. Most days, I get information from the marshes by fax, and sometimes by telephone, too. The people there report that things are terrible.

The work that I have been carrying out has been to do with organising medical and food aid, so the medical needs of the area land on my desk each week. As I wrote in The Observer on Sunday, cholera has now started in the marshes—a terrible death, which we have not known in the west for many years. Hardly any food is available because of the blockade by Government forces. Skin and gut infections, diarrhoea, typhoid fever, food poisoning, eye diseases, conjunctivitis, gynaecological and pelvic inflammatory diseases, dental and gum diseases and sunstroke—all these are taking their toll. I have been in the marshes when the temperature exceeded 50 deg C, and there is no shelter, giving rise to sunstroke. All these diseases are widespread and largely untreated.

Polluted water is all there is to drink. Last autumn, it appeared that Saddam Hussein was poisoning the waters, but knowledgeable people, scientists, tell me that it is not necessary to poison the marsh waters. Just draining them is enough; the water level becomes so low that the salts and acids in the water become concentrated, and that poisons the people. There is nowhere to put sewage, human or animal, so everyone I know in the marhes has constant dysentery. Children cannot be immunised; there is no cold chain of refrigeration to get the vaccines in, so there are no vaccines in the marshes. Polio, measles, whooping cough, mumps and other childhood diseases are rampant. The children are stunted because breast milk is in short supply owing to severe maternal malnutrition. Without even the most primitive obstetric services, mothers just die in labour.

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

On top of all this, there is constant military bombardment. The famine has been caused not just by natural factors or a lack of water; we are talking about a planned destruction of a people and of their wonderful environment. Now that the marshes have dried out, it is easy to use incendiary bombs. In January, February and March, telegrams from the marshes to me described villages, people and animals being burnt to death. The rice farms that supplied the staple diet for the marsh Arabs have been burnt out. The fish have died—they used to provide protein—and the water buffalo have just fled because of the bombardments.

The marshes are losing water fast. I do not know whether the latest suggestion by two American senators would be useful—bombing the dams to release the Tigris and the Euphrates again.

We are talking about an historic area. The House Library contains a book called "Ancient Iraq", written by Charles Roux and first published in 1964. Updated in 1992, it has gone through four reprints. It reminds us of the history of this part of Iraq, going right back to the Sumerians 6,000 years ago. After them came the Akkadians, and the Assyrians, and so we can recall the waters of Babylon, beside which people sat down and wept. Echos of the Old Testament are to be heard throughout the history of the Iraqi marshes, that unique part of the world where the Tigris and Euphrates have provided the great flow of water which has given these people a way of life.

I know that the Ma'dan pre-date the Arab invasion of Iraq. They are a unique and historic people. Their antique language pre-dates Arabic, which differs from it significantly.

This area contains a great deal of special wildlife. Hon. Members will recall Gavin Maxwell's wonderful book, "Ring of Bright Water", which was about an otter. Few will recall, however, that the otter, Mijbil, was discovered in and brought back from the marshes of Iraq. It was a unique variety of otter, common in the marsh areas. It is called lutrogale perspicillata maxwelli. It was a previously unknown species. The area also contains wild boar, various kinds of terrapin, some rare and threatened species of bird, such as the pigmy cormorant, dalmatian pelicans, marbled teal, red-breasted geese, lesser white-fronted geese, white-tailed and imperial eagles, Bara reed warblers, Iraqi babblers and grey hypercolius. Some of these birds are there all the year round and are specific to the area.

We should look at the marshes of Iraq as a wetland of unique importance. It is half the size of Switzerland, and it has survived for a long time as an area rich in all kinds of fish, some of which are probably unique to it. The world conservation monitoring centre recently declared the marshes of Iraq a site of primary ecological interest.

As the House knows, I have been describing the sufferings of the people in Iraq for nearly two years. If I turn now to the destruction of this wonderful environmental area, it is not because I have any less concern for the sufferings of the people—the more I visit, the more I learn, the more appalled I am by how harsh their suffering has become. But the world tends to say that these are just another group of suffering people—what can we do about them? So perhaps if we ask the world to think about the ecological impact, those who write letters about the destruction of the rain forest will bend their minds and hearts to the destruction of an area replicated nowhere else in the world and now being physically destroyed.

Last week, I received a fax from Ayatollah al-Hakim in Tehran. He told me of yet another new dam keeping the waters away from the marshes. In the west, we have become so used to reacting to television programmes and pictures that we may have forgotten to use our imaginations. Perhaps our imaginations are no longer vivid enough to understand the impact of this drainage on a people's heritage—a drainage so profound and so disgraceful that this land, above water for the first time in history, is becoming completely visible.

Saddam Hussein says that this drainage, which he now admits is happening, is for agricultural purposes, but scientists tell me that the land is of such poor quality that it will not sustain even one meagre harvest. It is not the sort of land that can create the wealth that will feed people; it is not land on which subsequent harvests will flourish. There will be just one meagre harvest and then no more.

In desperation, the Amar appeal, of which I am chairman, is conducting a major survey of the marshes. It will be spearheaded by the chairman of the wetlands committee of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature, of which the United Kingdom and most member states of the United Nations are members. It is an unusual body, as it covers private organisations such as the World Wild Fund for Nature.

What will the survey consider, and why is it so critical? We will examine the evidence for recent changes in hydrology and other environmental conditions in the marshlands complex of southern Iraq. We will describe the environmental, ecological and human conditions before the hydrological modification and other changes in environmental character. We will assess the effects of hydrological and other environmental conditions in terms of changes to the flow regime, water quality, soil, vegetation and land use, fisheries and the habitat for wildlife, especially for endangered, rare and threatened species.

We will then evaluate the likely impacts of the changes on the maintenance of the ecological character and environmental quality, on the character of agriculture in the region and on human communities within the region, with particular reference to food security, the local economy, transport, health and social welfare, culture, education and amenity. We will look at human communities outside the region, with particular reference to environmental impacts, resource implications and heritage values, and will make recommendations for restoration and rehabilitation, where appropriate, of the ecological and environmental integrity of the area.

We will also look at more human aspects, such as education, and we hope to match the ecological side of the report, which will be spearheaded by Dr. Ed Maltby of Exeter university, to whom I have already referred, with a report that will be conducted under Professor David Morley, the immediate past head of the Institute of Child Health. His chapters will be buttressed by those on education.

It is vital that we carry out this work. The Iraqi environmental protection group, headed by Sayeed Jayfar and Ibrahim Uloom, pulled together and published in January this year all the known material on the destruction of the marshes and the drainage projects, and it makes disheartening reading. I know that, because the Security Council held a special meeting for me in December, as I told this place in January, where I was able to show all the captured maps showing the irrigation and its consequences. But since then, nothing has been done, so we have asked the International Union for Nature Conservation —that great body—whether it will conduct the survey under its umbrella, and it is considering doing so.

At the moment, the director-general says that the Amar appeal is an inappropriate body to ask it to do so. I have, therefore, asked our Government and the Governments of the United States and Holland to apply, but, most important, two days ago, through the good offices of the president, Prince Philip, I was able to contact the World Wildlife Fund International in Geneva, where I found a home for this thinking—the director, Claude Martin, who was interested and who understood at once.

It seems that ecologists and environmentalists have been watching and waiting for a trigger that would enable them to act. Their concern is shared by us, and it matches the concern of the Amar appeal friends and supporters about the human aspect of the matter. I am very hopeful that the survey will provide those in authority throughout the world with the material that they may care to use to stop the destruction of the marshes and of the people in the marshes.

We believe that the study is an important matter. Meanwhile, as it proceeds—it has begun even though nobody has invited us to do so, because the scientists recognise the need for haste—the people die. This week, therefore, I met Dr. James Grant, the executive director of UNICEF, and 10 days ago I went to New York and saw Mr. Eliasson, the Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations, and begged for their help. I learned that the United Nations is not prepared to act. Resolution 688 covers the entirety of Iraq, and the member nation that proposed it, France, was firm and fierce in wording it, yet the United Nations has turned away from considering the marshes of Iraq and has thus condemned 600,000 people to certain death.

It is not just the starvation, illness or the lack of water which will result in human and wildlife extinction. Access routes run along the top of the dykes, which means that not only Land-Rovers but tanks can drive into the heart of the marshes. There is currently a brief cessation, because late March and early April always bring floods. Those floods are now hardly coming into the marshes, because the dykes have stopped the rivers, but none the less there is a little water. We believe that, when that water ceases, as it will in April and May, the killing fields will begin in earnest. The people inside are not armed to defend themselves. The ones whom I have seen on my own trips have just carried old rifles and few bullets.

I want to read only the last paragraph of a letter that I received yesterday from Mr. Eliasson from New York. He kindly says that it was a pleasure to meet me and that he admires my work, but that is not the point. He says:

> "As I explained in New York, the United Nations, in the present situation, is not in a position to assist directly in support of your concrete programmes."

That means no aid for the marshes, as we are the only people who are giving aid. He goes on:

> "I have, however, taken careful note of the proposed study of the marshes and will be consulting with my colleagues as to what we can do in this regard. The subject certainly deserves increased attention by potentially interested parties."

I know that the United Nations is the servant of its members, and that it is up to us to decide what we want to do. There is no shortage of material. The special rapporteur for human rights in Iraq, the former Foreign Minister of the Netherlands, delivered his report on 19 February. It made terrible reading. On 5 March, members voted on it and proposed a resolution, which was good. It was adopted by a vote of 46 for, one against and 16 abstentions. Again, they stated their deep concern about the grave violations of human rights by the Government of Iraq and said that these have led to a deterioration of the situation of the civilian population in southern Iraq, particularly in the southern marshes.

The motion states that the members express their > "strong condemnation of the massive violations of human rights, of the gravest nature, for which the Government of Iraq is responsible, resulting in an all-pervasive order of repression and oppression which is sustained by broad-based discrimination and widespread terror, in particular:

>
> Summary and arbitrary executions, orchestrated mass executions and mass graves throughout Iraq, extrajudicial killings, including political killings, in particular in the northern region of Iraq, in southern Shiah centres and in the southern marsh area;
>
> The widespread routine practice of systematic torture in its most cruel forms;
>
> Enforced or involuntary disappearances, routinely practised arbitrary arrests and detention, including of women, the elderly and children and consistent and routine failure to respect due process and the rule of law;
>
> Suppression of freedom of thought, expression and association and violations of property rights;
>
> The unwillingness of the Government of Iraq to honour its responsibilities in respect of the economic rights of the population."

The motion goes on and on and on. It requests the Secretary-General

> "to take the necessary measures in order to send human rights monitors to such locations as would facilitate improved information flows and assessment and would help in the independent verification of reports on the situation of human rights within Iraq."

Knowledge, knowledge and more knowledge is what we are asked to provide. I am happy to give the United Nations the knowledge that it is not gaining for itself from the marshes. However, while the knowledge flows, people are dying and no aid will be given to the marshes in case that jeopardises the northern aid or creates other political tensions. The toehold in Basra recently achieved by UNICEF is the Deputy Secretary-General's sop to Cerberus. The marshes are surely the hell beyond the jaws of Cerberus.

I will end with a thought that came to me as I listened to Ayatollah Al-Hakim in Tehran. At the end of a meeting at 3 am, we were all very tired. I had just come from a four-hour meeting with a wonderful man—an Iranian appointed by the President of Iran to take responsibility for all Iran's relationships within Iraq—Mr. Agamohamadi. He was a former Member of Parliament before he was appointed by the President to his new task. He is a large ray of light on the horizon. He spent a month inside Iraq during the uprising under the care of Mr. Talabani. He saw the horrors. Some of the things he told me were indeed horrific. He said that we had seen nothing yet.

Mr. Agamohamadi went there and brought out some of the people who had been injured by the chemical bombs in the attack. He saw thousands of people being killed, running here and there, not knowing what to do or where to go. He saw many mothers killed with their babies held to their chests. He saw families of five or six killed together. He saw all that with his own eyes. He said that if a person opposes Saddam's regime today, all his family will be in danger and under threat. It is impossible to calculate the number of missing people, because the number is unlimited. That short statement encapsulates the reason for my four-hour meeting with Mr. Agamohamadi.

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

Later, I spoke to Ayatollah Al-Hakim about that meeting. It was very late, and somehow his attention was drawn back to the early 1980s, when he was captured and imprisoned. He was placed in a deep cell with no light. It was damp and he had no water or food. He was taken out only to be tortured. He was tortured ferociously for weeks on end and after each torture session thrown back into the cell. The man who was in the cell before him had gone completely mad. Ayatollah Al-Hakim held on, and he said nothing. In the end, his torturers gave up on him after three months. They said that he must have had something rather curious wrong with him which meant that his flesh could not feel pain. He had not cried once, but their perception was not true: he felt it all.

After Ayatollah Al-Hakim had told me this, he turned to Sheik Mahmoodi and said, "I don't know why I'm talking like this. Sheik Mahmoodi had a much worse time than me." Sheik Mahmoodi told me what had happened to him and then said, "But that is little compared to what some people went through."

As we spoke, 300 people were entering Tehran from Iraq. They had been released from prison, which was astonishing. They had served 10, 11 or 12 years—we must remember that Saddam Hussein took control in 1979. Later in the week, they began to die because, as they left prison, they had been given thallium injections. To have hope dashed so cruelly is unbelievable.

I say to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister, to the House and to anyone who will listen that this is a tyrant whose evil is unbelievable. If we fail to help, what right have we to say the Lord's Prayer, to seek delivery from evil for ourselves, so readily and happily each day? What right have we to look the Iraqi victims in the eye?

10.5 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am very glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) has chosen the issue of south Iraq to feature in this Adjournment debate. She has rightly characterised the regime of Saddam Hussein as evil. As she has made so clear, the conditions in Iraq generally, and the conditions in south Iraq in particular, are dire and are brought about, at least in part, by the deliberate policy of an evil man.

My hon. Friend has visited the area frequently and she probably knows more about it than anyone else in the House. Her contribution to the relief of suffering in south Iraq has been very great. I am glad that she welcomed our meeting with representatives of the Iraqi National Congress. I met them, but, more important, so did my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister.

We very much welcomed the statements of the Iraqi National Congress to the effect that it looks forward to the introduction of a democratic and pluralistic system of government in Iraq and, more important perhaps, that it believes that Iraq should exist within her current frontiers and that the problems of minorities such as the Kurds in north Iraq should be addressed by way of autonomy rather than by creating an independent Kurdistan. We strongly supported that approach. I was glad that the Iraqi National Congress made it plain to us that it was not seeking the creation of an independent Kurdistan.

My hon. Friend has spoken about Iraq in general and about south Iraq in particular. It would be helpful if I were first to outline the general nature of our policy and then consider south Iraq.

In setting our general policy towards Iraq, we are governed by three major considerations: first, that Iraq should not be in a position to threaten the security and stability of the region; secondly, that Iraq must respect the sovereignty of Kuwait; and thirdly, that we must do what we can to bring an end to the repression by Saddam Hussein of the peoples of Iraq.

Those three general propositions are reflected in the detail of the Security Council resolutions. As my hon. Friend has made plain, there has been substantial non-compliance with the particular mandatory terms of the resolution. It may be helpful if I remind the House of the respects in which Saddam Hussein has fallen short of what is asked of him.

To start with, with regard to the frontier with Kuwait, Saddam Hussein has failed to participate in the last four meetings of the boundary demarcation commission. Police posts on Kuwaiti territory were removed only under pressure and there have been repeated statements by Iraqi officials implying that Kuwait is part of Iraq.

I now turn to the question of mass destruction. Iraq has not accepted Security Council resolution 707 or provided for final and complete disclosure of all aspects of weapons of mass destruction. It has not accepted Security Council resolution 715 or agreed to the long-term monitoring of its weapons of mass destruction. Saddam Hussein has not complied with the resolutions on the return of detainees from Kuwait. Perhaps most important of all—this is the issue on which my hon. Friend dwelt—he has continued his policy of repression. Repression continues in southern Iraq. The internal embargo of the three northern Governments also continues. There is a complete denial of human rights throughout Iraq.

For those reasons and others, the Security Council has decided to continue with the policy of sanctions, and it will continue to do so for as long as we are justified in that policy by non-compliance with relevant resolutions. It is untrue to suggest that there has been any softening in the policy of western or coalition powers towards Iraq. We are determined to ensure compliance with all the relevant terms of the resolutions.

Much has been said about the condition of Iraqis in general. The condition of the Iraqi people is serious. However, it is important to remind the House that it is serious because of the deliberate policy of Saddam Hussein. The sanctions regime does not impose a prohibition on the importation of either food or medicines, and there is a provision for the approval of other humanitarian requirements. Many people say that the Iraqis do not have the money to pay for food and medicines. That is because Saddam Hussein has not agreed to the procedure laid down under Security Council resolutions 706 and 712. He is entitled to sell oil to the value of US $1·6 billion from which there will be moneys available to purchase food and medicines if that is what he chooses to do. For political reasons, he has determined not to agree to the procedures laid down under those resolutions and, to that extent, he is wholly responsible for the plight of his own population.

I now turn specifically to south Iraq. My hon. Friend has highlighted in graphic terms the situation in the marshes and the abuse to which Saddam Hussein is subjecting the people of south Iraq as a deliberate policy. I accept the broad picture that she draws. There is a grave infringement of human rights. It is not entirely right to say that western and coalition powers or the United Nations have entirely disregarded what is going on.

Most dramatically, we have established a no-fly zone in which we participate. The object of the zone is to prevent Iraqi aircraft from being used in attacks against the population of south Iraq. That has been successful to the limited extent possible, in the sense that Iraqi aircraft no longer participate in attacks on people in south Iraq generally or in the marshes, and they cannot assist ground forces to that end. I make it plain that the coalition countries will not accept any interference by Iraq with the overflight of coalition aircraft over the marshes, and that a right of self-defence exists.

I also accept that the no-fly zone is not a total solution to the problem. Substantial Iraqi ground forces are involved in the marshes and the no-fly zone does not prevent their military action. The question that arises is whether we would be able or willing to create a safe haven in the way in which a safe haven was created in north Iraq. The answer to that is no, although I do not say that with any pleasure. There are substantial deployments of Iraqi troops in south Iraq and it is not plausible to suppose that they would voluntarily leave that area. If they left the area, it could be only as a result of the deployment of substantial coalition military power, probably ground forces. I cannot say to the House that the United Nations can do that.

That being so, we have to rely on the humanitarian policies of the United Nations and of other agencies. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to the organisation with which she works, which has been by far the most active in the area. The memorandum of understanding negotiated by the United Nations is, we hope, being rolled forward and it will cover a further year. We hope very much that the United Nations will be able to establish a presence in south Iraq. I accept that the contribution made by that policy is not sufficient to meet the grave needs in south Iraq. I know that I have come to the end of the allotted time, so, although there is much more that I should say, I must end. I do so by congratulating my hon. Friend, first, on highlighting the issue and, secondly, on her personal contribution.

Mid Cheshire Hospital Trust

10.16 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The maintenance of free speech is the basis of everything we do in the House, and the use of Adjournment debates or debates generally to raise matters that are of great concern to our constituents is strongly cherished by hon. Members, especially with the growing habit of Ministers creating agencies or commercial units that remove responsibilities from them to a third party on the basis of a commercial interest.

When the national health service trusts were set up, many of us warned that the theory that one could bring about a major change in health care without first explaining and exploring the ways in which it could be done would lead to a considerable set of problems. I am sorry to say—I make it clear that I take no pleasure in this—that in my constituency, the Mid Cheshire hospital trust, which was one of the first trusts to be set up, has proved conclusively that, far from working, as the Secretary of State delights in telling us, national health service trusts are now running into considerable problems. The problems are becoming obvious to patients and to their families, and they are also having direct effects on health care.

When the Mid Cheshire trust was set up, the then Secretary of State for Health sent me a warm and reassuring letter. It is important to quote his words exactly:

"that establishment of a Trust will give clear benefits and improved quality of service to patients; that management has the skills and capacity—including strong, effective leadership, sufficient financial and personal management expertise and adequate information systems—to run the unit effectively; that senior professional staff, especially consultants, are involved in the management of the unit; that the Trust will be financially viable."

I should make it clear that that letter was written not by the present Secretary of State, but by the male who preceded her. The style of English does not change although Secretaries of State may change from time to time

I was then told:

"I am now writing to tell you that I have decided to establish The Mid Cheshire Hospitals as an NHS Trust, to become operational from 1 April 1991."

It is important to understand that Leighton hospital, which was the centre of the Mid Cheshire hospital trust, has consistently been underfunded. Physically, it is at the bottom of the Mersey region and, before the creation of the trust, it never received sufficient cash to deal with the real health care problems of the Crewe and Nantwich area.

When the move towards a trust was mooted, I asked general practitioners in the area whether they foresaw any great inward movement of patients which would somehow transform the trust's financial situation, having been assured that that was what was intended. Unfortunately, far from the hospital suddenly becoming magically viable—even with the extra sums of money donated by the region to set up the political stalking horse—although more patients were certainly treated, there was an overspend every year, and we are now approaching the second major crisis.

Initially—I suspect because it was an election year—it was somehow possible for the region to find an extra sum of money to assist the Mid Cheshire trust last year when it had financial difficulties. We all knew what was happening; we knew that the trust was overspent and was madly trying to take money from its reserves and from other sources to try to balance the books. The executives were not especially secretive about it, although I received large numbers of reassuring letters telling me that they could not understand why I did not trust their financial doings, and that they were dealing with the problems more than adequately.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

The chief executive wrote to me on 20 March 1992:

"You will be pleased to know that the Trust will meet all its financial obligations at the end of the financial year, including a virtual break-even position against budget. This is a result of the tight financial management of the Trust's affairs, which has prevented the potential for financial problems which was identified earlier in the financial year."

Anyone who deals with that district hospital knows that, whatever else is happening, the standard of health care is becoming a matter of considerable worry. That is due not to members of staff but to difficulties in specific areas. First, there is a problem with closed wards. Whatever the Department of Health says, the reality is that, before the trust was created, wards were open and, after its creation, a number of wards were closed. Before the trust was created, we had full use of all the wards; now, several are only partially used.

I am perfectly happy for the Minister to tell me that that is because we are so much more efficient; we wheel people in and out with such speed that they do not need wards or beds. That is a medical argument which can be defended in general medical terms, but the increasing evidence that this year we have reached a financial crunch cannot be defended.

Not for the first time, the trust is badly overspent; it is £2 million short of the amount required. It has held a number of talks with the regions and with other financial controllers within the NHS, according to evidence given to me by the Minister. The trust was then told that it must rapidly find £700,000—there was some suggestion that it was required to find it within two weeks. It could only meet that enormous overspend by shutting down facilities and beginning to sack staff, which has happened. That makes nonsense of all the information that has been handed out officially by the Mid Cheshire hospitals.

My constituents have found that there is enormous pressure on hospital services. The staff have had considerable and constant worries about their jobs. Although we were told that front-line staff would not go, there were already instances of re-evaluation—a nice word for moving people around—of nurses' jobs, which meant that many had lost their existing status and been moved to other jobs.

During the year, I received a number of statements, such as that the trust must carry over to subsequent financial years any over or underspending against its budget. I was also told that the likely outturn for Mid Cheshire hospital trust would be in the range of £100,000 either side of a break-even position against the budget. Frankly, that has not been our experience.

As a result, when the chief executive asked the regional hospital authority for extra money he was told, somewhat sharply, that it would not be forthcoming. I can only assume that his naivety had not made it clear to him that the money made available at the time of the general election will not be made available when there are four years to go before the Government have to put their health policies to the test of the local populace.

The role of the regional hospital authority ought to be considered in great detail. There is no independent way for the actions of anyone within the national health service to be monitored properly. Luckily, there are forms of monitoring for the care given by medical professionals. If we are to believe the Conservative Government's theories, the running of trusts ought to be transparent, but they are far from clear.

Within our region, the chairman, Sir Donald Wilson, has taken some major decisions, which have led to considerable questioning from elected members. He decided, with his colleagues, that it would be a good idea if the regional hospital trust authority bought a very expensive flat and furnished it, because it would somehow save money when visiting firemen needed to be put up for the night. I want to see the figures on which such decisions were based before deciding that they were sensible financial decisions. That example demonstrates the level of management in the regional hospital authority.

When the continuing underfunding of Crewe became clear, it was obvious that the regional health authority had decided that one way to solve the difficulty would be by amalgamating the Crewe district, which was underfunded, with the Macclesfield district, which in theory was overfunded—if that is possible. It therefore began to moot the question of a reorganisation. It was not merely a reorganisation. When the authority advertised the jobs concerned, there was such a poor response that the young lady drawing up the short list suddenly decided, after the closing date, to put her name on the list. She was appointed to the job—I am sure that it was on the basis of her brilliance.

In case there are any doubts about the reasons for mooting the reorganisation, a consultation document—a laughable title—was produced entitled, "A new district health authority for the people of Crewe and Macclesfield." That gave the game away. It said:

"Crewe District Health Authority is presently £8·1 million short of its full weighted capitation position"— that refers to the new form of calculation that the Department intends to use—

"and is moving towards its target as resources are allocated each year. Macclesfield District Health Authority is £5·4 million above its weighted capitation and must therefore lose this amount over future years."

In other words, the region's answer is not to examine the needs of Crewe district health authority but to say, "If we jam these two awkward health authorities together, we can somehow balance the books at the end of three or four years, because no one will notice that what we are doing is taking money from Macclesfield and losing it in Crewe."

Not surprisingly, that news did not delight the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) or me. One might have thought, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that combination of hon. Members would be designed to make even the present Health Minister think twice, but apparently we are having no effect whatever. So impressed are Ministers with the quality of management of Sir Donald Wilson that, when the east midlands got into real problems, they did not look outside or advertise from some brilliant brain to come in, but went instead to the Mersey region and asked Sir Donald Wilson to take over. That was astonishing to those of us in the Crewe area, who had already seen the effects of decisions that were being taken by Sir Donald and his cronies in our area and who had considerable reservations about the quality of those decisions.

We have been told in a short space of time not only that Crewe must find £700,000, because it is £2 million overspent, and lose a number of jobs, some of them by compulsory redundancy—the figure given in the original assessment was 50—but that the £700,000 is just the first step to reducing the gap of £2 million that has been identified.

Then, surprise surprise, this chief executive gentleman who has been so lauded and who is apparently so active in the defence of the extraordinary finances of the department, resigns at very short notice—because, we are told, he has been headhunted. The joke on the wards goes: "They've had the head. When will they come and collect the rest of the body?" We have considerable doubts about whether that gentleman's expertise is what has recommended him to the region. One might have thought that, even under the present Government, anyone who gets more than £2 million overspent on two years would find himself in some considerable difficulty.

Crewe has always faced problems of underfunding. It needed considerable injections of money for staff, and faces a £4 million bill for building work. The roof of the hospital built by a gentleman called Poulson is now collapsing, even though the building has not been there for very long. I am no great architect, but I suspect that, in a hospital, a roof is quite useful. I do not know how many things can be done without, but doing without a roof could be mildly embarrassing.

Crewe will now have to find the money not only from health care but from jobs. These days, people in hospitals do not carry normal titles; for example, we have people responsible for "hotel services"—a laughable title. I suppose that hospitals may bear some resemblance to British hotels, but that simply tells us something about the problems of the tourist industry. Such was the level of expertise within the trust that, at the very moment when the person responsible for hotel services was being told that the job no longer existed, management were seeking to appoint someone from the commercial sector to run the laundry and other so-called services. That is extraordinary and cannot in any way be defended.

The Minister may say that I am not giving an accurate picture. His own Department engaged Price Waterhouse to do a survey of the hospital recently and, in the past three months, Price Waterhouse has reported—for some reason, the Government seem to be keeping quiet about it—that the hospital is not only efficient but very efficient. It is not the staff who are the problem—nor is it the delivery of health care, even in the extraordinarily difficult conditions under which staff are operating, with wards closed at weekends and people being moved around. Quality of care is not the problem.

I should have thought that the Minister would now think to himself, "Price Waterhouse says that the place is efficient; there is an overspend of £2 million for the second year running; the money can no longer be taken out of the reserves, so the business of sacking staff has to be considered" and ask himself—or better still, the Secretary of State should ask herself—"What is really wrong? Is it the fact that we do not allow enough money to the district hospital to provide the services that we demand of it?"

The Secretary of State has frequently told me, in letters and in the House, that I should be proud of the hospital, because it is treating more people. I have no doubt that the Minister has the figures today and will be saying, "Look how clever we are. More people are being treated." But if Leighton hospital is overtrading and if the Secretary of State demands that that level of care is kept up—and she has given the instructions that it should not only continue to give that level of care but increase the rate at which it is treating patients—how does the Minister explain the gap between the resources needed for the jobs and the amount of money that is available for the trust?

Perhaps the Minister will say that that is a matter for the trust itself. He must know that the staff are now at risk and that morale at the hospital is dangerously and unacceptably low—and I have lived in hospitals for much of my life. People are deeply worried about the future of their jobs. It is important to understand that the lessons of Crewe trust and its problems have not been lost on the surrounding areas. Halton trust, which became a trust yesterday, learned its first lesson from Crewe, closing one of its best and most well-equipped wards on the very first day. Crewe is offering an example to people in the north-west region of how not to run a hospital.

There is also the problem of community care. So far, no one has worked out that, whereas hospital treatment is free at the point of use, once the social services act as a filter between elderly and mentally handicapped people and the services they require, a larger part of the cost will inevitably be paid by the patients themselves. That has not been sufficiently highlighted in the run-up to community care.

I have a number of questions to ask the Minister, but I must tell him that the recitation of a series of very spurious statistics will not be a sufficient response to my points of concern. Does the Minister accept that there are such severe problems in the Mid Cheshire hospital trust that it requires an independent investigation into the financial management, into staff and patient care and, above all, into the amount of money available to the trust from the regional hospital authority?

Will the Minister also instigate an urgent inquiry into what is happening at regional level? How does he justify the decisions being taken, such as the purchase of flats, at a time when health authorities are being told to cut the level of services they provide?

How on earth can the Minister justify the arbitrary and outrageous decision to force the two health authorities —Crewe and Macclesfield—to combine in order to save money? After all, that is what it is all about. There is no suggestion that there will be a better level of health care; there is simply the suggestion in the so-called consultation document that it is a way to make the two budgets balance.

The experiment has failed—the creation of trusts has not provided better care and the money has not followed the patient. All it means is that the Government are increasingly able to run down our hospitals on the very weak pretext that somehow or other the decision is being made by local people, who, the Government say, are now able to decide their own health care priorities.

That is a manifest farce. Local people have no say in what happens in their hospitals; they have no say in what happens with staffing levels; they have no say in what wards are closed; they have no say in the decision on which people are moved around on weekends; they have no say in who should be sacked—they have absolutely no say in what happens either in the regional hospital authority or in their local hospital trust.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

What is more, the clear evidence of financial problems is never discussed in public. Indeed, even when I ask questions in this House, the Secretary of State simply says, "There has been a meeting between all the relevant authorities, it has all been sorted out, don't worry about it." I not only worry about it: I have a deep feeling of unease about the management in my hospitals and certainly in my region. Moving someone who is incompetent from one region to another simply because his predecessor was even more incompetent is a pretty poor decision.

If the Minister is not prepared to agree to an independent assessment, we will know that the Government are not serious about setting up trusts or the delivery of health care. If they want to privatise the health service through incompetence, they are doing well; but if they want to provide health care, the Miniser had better answer my questions today—otherwise we will know that elected Members of Parliament cannot even get answers on behalf of patients.

10.43 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) began by speaking about free speech. There is no danger that she will not continue to exercise that right very effectively. Nor is there any danger that we will not continue to answer her. She touched on ministerial accountability in the health service. I must tell her that I was in my place in the early minutes of April fool's day to discuss neurosciences in Liverpool. I was back in my place in the early hours of this morning—3.30 am—to debate the London ambulance service; I am here again now, self-evidently, to discuss a particular local hospital with the hon. Lady. I shall continue to be in my place to discuss mental health with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring). Junior doctors have their little complaint about how long they work; junior Ministers occasionally find themselves in the same position, so we empathise.

The hon. Lady raised so many different points that I do not think that I can cover all of them. However, I start with her request for an independent inquiry into the finances of the trust and the local health authority. There is likely to be a deficit of about £500,000 at the end of the year, which is just over 1 per cent. of income. It is possible that that has been caused by the recruitment of additional consultants, without the total co-operation of the purchasers.

That is not an insurmountable problem. Several trusts have overspent, but the vast majority have balanced their books. It is certainly not something which I consider to be a proper matter for independent inquiry. The position is clear and it is being dealt with, so I see no reason to accede to the hon. Lady's request.

There are a great many good things about the trust. In-patient activity rose by 6 per cent. during the year, which is excellent news. It mirrors the experience of many other trusts.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the Minister accept the figure of £2 million that was given by the executives of the hospital?

Mr. Sackville: I am advised that, when the figures for 1992-93 are available, it is expected that the trust will show an operating loss of about £500,000.

Mrs. Dunwoody: No.

Mr. Sackville: That is the advice that I have been given and I have no reason to doubt it.

The hon. Lady made a number of specific points, but, in particular, she raised the question of a flat that has been purchased by the regional health authority. It decided to use endowment funds to purchase the flat so that it could save money on the very high hotel bills for people who visit the region. If there is any question of impropriety, I have no doubt that the district auditor will have something to say. The matter has been raised with me on more than one occasion and I have raised it with the region. I am satisfied that it took that decision in good faith. The hon. Lady is being a little mischievous in implying that there is something wrong or strange about it.

The hon. Lady said a great deal about trusts in general. It is becoming increasingly clear that trusts are providing the proper model for the delivery of health care. The hon. Lady should realise that a hospital running itself, with its own board of local people—who, together with management, take decisions that they believe to be in the best interests of patients—is the right way to proceed. Much better that than that the hospital should find itself an adjunct to a distant bureaucracy.

The experience of trusts to date has been most encouraging. The hon. Lady should not tarnish the name of trusts on the basis of a minor financial imbalance at her local trust hospital. We are receiving the message here and from abroad that people in other parts of Europe are examining the system that we are creating with the purchaser-provider split by giving hospitals trust status and, in turn, giving health authorities the funds with which to commission health care for the populations for which they are responsible.

People from other European countries are saying, "This is the model that we would like to set up." I have heard that said by officials from Spain and Germany. I am confident that others will be looking to us for the model for how to deliver internal market health care. Whether Hillary will grace us with a visit is something which is still in doubt, but I have no doubt that we shall be watched carefully by the rest of the world. As I have said, much of what the hon. Lady said about trusts was entirely unwarranted.

The hon. Lady talked about Sir Don Wilson, the regional chairman. He has done a remarkable job. The hon. Lady may disagree with some of the decisions that he has taken, but, with firm leadership, he has made a great many advances in the Mersey region that are the envy of other parts of the country. The fact that he has been asked to examine the problems of the west midlands is a further tribute to his skills. I do not know what evidence the hon. Lady can produce to cast aspersions on Sir Don Wilson's management skills.

I understand that the hon. Lady is much exercised about the proposed merger of the Crewe and Macclesfield authorities. She has described it as the merger of two awkward health authorities. I do not know whether that is a comment on the two Members concerned, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) would be disappointed if he knew that he had been referred to in those terms. The two hon. Members, the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend, are both acknowledged experts in health care. If the merger takes place, I think that they will find it a stimulating partnership—a marriage made in heaven. I have no doubt that the people in both areas will find it greatly to their benefit.

The hon. Lady knows that there are advantages in some mergers of health authorities. The idea of 192 different authorities purchasing health care, as we have had in the past, may not be the best model. It may be much better that there should be larger configurations of perhaps 500,000 or more residents, so that there is more clout when it comes to exercising the purchasing function and dealing with providers.

Health authorities, as a result of mergers, will be able to make more sensible decisions over the gamut of the local population. It will probably be of great benefit to the local population to have a larger purchaser that can make the appropriate decisions and have much more flexibility in the purchasing of health care. I think that that will turn out to be true. The hon. Lady will find from the health authorities that have already merged that some of them have found an optimum size.

Purchasing is a new skill within the health service. Many of those who work for local health authorities are only now beginning to discover that they are no longer running hospitals. They are commissioners of health care, not hospital managers. It is a skill in itself. The contracting arrangements between health authorities, trusts and providers will be an important part of the system in future.

The hon. Lady mentioned other matters, including community care. Yesterday saw the first day of the new system. It poses a considerable challenge, and it will demand a great deal of give and take on all sides, between hospitals, the NHS and local authorities, to ensure that it works, that patients are assessed quickly and efficiently, that beds are not blocked as a result of failure to assess and that the right provision is made for people coming out of hospital or for others in the community. A great spirit of co-operation will be required. I take the opportunity further to emphasise that point.

There is no reason why community care should not work. We know that we need assessment in each area, and in this instance it will be carried out by the social services, of all those requiring care in the community, whether post-hospital or otherwise.

The hon. Lady mentioned morale. She is making a great deal of what are minor financial problems locally and painting the blackest possible picture. There is no point in doing that. She is helping only to exacerbate the problems of morale among staff locally. I do not see that that is doing any favours to her local health service.

The hon. Lady mentioned the departure of the chief executive. I cannot comment on that or on his decision to go. I can say only that his replacement is being sought. The hon. Lady should not seek to find conspiracy theories or any other excuses to write headlines on the chief executive's departure.

I am sure that the hon. Lady will agree with me that the hospital trust has already achieved much of which it can be proud. I have said that a record number of people have been treated during its first year. Out-patient attendance has increased by 2,000 and 70,000 accident and emergency cases were dealt with. The number of patients seen was 9 per cent. above the level that the trust was contracted to provide. That is one of the reasons why many trusts this year have run into temporary financial problems. They are the victims of their own success.

The numbers of patients treated during the year has been much greater than that budgeted for, mainly on the elective side. This has meant disruptions, which is unfortunate. Sometimes, there have been temporary ward closures. On the other hand, in many instances patients have been treated earlier than they would have been. I accept that any disruption is unsatisfactory, and guidance has been sent to the health service to ensure that the contracts work more flexibly over the year. Those in the health service will be advised to monitor contracts more carefully to ensure that what happened this year does not happen again.

The hon. Lady is trying to tell the House that everything is going wrong in the local health service. She is saying that it is underfunded. It is true that her local health authority is below capitation. There is the same problem in Bolton, and that has been the position for years. There is an intention in Bolton, as in Crewe, to bring the districts that are below target up to target. As the hon. Lady well knows, if the merger with Macclesfield goes ahead, that will lead to a change in the funding arrangements in her authority, to the benefit of her constituents.

It has been useful to have the debate. I think that the hon. Lady misrepresents the situation. There is much of which to be proud. Those who work in her local hospital have done a wonderful job and I have no doubt that they will continue to do so.

Behaviourally Disturbed People

10.59 am

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak this morning. I am also most grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for being here today to reply to the debate.

Last summer, I was contacted by very distressed parents in my constituency. What was revealed to me then and continues today is an example of human tragedy and suffering which moved me considerably. It would be helpful if I summarised my constituent's difficulties. As a teenager she became pregnant and had an abortion, after which she exhibited previously non-existent behavioural difficulties. In the United States the phenomenon has been identified and described as post-abortion shock syndrome. That may have been the cause of what followed. Seven years on, her parents contacted me. They were desperate. Their daughter had been a patient in the psychiatric ward of West Suffolk hospital in Bury St. Edmunds—a ward which gives the highest standards of psychiatric care and to which I pay unqualified tribute this morning.

In the opinion of the senior psychiatrist at the hospital, and, indeed, of outside independent psychiatric assessors, my constituent did not essentially have a psychiatric disorder. Furthermore, there had been violence directed against ward staff, which caused them concern and consternation. Psychiatric opinion indicated that her condition was behavioural rather than psychiatric. As she was diagnosed as suffering from an untreatable personality disorder rather than a treatable illness, it was not possible to detain her under section 3 of the Mental Health Act 1984.

My constituent was transferred to the region's medium secure unit for those with mental illness, the Norvic clinic in Norwich, which I have visited. Under the stricter regime there, she exhibited more restrained behavioural patterns. However, on discharge to a hostel, symptoms of chronic disorder reappeared and she returned to live with her parents. At home her actions including crying and wailing and banging her head incessantly against a wall. Where could she go? The psychiatric ward declined to take her because her condition was not considered pyschiatrically treatable. The district health authority was unable to help either for that reason, although it was very willing to do so.

I was advised that the criminal justice route should be explored. A previous move had simply resulted in my constituent being sent home with a fine. At this point, I should perhaps stop to say that all the routes that I explored on my constituent's behalf last summer seemed closed. My constituent has now had a baby. I am grateful to Suffolk social services for the concern that they have shown in helping her during this difficult time.

The nub of the issue is clearly this: where does someone who is not psychiatrically assessible go? Clearly, for the layman like myself and other hon. Members, there is no tangible difference between someone who appears to be psychiatrically or behaviourally disturbed and someone who is. The manifestations appear similar. Tragically, such an individual may commit an act of violence against another person, so there is clearly a public safety aspect.

My great fear is that our prisons contain people who have similar problems, when prison is clearly as inappropriate response to this tragic human disorder. I have taken the advice of several forensic psychiatrists and I have to tell the House that my constituent is not alone in her ghastly dilemma. There are many in our country for whom there is no clear provision, because they fall outside certain definitions of mental disorder.

There is, of course, rising concern and awareness about mental illness. Indeed, that was highlighted as a key objective in "The Health of the Nation". Moreover, one of its strategic elements is the development of comprehensive local services, with local purchasing and planning arrangements which ensure continuity of health and personal care. A start has been made in Suffolk.

I have alluded to the Norvic clinic in Norwich, which is the only provider of medium secure beds in the East Anglian region. Districts do not, for example, have psychiatric teams whose specific responsibility is to provide more local services for mentally disordered patients. Indeed, at the core of the Reedport's recommendations is the view that district health authorities should be responsible for purchasing a more comprehensive spectrum of psychiatric provision for mentally disordered offenders. Clearly without the support of her parents and family, my constituent might well now be in prison herself.

The thrust of what the Reed committee reported was that mentally disordered offenders who need care and treatment should receive it from the health and social services rather than the criminal justice system. That theme and focus is not new. In 1975 the Butler report noted:

> "In the face of the widely acknowledged and urgent need, we have been disturbed to learn that little progress has as yet been made in establishing needs, or even in providing temporary arrangements".

Indeed, the thread in the Reed report of last year of a multi-agency review had been taken up by the Aarvold committee in 1972. It recommended that a patient leaving a special hospital should not normally be discharged direct to his family or to casual lodgings, but, wherever practicable, should go first to a local psychiatric hospital or a hostel for an initial period of rehabilitation.

All those learned reports have grappled with the same problem and all have highlighted the inadequacy of bed spaces in medium secure provision. Reed's targets of 1,000 beds by 1995 and 1,500 beds as a final target was originally set at 2,000 as long ago as 1974. The present figure is some 635, considerably below recommended levels. In my region, that would suggest that another 20 bed spaces are required in the medium secure unit.

"The Health of the Nation" noted that mental illness accounted for 14 per cent. of certificated sickness absence; 3 to 6 per cent. of adults over 16 may suffere depressive disorders; 2 to 7 per cent. suffer anxiety states. Others, of course, suffer from schizophrenia and dementia. In 1991, there were 5,567 suicides, with a notable rise among younger men. Mental illness has a wide range of manifestations.

The figures involve substantial numbers of our fellow citizens and the number will surely rise. But I cannot stress sufficiently that clinical needs and public safety are inextricably bound together. Of course, I accept that it is difficult to make clinical distinctions about the mentally disordered. However, in cases such as that of my constituent, it has been confirmed by many conversations with psychiatrists that there appears to be a grey area which current arrangements do not satisfactorily address.

I realise that the Reed report's recommendations that the number of spaces in medium secure units be substantially increased will be expensive. I shall explore that later. Clearly, we also need to examine how care for mentally disturbed patients can be enhanced for both existing mental patients and those who might be moved from prison to hospital. My hon. Friend will know that the Reed committee recommended a substantial transfer of prisoners into appropriate hospitals. Of course, there are dangers. For all its imperfections in this context, the criminal justice system at least offers the opportunity of a trial or, indeed, redress to the offender. Being sent to a hospital cannot and should not be undertaken without taking into account the interests of public safety. It cannot be seen as an alternative to remand in custody.

Therefore, in responding to mentally disordered offenders, the actual offence has to be responded to. A co-operative approach is needed to ensure an appropriate response. When, in the instance of my constituent, the consultant psychiatrist who took her case offered to stay in touch with the police if she was arrested, it was a generous and helpful offer, but a one-off response to my intervention. What we are talking about is a much higher level of co-ordination.

I should like to dwell on the ways in which to address that problem, accepting, as Reed recommended, an increase in the number of regional secure units with bed spaces of fewer than 100, as at the Norvic in Norwich. The reason for that is that the psychiatric ward at West Suffolk hospital and other similar wards undertake treatment for mentally ill patients without physical restraint and under conditions of minimum security. Violent, aggressive or disruptive patients cannot be restrained in such an open environment. My constituent, however, was not regarded as treatable anyway. In those circumstances, therefore, all that can be done is to resort to heavy tranquillisation rather than therapy.

In 1991, the East Anglian regional health authority established a working party to investigate the problem of providing for patients with mental disorders. As a result, there is a possibility that sub-regional units could be established. From my many conversations with psychiatrists, however, I know that they would be reluctant to use them. They want a network of small, intensively staffed units in each district. The expense would be high, but current ECRs—extra contractual referrals—for mentally disordered patients are costing up to £200 per in-patient week in the private sector. The cost of processing the individual through the criminal justice system and keeping that person in prison is extremely high.

Larger institutions, such as medium secure units, have an important role to play, especially for the real offender, potential or otherwise. There still remains, however, the challenging behaviour of individuals such as my constituent. The criminal justice route is not appropriate and such individuals do not respond to psychiatric treatment either.

I have consulted a number of psychiatrists, particularly in my constituency. Individuals with behavioural difficulties require a separate unit where they can be treated with appropriate behaviour therapy. In a county such as Suffolk that would imply the provision of a unit with about 10 beds, probably located on a hospital site. Obviously, there would have to be some element of security, aided by appropriately trained staff. After behaviour therapy of perhaps six months or up to two years, individuals could then be discharged or transferred to a suitable residential place.

By definition, the focus would be narrow, but we are talking not about a large number of people, but about a sufficient number who have no place to go and whose lives are often marred by personal tragedy in consequence. Hope would be offered and the use of non-improving drugs could be avoided.

The whole issue of mental illness in its various manifestations is no longer something which is pushed under the carpet. The White Paper "The Health of the Nation" recognised that admirably. The Reed report has focused attention on the needs of those with mental difficulties. I greatly welcome both reports and the spotlight that they have thrown on the blighted lives of many thousands of our fellow citizens.

11.12 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) on securing time to debate the important topic of behaviourally disturbed people. I also congratulate him on doing so in such an eloquent and moving way.

This aspect of health and social care is truly multi-disciplinary and it is right that health and social care professionals, patients, people in the community and politicians regularly take stock to see whether the right sort of care is being delivered to mentally ill and emotionally disturbed people.

My hon. Friend has clearly explained the circumstances of his constituents, their adult daughter and their difficulty in securing help. Their case is tragic and he has asked, quite rightly, what our policy is for caring for mentally ill people and how we prevent people from falling through the net.

The Government fully recognise the burden carried by carers who look after sick relatives. I pay tribute to all their hard work and dedication in standing by so steadfastly members of their families who are mentally ill. It is not an easy task and, quite rightly, those carers look to the statutory and voluntary agencies for help. I should explain that, for some years, the Government have provided grant support to a number of voluntary organisations which, directly or indirectly, represent the interests of mentally ill people and their carers. If my hon. Friend would find it helpful, I can let him have the appropriate names and addresses so that his constituents can get in touch with them for support and advice.

As the House will know, we have a large agenda before us. About one person in 10 suffers from some form of mental illness in the course of a year and mental illness is as common as heart disease and perhaps three times as common as cancer. About seven people in 1,000 of the population will suffer from schizophrenia at some point in their lives and currently it affects an estimated quarter of a million people.

So what is our policy? Quite simply, it is to continue to encourage the development of locally based health and social services to meet the needs of people of all ages suffering from mental illness. The aim is to have a range of services that are local, comprehensive and sensible.

The components of such a service must be principally effective assessment of need; community mental health teams supporting mentally ill people in their own homes; an adequate range of day care services; adequate short and long-term hospital provision; and an adequate range of health and local authority respite services.

[Mr. Tom Sackville]

This policy, which is to be taken forward within the general framework of responsibilities for community care can be delivered successfully only by health and local authorities working together, in collaboration with the relevant voluntary organisations and the private sector.

The NHS's responsibilities for providing continuing care have been clearly set out in the White Paper "Caring For People" and were strongly reiterated last year in letters to regional health authorities and social service departments from the deputy chief executive of the NHS management executive and the chief inspector of social services. The form that this continuing care should take and the number of places provided must be a matter for local decision. While central Government can set the scene and establish a framework for mental illness and community care policies, it is the local agencies which will need to turn those intentions into firm positive action for the benefit of patients and carers.

Of course, at the heart of all concerns are those users and carers mentioned by my hon. Friend. The first key component for community care identified in the White Paper was services that respond flexibly and sensitively to the needs of individuals and carers. The second key component was to ensure that service providers make practical support for carers a high priority. To do that, we must all listen closely to what users and carers have to say about the services they receive so that we can learn from their experiences and develop more appropriate provision of care. I believe that we are doing this and today's debate reflects that, but, to encourage the process still further, we are setting up a national users and carers group with representatives from a wide range of clients, including mentally ill people as well as the appropriate voluntary organisations.

The purpose of the group will be to give direct regular feedback to Ministers through the Department about the experience of care in the community, particularly during the early period of the new arrangements. Its remit will cover both health and social services and we will expect to hear about services provided by the independent sector as well as the statutory authorities.

The group would be able to give the centre some first-hand feedback about what is going on regionally and what the effects are for particular user groups. It could share experiences and advise us on how services can be made more responsive and how systems and management can be improved. It could also act as a focal point for advice and good practice on how service users and carers might be more effectively involved in the planning and development of community care services. It will give us at the centre a much more direct feel of how we can continue to go about achieving the central aim of community care.

None of this can be achieved without the right level of resources and the Government are firmly committed to improving services for mentally ill people. This is demonstrated by the fact that, including secure provision, about £2 billion is being spent each year on mental illness. That figure, although impressive, does not tell the whole story, because it does not show the 37 per cent. increase in real terms in gross expenditure on hospital and community health services since 1979 and an 86 per cent. increase in real terms in gross expenditure on local authority social services. Those figures demonstrate quite clearly that the Government are committed to policies for the mentall ill.

However, we recognise that the provision of services can be patchy and that is why we have taken a number of initiatives to improve the overall level of care. These include the introduction of the care programme approach in April 1991, two years in advance of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, introducing the idea of needs assessment and care management to the care of mentally ill people.

Based on the best professional practice, it is intended to cover all patients being considered for discharge from mental illness hospitals and all new patients accepted by the specialist psychiatric services. The needs of each patient, both for continuing health and social care and for accommodation, should be systematically assessed and effective systems put in place for ensuring that agreed health and, where necessary, social care services are provided to those patients who can be treated in the community. Explicit, individually tailored care programmes are drawn up and a key worker is identified to keep in close touch with the patient and to ensure that the agreed package of health and social care is being delivered.

We have also introduced the mental illness specific grant available to local authorities which has brought about significant improvements in the social care provided to people with a mental illness In 1993-94, the grant will be £34 million in support of expenditure of some £47 million by local authorities.

In addition, we have helped to raise the awareness of mental health and push forward action by the relevant agencies by including it as one of the five key areas in "The Health of the Nation" White Paper. The main objective is to reduce ill-health and death caused by mental illness and there are specific targets to reduce suicide by 15 per cent. in the national rate and 33 per cent. for the severely mentally ill by the year 2000.

We have recently issued a mental illness handbook to put flesh on the bones of the White Paper and to help health and local authorities develop local strategies for reducing mortality and morbidity caused by mental illness. Although the information in the handbook is meant to be illustrative rather than prescriptive, it represents the most detailed description we have ever set out of what we would like to see developed in the field and how. As such, it is likely to be a major resource for many years to come.

There is a particular task in "The Health of the Nation" relating to mentally disordered offenders. Health authorities are required to include a range of secure and non-secure services for this group in their strategic and purchasing plans. The development of those plans will be influenced by the work of the Department of Health/ Home Office review of services for mentally disordered offenders—the so-called Reed review to which my hon. Friend referred, whose final report we published last November.

We are still considering many recommendations made during the review, but we have already endorsed a set of principles for the future provision of services and we have greatly increased the amount of capital available centrally for medium secure services—from £3 million in 1991-92 to £17 million in 1992-93 and £22 million next year. We are also awaiting the outcome of the working groups, under the chairmanship of Dr. John Reed, which are looking at personality disorders and high security services. That work will be completed shortly.

To help in following up the review and in maintaining the good co-operation between agencies which it has fostered, we have established a new advisory committee on mentally disordered offenders. That committee is being formed for three years and, among other things, it will advise the Department of Health and the Home Office on follow-up action to the review.

Clearly, there is always a lot more that we could do. We still need to unlock resources from the old long-stay institutions in developing services further in the community and, to help tackle this, we set up a mental health task force in 1992 to help build up a balanced range of locally based services.

Also, it is apparent that implementation of the care programme approach is patchy and people can fall through the net. There is the problem of a small minority of mentally ill people who refuse to participate voluntarily in their care programmes. The Government are very concerned about the position of patients who slip through the net of community care and this is why we are taking a fresh look at the existing legal powers and considering whether changes are needed to the mental health legislation. A team has been set up to take this forward and a report will be made in the summer.

One point that is not always appreciated is that the Mental Health Act allows a patient to be detained in the interests of his or her own health. It is not necessary to show that they represent a danger to themselves or others. We are considering further changes to the Mental Health Act code of practice that are aimed at removing any misunderstanding about the admission criteria under the Act.

I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to my hon. Friend and I congratulate him on raising the topic. It is an unfortunate fact that everyone is aware of acute services and hospital services and the problems that they are in, but fewer people are aware, or are willing to be aware, of the problems of mental health. Too many people would like to brush it under the carpet, but there is an enormous need and one which must be met. We are determined to do that.

I hope that I have been able to show what measures we are already taking to provide a high-quality service for mentally ill people and the resources that we are putting in to support this. We will continue to do all that we can to make improvements and to ensure that mental illness is given a high priority by both health and local authorities.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

11.26 am

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I am pleased to have this Adjournment debate on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. The treaty was signed in 1968 and we ratified it in 1970. Now, 155 member states are signatories to it. It is reviewed every five years and there is a major re-examination after 25 years.

That major re-examination is due in 1995. There are preparatory meetings going on ahead of that re-examination conference and the first one takes place on 10 to 14 May in New York this year. That is one of the reasons why I have called for a debate on this subject. We must start work for significant progress not only at the preparatory meeting but at the 1995 conference. The 1990 review conference failed because it did not reach a consensus on the final document. The main area of contention was nuclear testing. I shall say more about that later. However, we cannot afford another failure in the treaty as we approached 1995.

The use of nuclear weapons is the ultimate amorality. The examples of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and the mass slaughter there should never be forgotten. Nuclear proliferation greatly increases the risk of nuclear war, but it is not just those states on the verge of getting nuclear weapons but the nuclear weapon states themselves that are the cause of worry. In the late 1980s, there were about 60,000 nuclear weapons in the world.

There were some achievements, some arms agreements, which we all welcomed. We welcome the intermediate nuclear force and strategic arms reduction agreements between the then Soviet Union and the United States. However, those agreements are quite small when set against the number of nuclear weapons to which I have referred. START is not due to be completed until 1998, but the nuclear warheads covered by that agreement do not have to be destroyed—merely withdrawn or stored. There is evidence that some of them are simply being recycled.

Some of the threshold states are already over the threshold for nuclear weapons. Israel is seemingly an undeclared nuclear weapon state, but I have seen reports that it has 200 to 300 nuclear weapons. In a recent statement, President De Klerk said that South Africa had made six nuclear weapons. The odds are that South Africa has made many more than that. India, Pakistan, Brazil and Argentina have probably made nuclear weapons and we know that Iran and Iraq have been trying to make them. The threshold states have probably increased their capacity to make such weapons because of the biggest event in recent years—the disintegration of the Soviet Union. That has created a series of new nuclear weapon states and has resulted in the selling of expertise and materials to states such as Iran and Iraq.

Events in North Korea have also prompted me to seek this debate. On 11 March, North Korea announced that it was leaving the non-proliferation treaty. That is an appalling precedent and we should urge action to stop Korea doing so. It signed the NPT in 1985, but it has been treated as an outcast, put out in the cold. As a result, North Korea does not respond to diplomatic and other pressures. It was silly to stop all aid and diplomatic recognition, because it has meant that we cannot use them to apply pressure. We should consider restoration of assistance or at least welcome North Korea back to the international fold. However, we should certainly not do that as a response to North Korea leaving the treaty.

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

North Korea has said that it does not believe the statement by the United States that it withdrew all its nuclear weapons from South Korea in 1991. There should be a detailed inspection to make sure that those weapons were withdrawn and North Korea should be invited to take part. We must exert maximum diplomatic pressure to persuade North Korea not to withdraw from the NPT. A stick and carrot approach should be used; there has been so much stick that we now need a little bit of carrot.

The non-proliferation treaty was very much a bargain between the nuclear weapons states and the non-nuclear weapon states. That was well described by Lord Plant of Highfield, when he said:

"the NPT involved a bargain under which they"—

that is, the non-nuclear weapon states—

"would forfeit their rights to acquire nuclear weapons in return for the nuclear weapon states engaging in a process of nuclear disarmament."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 March 1993; Vol. 544, c. 383.]

That was part of the bargain, but there are four other aspects.

Arms control negotiations to reduce the world's stock of arms and to end nuclear testing were expected of the nuclear weapon states. Security assurances for the protection of the non-nuclear weapon states against attack by nuclear weapons have been given. Free access to nuclear power for peaceful purposes was also expected. The non-nuclear weapon states thought that they were receiving those benefits under the terms of the non-proliferation treaty. There is a clear perception that the nuclear weapon states have reneged on those agreements, are reluctant to give up their nuclear weapons and have not done enough to disarm.

I mentioned the INF and START agreements, but there has been little control of nuclear weapons. Proliferation must be viewed in two ways. There is horizontal proliferation, the spread of weapons to new states, and vertical proliferation, which is a qualitative and quantitative increase in the possesion, manufacture or deployment by an individual state. In terms of vertical proliferation, Britain comes off badly: Trident is a blatant example. Trident has 512 targets, whereas Polaris had 64. That is an eightfold increase. It is capable of 4,000 Hiroshimas, whereas Polaris was capable of 400. That is an appalling example of proliferation.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Is it still Labour policy to continue with the Trident submarines but not to arm them?

Mr. Cohen: Labour's policy is well known. My view is that there is an overwhelming case for getting rid of Trident.

Another example of vertical proliferation in Britain is the thermal oxide reprocessing plant programme for a huge increase in the production of plutonium.

When does the United Kingdom propose to become involved in arms control and disarmament negotiations? The non-nuclear weapon states have a right to ask that, because there has been no such involvement over the 14 years of this Government. That is a scandal. Britain is a signatory to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, of which article VI is a key component. It states:

"Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

That is what Britain signed up for, and if we cannot go all the way towards eliminating nuclear weapons, we should at least enter negotiations leading towards that goal. By any standards, we are clearly in breach of article VI and it seems that the United Kingdom has reneged.

I shall now deal with nuclear testing. In the other place on 11 March, the Minister's dad, Lord Hailsham, said that he tried to achieve a test ban in 1963. I congratulate him on that excellent example that he set for his son. The last treaty meeting in 1990 foundered on the issue of nuclear testing, but a comprehensive test ban treaty could be a vital cap on the nuclear arms race.

The preamble to the NPT about a comprehensive test ban states:

"Recalling the determination expressed by the Parties to the 1963 Treaty banning nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere, in outer space and underwater in its preamble to seek to achieve the discontinuance of all test explosions of nuclear weapons for all time and to continue negotiations to this end."

That was the aim of the treaty.

Britain has not participated since 1980 in the negotiations referred to in this preamble. At the United Nations, Britain blocked resolutions on a partial test ban treaty as recently as 1991. That is a far cry from the Government's attitude in 1980, when the defence estimates stated:

"We believe that the proliferation of nuclear weapons would increase tensions, putting at risk international security and stability. The Non Proliferation Treaty Review Conference in August will be an important event in the continuing search to combine non-proliferation objectives with the widespread desire of nations to enjoy the benefits of nuclear power. Non-proliferation would also be served by a comprehensive ban on testing nuclear weapons, on which we have been negotiating with the United States and the Soviet Union."

Clearly, in 1980 the Government favoured a comprehensive test ban treaty. Since then, they have retreated from that position in a mealy-mouthed fashion, talking of a step-by-step approach. What is the first step; what is the last step; what are the steps in between?

The United States has passed new laws restricting the number of tests. They do not amount to a complete test ban, but the United States seeks such a ban after 30 September 1996 unless a foreign state conducts such tests thereafter. President Clinton is on record as supporting moves toward a ban.

The Russians have put a moratorium on testing nuclear weapons and have since extended it. France's moratorium is coming up for review. So the conditions are favourable for the British Government to support a comprehensive test ban treaty and I urge them to do so.

An excellent paper on security assurances for non-nuclear weapons powers has been produced by the International Security Information Service, ISIS. The paper states:

"Britain undertakes not to use nuclear weapons against such states except in the case of an attack on the United Kingdom, its dependent territories, its armed forces or its allies by such a State in association or alliance with a nuclear weapons state."

This shows that Britain's position is not even as good as the former Soviet Union's:

"Our country declares that the Soviet Union will never use nuclear weapons against those States which renounce the production and acquisition of such weapons and do not have them on their territories."

The Soviet Union also added an obligation not to be the first to use nuclear weapons.

Even China's position was better than our own:

"All the nuclear countries, particularly the super Powers that possess nuclear weapons in large quantities, should immediately undertake not to resort to the threat or use of nuclear weapons against the non-nuclear countries in nuclear-free zones. China is not only ready to undertake this commitment but wishes to reiterate that at no time and in no circumstances will it be the first to use nuclear weapons."

So we must improve our security assurances. We cannot give open-ended commitments—they would be dangerous—but we can still improve our assurances to the non-nuclear states.

As for free access to nuclear power for peaceful purposes, the perception of the non-nuclear states is that the nuclear states are reneging on their agreement. I have some sympathy with the non-nuclear weapon states on this point, because there is a link between civil and military use and a real fear that this use could spread. If that is the Government's position, they should be open about it and renegotiate this part of the bargain.

There is a great deal to which the Government could commit themselves. First, they should reform and strengthen the International Atomic Energy Agency. That authority's current role is to monitor the use of nuclear materials, not the construction of nuclear weapons by other states. As a result, it monitors Germany and Japan for 60 per cent. of its time and Canada for another 10 per cent., the rest of it being divided between eastern and western Europe. That leaves little or no time for the third-world threshold states to which I have referred. That imbalance should be corrected.

The IAEA should have an increased budget, too. I know that the United Kingdom contributes £3·5 million already, but it is well worth giving the authority more resources to help it prevent proliferation. Its policing arm should be strengthened: comprehensive verification arrangements—satellite surveillance, open skies agreements, a seismological network to detect tests, a register of trade in arms and nuclear materials—must be put in place. The authority should have the power of effective inspection.

Hans Blix, director general of the IAEA, said on 21 September last year:

"In the past year I have received with appreciation commitments by several States to open any site and any installation to Agency visits, regardless of whether these sites and installations are covered by safeguards. In some instances the agency has made use of such commitments. For confidence building they are of high value—provided that they are fully accepted in practice."

This means allowing the IAEA's operations to extend to military as well as civil production, and the Government have been reluctant to do that.

I hope that the United Kingdom will make the sort of commitment for which Hans Blix has asked. There should be perferably one body for controlling nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, and the spread of ballistic missiles, not a patchwork of organisations. It should have powers to promote sanctions against states that are in breach of the rules. It should improve the safeguards for the non-nuclear weapon states and it should impose a global prohibition on nuclear testing.

We also need new agreements on fissile materials production cut-offs—at present the subject of a voluntary United Kingdom/IAEA Euratom safeguards agreement, which unfortunately allows the withdrawal of nuclear material for national security reasons. That loophole must be closed. In the 18 months to December 1987, the United Kingdom made five withdrawals on security grounds. In the 30 months to January 1990, there were 41 such withdrawals—an alarming increase.

We also need a plutonium cut-off agreement. There is no escaping the fact that the United Kingdom needs to make deep cuts and to involve itself in international negotiations for cuts in nuclear weapon numbers—but that should not be used as an excuse for procrastination.

Trident and the tactical air-to-surface missile should be cancelled if we are to achieve a good international agreement on non-proliferation. The United Kingdom seems stuck in the cold war posture still. The Secretary of State for Defence has made statements to that effect. Even Les Aspin, United States Defence Secretary, has said:

"Some leaders are undeterred by the threat of retaliation, like Saddam Hussein."

Robert McNamara, the distinguished former Defence Secretary under Kennedy and Johnson, has said:

"Others still believe that the threat to use nuclear weapons prevents conventional war . . . Accepting this argument means accepting the risk that, if deterrence fails, a nuclear exchange, which would destroy nations, may follow."

He has blown up, so speak, the argument that deterrence can still work and that it is enough to rely solely on deterrence.

Robert McNamara went on to argue for coercive action against states that do not agree with the nuclear non-proliferation arrangements. I do not agree. Iraq shows that, even if people are killed, dictators can remain in place. The Government have taken the coercive action option without considering what route they should take. The consensus route would be better and at least it should be tried.

I conclude by reading the report of Dr. Boutros Ghali, the United Nations Secretary-General, from 22 October last year. He said:

"Now that reductions are occurring, a number of questions assume greater importance".

They are relevant to our Government.

"How could envisioned cuts lead to even further reductions? When will the negotiating process be enlarged to include other nuclear-weapon States"—

Britain—

"and will the parties, having already sharply curtailed their qualitative improvement programmes, finally agree to halt nuclear testing completely? The International community can aim for no less a goal than the complete elimination of nuclear weapons. Achieving this goal may take some time. Nuclear technology cannot be disinvented; and there are a host of difficult questions—including issues of stability and verification—which must be weighed carefully. It is my belief, nevertheless, that the full array of hazards posed to humanity by these weapons cannot be adequately dealt with until we have crossed the threshold of the post-nuclear-weapon age. In this context, a comprehensive ban on nuclear testing would be a significant step leading to the goal of the elimination of all nuclear weapons."

The Government should set forth down that road.

11.51 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on securing this debate and on getting extra time for it. This is an important subject, which he has spent much time and energy pursuing since becoming a Member. His work and unswerving commitment to the cause of nuclear disarmament should be put on the record.

I approach the subject from the point of view of an unrepentant unilateral disarmer. I do not plan to change my view—any more than my hon. Friend plans to change his—which I have held since I was old enough to become a member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, and I am now a member of its national council. I say that because principle and consistency in politics are important.

We still have the capacity to destroy the world many times over. I have been reading about the horrors of the atomic explosions at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Many of the politicians who took that decision did not comprehend what a nuclear explosion was or the horror that would be meted out to the Japanese people. The bombs that were dropped on those two cities were mere fireworks compared with what is available now. They were tiny explosions compared with the current nuclear capability.

The arms race that developed at the start of the cold war in 1947 or 1948 and the development of the hydrogen bomb and subsequently of nuclear missiles by the Soviet Union, France, China and, we now know, a number of other countries has had a devastating effect on the entire world. That was predicated on the view that the Soviet Union was attempting to invade western Europe, and the United States' view that its duty was to contain the spread of communism anywhere around the world.

The United States adopted a policy of global encirclement of the Soviet Union from the Eisenhower period onwards. The United States still spends 5 to 6 per cent. of its gross national product on arms expenditure. The Soviet Union spent a similar, if not larger, proportion on arms expenditure. As a result, the United States has the biggest ever budget deficit in its history, which has had a knock-on effect on US policies on interest rates and has been largely paid for by low commodity prices in the third world. The third world has, in effect, paid for a large amount of the US arms budget.

The effect of the arms race on the Soviet economy and people was equally devastating. The Soviet system was never capable of meeting the basic needs of its population because of its expenditure on the arms trade. That was the major contributory factor to the break up of the Soviet Union. In a sense, both sides have spent themselves to a standstill on weapons of mass destruction. Although Britain has played a lesser role, it has been a significant and important one.

Technologies that are brilliant in their conception and operation were developed for an entirely negative purpose. Britain was involved in the original nuclear decisions and, to their shame, the 1949 Labour Government took part in the development of a British independent nuclear deterrent. In 1979, another Labour Government commissioned the Chevaline project. Both decisions were taken in secret and I suspect that neither of those Cabinets was informed. God knows what other schemes are being dreamed up by other Cabinets around the world as we speak.

We must ask ourselves a few important and serious questions. I have tried briefly to explain the results of the arms race, but was it ever necessary? What on earth are these nuclear weapons for and why are the Government so obsessed with the continued holding of nuclear weapons? We had the so-called independent British nuclear deterrent of the 1950s. We then had proliferation into the Polaris system from 1963 onwards—ironically, at the same time as a test ban treaty was being signed—which was followed by the Chevaline project, cruise and now the Trident missle system.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton correctly pointed out, when completed, the four-boat Trident submarine fleet will have nuclear warheads capable of hitting 512 targets around the world at the same time. I ask the Minister, although I do not suppose that he will give a detailed answer, if any answer at all, where those weapons are targeted. Are they targeted on British investments in Russia, Prague, Germany or Hungary, or on Cuba, the United States, France, Africa or Latin America? With a four-boat Trident submarine capability located in the right place, we have the ability to hit targets on any continent in the world. What are these weapons for, and whom are they targeted against?

I return to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton made earlier: a nuclear war is an unwinnable scenario. The Chernobyl explosion, small as it was in the litany of nuclear explosions, succeeded in devastating several hundred square miles of the Ukraine, creating a nuclear pollution cloud all over northern Europe and causing serious pollution and ultimately cancers throughout northern Europe. That was a minor explosion. Think of the consequences of any nuclear exchange. A nuclear exchange is likely to kill as many people from the side that launched it as the side that received it. With a sense of humour, the NATO generals labelled the whole thing as MAD—mutually assured destruction.

We must approach the issue from the point of view that nuclear weapons are immoral. I believe that it is unjust to hold them; it is unjust to consider their use in any way, and we should work for their total elimination. I would approach their total elimination from the standpoint of renouncing entirely the use of nuclear weapons, decommissioning the weapons we have and cancelling the Trident programme. I realise that the last would be difficult. However, by cancelling the Trident programme, we would ultimately free many skilled scientists in British industry to work on more socially useful projects. That would also redirect at least £10 billion of expenditure yet to be spent on the construction of the fleet and, ultimately, an additional £10 billion at least which would be involved in the refitting programmes of those vessels during their expected lifetimes. However, we must also consider the nuclear proliferation treaty and the worldwide proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Nigel Evans: While other countries possess nuclear weapons, surely this country would be absolutely insane to give away our nuclear defences unilaterally. Does the hon. Member accept that, as nuclear weapons have not been used since the second world war, that shows the deterrent factor of such weapons and that they have proved their worth?

Mr. Corbyn: Nuclear weapons were very nearly used in Korea. Only the intervention of President Eisenhower stopped those weapons being used in Korea. His generals were very happy to use them. They would have been used by an allied force, including British, Australian, New Zealand and United States forces, who would have been fried alive because they would have been used against targets fairly close to Korea, as I understand it from Eisenhower's memoirs and from other books written about that period.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) asked a simple question. He asked whether it would be unwise of Britain to give up the potential use of nuclear weapons while other countries have nuclear arms. Roughly 180 independent states are members of the United Nations, 90 per cent. of which do not have nuclear weapons or access to them. They are not covered by any nuclear defence arrangements. They manage to survive quite happily and they have not been threatened, precisely because they do not have nuclear weapons.

If we are to begin disarming, we must consider why we have nuclear weapons; what they are going to be used for; whom they are going to be used against; the effect on us of possessing them; and their potential use. From that point, we must consider the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

To make a nuclear bomb and create a nuclear explosion is not particularly difficult. A country with the ability to construct a nuclear power station can also construct a nuclear bomb. Unfortunately, that is not particularly difficult if a country has that technology. A delivery system is slightly more difficult to produce. However, as we saw with the Iraqi use of Scud missiles during the Iran-Iraq war, it is possible to use fairly conventional rocketry to deliver nuclear weapons. Indeed, the Enola Gay, which dropped the initial bomb on Japan, was an ordinary, conventional bomber aircraft.

We must start from the point of view that it is too easy to make nuclear weapons. However, it is also important to try to stop their proliferation. Proliferation is possible through the use of nuclear power. It is important that we adhere to the United Nations treaty.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton referred to the number of occasions when Governments, including the British Government, have refused access to the nuclear inspectorate. Presumably, the British Government refused access to examine British nuclear facilities because they consider them to be part of the nuclear missile programme, and they, therefore, do not want those things closely examined. I also believe that the expansion of our nuclear fleet to four Trident submarines, with the potential of 512 warheads, is a massive proliferation of nuclear weaponry and very much contrary to the spirit and letter of the non-proliferation treaty.

We know that many states now hold nuclear weapons, partly as a result of the break-up of the Soviet Union, partly because of the recent admission by South Africa that it has a nuclear capability, and because of the virtually confirmed view that Israel, India and Pakistan also have the capability to manufacture nuclear weapons even if they have not yet done so—although we await confirmation of that. North Korea has also, unfortunately, withdrawn from the non-proliferation process.

I hope that every effort will be made to get North Korea back into the non-proliferation process and that the British and United States Governments will adhere seriously to the NPT. If that does not happen, with regional instability in many places, the tactical use of battlefield nuclear weapons will be countenanced. It will then be felt that there is a defence through the wider use of nuclear weapons. I do not believe that.

I believe that the NPT holds out some hope for the world. I want to see a world that is completely free of nuclear weapons. I want to see the removal of all nuclear weapons from this country. I also want the resources transferred to create a more peaceful world in which there is less instability. If we think about it, the basic causes of instability are arguments over resources and over the sharing of wealth, water and food.

We should dedicate ourselves not to a world in which we can kill ourselves many times over, but to a world in which we can feed ourselves. That is why the attitude of the British Government towards the NPT is at best to look at it rather askance and, in respect of the Trident programme, to go completely contrary to it. I hope that the Government will put what pressure they can on the North Korean Government to return to the NPT. I also hope that the British Government accept that they are in breach of the NPT through their development of nuclear weapons.

We need a world that is free of nuclear weapons and of the threat of nuclear weapons. The brilliance and science devoted to creating such weapons and their development should be put to some more useful purpose. When Einstien had completed his work, he realised what could happen to the process that he had discovered. He was horrified and wished that he had not discovered it. However, he discovered that process, and it exists, but there is no future in a world in which we are committed only to the ability to destroy ourselves many times over.

12.6 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Corbyn: Yes, of course.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for his kind consent. I am also grateful to him and to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) for participating in a debate of considerable importance.

I hope that the hon. Member for Leyton will accept that the prevention of the proliferation of nuclear weapons is crucial for the maintenance of international security. The attention of the international community is, accordingly, being increasingly drawn to that requirement.

Non-proliferation is not a new objective. However, it has achieved a new prominence with the ending of the east-west confrontation. This is a useful occasion on which to set out some of the Government's thinking towards non-proliferation.

The cornerstone of our non-proliferation policy is the non-proliferation treaty, which provides the regime which is the basis for international consensus against proliferation. Under the treaty, the nuclear weapon states—ourselves, the United States, Russia, China and France—have committed themselves not to transfer nuclear weapons to other states and to work towards nuclear disarmament.

The other parties to the NPT, the non-nuclear weapons states, have undertaken not to acquire nuclear weapons and to sign safeguard agreements with the International Atomic Energy Agency so that their civil nuclear programmes may be monitored by agency inspectors.

[Mr. Hogg]

Three major challenges lie ahead. The most immediate challenge is clearly to keep North Korea in the treaty and to persuade it to meet its legal obligations under the treaty. Both the hon. Member for Leyton and the hon. Member for Islington, North addressed that point, and I will refer to it later.

The second challenge is to achieve the indefinite extension of the NPT at the 1995 extension and review conference. That point was also addressed, most particularly by the hon. Member for Leyton. The third challenge, which is no less important, is to strengthen the verification of compliance with the NPT. That is the responsibility of the IAEA.

The treaty came into force in 1970 for a period of 25 years. The 1995 conference will decide by how long and not whether it should be extended. As a co-depositary of the NPT with the United States and Russia, we are already working for an indefinite extension of the treaty in 1995. I hope that that will reassure the hon. Member for Leyton. Many states have already pledged themselves to support that goal, and we will do our utmost to ensure that there is general support for that policy objective.

With 155 states parties to it, the NPT is approaching universality of membership, but there are still 34 states, some of them nuclear threshold states, that are not party to the treaty. A further objective of the policy must therefore be to work to increase the number of states that are parties to the treaty. Good progress is being made in that respect, with, for example, the accession to the treaty of two of the remaining nuclear states, China and France.

Another aspect is verification of compliance with the treaty. The House will know that Iraq graphically demonstrated the problem. It is now clear that, despite being a party to the NPT and despite being subject to a safeguards agreement with the IAEA, Iraq made considerable progress in developing a covert military nuclear programme. We must therefore work to strengthen the safeguards regime administered by the IAEA.

The regime has recently been strengthened by a reaffirmation of the right of the IAEA to conduct special inspections of undeclared but suspect sites. It is necessary that that right is upheld in the case of North Korea. That point brings me to the case of North Korea, which has been highlighted by the hon. Members for Leyton and for Islington, North.

North Korea has been a party to the NPT since 1985. Early in 1992, it signed a safeguards agreement with the IAEA, and inspectors of the agency have conducted six inspections since then. The agency has requested access to two undeclared sites which, on good evidence, it believes to be used for nuclear purposes. The Government of North Korea have refused to grant access to those sites. As the House will know, that led to a resolution of the agency's board of governors on 25 February which called on the Government of North Korea to grant access by 25 March at the latest. The Government of North Korea have refused to do so.

At a further meeting which concluded yesterday, the board passed a resolution referring North Korea's non-compliance with its safeguards agreements to the Security Council of the United Nations, as it was obliged to do under article XII(c) of the agency's statute, and in accordance with article 19 of the safeguards agreement signed by North Korea. We voted for that resolution and we fully support it. We shall now work with fellow Security Council members and others to find a solution to the problem.

Since the non-compliance with the safeguard agreements, there has been another serious development of which the House is aware. On 12 March, the Government of North Korea informed the president of the Security Council of their intention to withdraw from the treaty. It is true that, under article 10 of the treaty, a state has the right to withdraw, but it is required to give the Security Council and others three months' notice of that intention and to state the extraordinary events relating to the subject matter of the treaty which it regards as having jeopardised its supreme interest. We do not believe that that proviso has been satisfied.

The action of the North Korean Government is, I am glad to say, unprecedented. It requires a firm but measured response by all the states concerned to uphold the non-proliferation regime. The objective of the international community is to find a way to persuade North Korea to change its mind, although not at the expense of weakening the NPT or the agency safeguards. In any event—I accept that this is small consolation—North Korea remains bound by its safeguard agreements with the agency for at least three months.

In a joint statement yesterday, 1 April, we and the other co-depositories of the treaty expressed regret and concern about the announcement by the North Korean Government. We have urged them to retract it and to comply with their safeguard obligations, which remain in force for the time being. We have expressed strong support for the efforts of the IAEA to implement its safeguard agreements with the Government of North Korea.

Before I go into the detail of the argument about testing, I intend to make a point that is not always kept in mind by hon. Members who speak about a comprehensive test ban treaty. In many substantive respects, a comprehensive test ban treaty would add little to non-proliferation policy. The NPT prohibits the acquisition and development of nuclear weaponry. By definition, one can test a weapon only if one has acquired it. In respect of non-nuclear weapon states, there would already have been a breach of the NPT if there were testing.

One can judge the strength of that proposition by considering what we know about South Africa or what we judge to be the case of Iraq. The South African Government have said that they did not carry out a test, although they developed nuclear weapons. We have no evidence to dispute the truth of that statement. In the case of Iraq, I am not aware of any evidence of testing. My point is that, in one sense, a comprehensive test ban treaty would not be a substantial and additional safeguard to the regime put in place by the NPT.

I am arguing not that such a treaty would be irrelevant, but that one should recognise that the NPT provides a more substantial barrier to proliferation than a test ban treaty could.

Mr. Cohen indicated assent.

Mr. Hogg: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman is fair about this, and that he is signifying agreement. The point is that one can test only if one has a weapon or a developing weapon. Unless one is a nuclear state, one is almost certainly going to be in breach of the NPT before one is in breach of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister agree that a great deal of the fallout and pollution in the atmosphere which have developed over the past 30 years has been the result of atmospheric testing? Although there is a different problem with underground testing, there is still a pollution problem. Although I understand and fundamentally agree with the point that there is a difference between non-proliferation and testing, I believe that testing should be stopped anyway because it can encourage proliferation and because it causes pollution.

Mr. Hogg: It is obviously true that atmospheric testing is polluting and it is good that such testing has been prohibited by international agreement. I do not think that the level of pollution from western tests underground has been such as to cause substantial concern. However, that is not an aspect of the matter on which I have come to speak this morning. Before giving a considered answer to that question, I should need to consider the material a little more clearly.

There have been two previous attempts to negotiate a comprehensive test ban. The first culminated in the partial test ban treaty of 1963, which limited signatories to testing underground—that was the treaty to which the hon. Member for Leyton referred and which my right hon. and noble Friend the former Lord Chancellor had a role in negotiating.

Mr. Cohen: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's dad.

Mr. Hogg: Yes, he is colloquially referred to as my dad. I was preserving the customary civilities of this place.

The Geneva negotiations between 1977 and 1980 were the second attempt. Those earlier efforts to achieve a comprehensive test ban were conducted under the shadow of the cold war.

As we all know and welcome, the present situation is very different. The arms race has gone into reverse. The strategic arms reduction talks and agreements between the United States and Russia have resulted in a reduction of deployed strategic weapons to around one third of the 1978 total. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Leyton that the reductions have been insignificant; they are substantial.

There have also been wholesale withdrawals of tactical nuclear weapons—a process in which the United Kingdom has played a significant part. Again, I do not agree with the hon. Member for Leyton, who suggested that the United Kingdom Government had not made a significant contribution to disarmament. The facts do not support that argument. As he will know, we have made substantial reductions in our sub-strategic capacity. For example, we have ended the deployment of Lance missiles and of nuclear artillery in Europe, we have eliminated our maritime tactical nuclear capacity and we have reduced by 50 per cent. the number of free-fall nuclear bombs, which is a substantial contribution.

Also, we will keep the number of our strategic weapons under review. However, it is also important to bear in mind the fact that, notwithstanding the reductions under START, the number of nuclear weapons possessed by the United Kingdom is but a fraction of those possessed by other states. While the proportion becomes larger with the implementation of START, it is but a small proportion of the whole.

The Government's view is that we need to retain nuclear weapons, albeit in reduced numbers, and we need to ensure that they are safe. We must therefore review the case for testing against that requirement. It is also true that a comprehensive test ban treaty has remained the British Government's long-term objective. In concert with other nuclear countries, we are reflecting whether it might be possible to bring forward that long-term objective or to abbreviate the timetable in some other way.

I can make no statement to the House other than to say that there has been a change in the international climate. Our long-term objective has been to subscribe to a comprehensive test ban treaty and we must now consider whether we can move more rapidly to the attainment of that policy.

We have considered an important issue of policy and I hope that what I have been able to tell the House has gone some way to reassure Opposition Members, although I appreciate that the hon. Member for Islington, North starts from propositions which he knows that I cannot accept—as does his hon. Friend the Member for Leyton. While I may be able to reassure both of them about specific questions that they raised, I recognise that our interpretation of the need to retain nuclear weapons is quite different.

Mr. Corbyn: You will come round to it.

Mr. Hogg: I rather doubt it.

Ferry Services (Spain)

12.24 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): I appreciate the chance of this debate and the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London will reply to it. I appreciate that he must be busy trying to sort out the implications of the rail strike. I should also start by declaring my interest, as I am the parliamentary adviser to the Baltic Exchange.

The subject of this debate is most serious. In a nutshell, a British company, which is out there trying to win for Britain, is having the utmost difficulty establishing a ferry service between Spain and Morocco, which I believe is contrary to the treaty of Rome.

The outcome is being watched closely by the City of London, which is the centre of world trade and especially world maritime trade. Its many institutions thrive in that central position and provide valuable invisible exports for this country. They include the Baltic Exchange and all the dry cargo broking that goes with it and the commodity traders who proliferate in London and bankers who proliferate even more. We must come up with a satisfactory response to the problem, because it is essential for London to remain the centre of world trade and for us to be seen to be dealing with the issue fairly.

I mentioned the City's invisible earnings; shipping earns about £3·4 billion for this country, the Baltic Exchange just under £1 billion, and last year Lloyd's Register apparently earned £33 million. The legal profession, which provides services for overseas clients, is believed to have earned more than £100 million and other institutions such as Lloyd's and various management and ship-owning companies must also be considered. The impact of such an issue on all those different types of companies and the confidence that it will engender in the City is tremendous.

Shipping is an international business and it is one of the few businesses in which a genuine free market and free flow of trade still exist. The quid pro quo is that the players in that free market expect fair play and a fair deal when striking bargains.

Cenargo, the British company at the centre of the issue, is one of the success stories of the 1980s. My hon. Friend may recall that it came to prominence in the early 1980s in the aftermath of the Falklands war, when the Ministry of Defence granted it the contract to take all the materials to the Falkland islands to build the new runway.

The company was founded by Mr. Michael Hendry in 1979. While P and O is the largest shipping company in Britain, Cenargo is now the largest private shipping company. It was recently described by Fairplay magazine as a one-man enterprise zone. It was originally a specialist roll on/roll off ferry company, and runs ferry services in, for example, the Irish sea. Over the years, it has grown into a diversified shipping group, with expertise in ferry management, broking and all aspects of shipping. Today, it runs 16 ships.

The company is run on old-fashioned principles—something which is rather rare in the 1990s. It is the type of company that insists that its superintendents maintain the engine rooms to the highest standard of cleanliness and that its officers wear uniform at meal times in port, and it regards its ships and its staff as its assets. In this rather casual era, we can rightly be proud of a company that faces the future with optimism and sound finance.

As I said, the company has great expertise in running roll on/roll off ferries. Last year it carried out a feasibility study of the prospects of running a ferry service between Spain and Morocco. There are tremendous flows of immigration between north Africa and Spain and across the Mediterranean. Here was a British company which saw the opportunity that that presented and was determined to get out there and exploit it for all that it was worth.

The existing ferry services are run by a Spanish company between Almeria in Spain and Melilla, which is a Spanish enclave—that is the important point—in Morocco. Cenargo was invited by the Moroccan Government to establish a direct ferry service between southern Spain and Nadar in Morocco, some 15 miles down the coast from Melilla. Basically—and this highlights the problem—the Moroccan Government were fed up with arriving in the Spanish enclave and being ripped off by the locals before crossing the border into Morocco.

Cenargo decided to take up that invitation to run the ferry service. It positioned its ship the Rozel and was due to start the service on 26 April this year. As I understand the position, the service is being blocked by the Spanish maritime authorities, who have instructed the local port authority and local officials not to co-operate and to prevent the service from running out of Almeria.

That is a serious matter. Under Community law, Cenargo is quite entitled to operate the service. The regulation authorising it to do so is EC regulation 4055/86, which establishes the principle of freedom of movement for maritime services between member states and third countries. Those of us who have long been frustrated over the issue of cabotage regarded that measure as long overdue. There is now a free market inside Europe, but there is one restricting factor: certain countries are still entitled to have bilateral maritime arrangements, but the relevant article—article 4—is supposed to be phased out by 1 January 1993. The Spanish Government are a party to the agreement, but are not living up to their obligations under it.

Aware of the opportunity that was arising on 1 January this year, Cenargo decided to compete, and positioned its ship the Rozel, which can take about 1,400 passengers and 300 cars, and proposes to do a round trip between Spain and Morocco every day. The service is being run with local partners. In December 1992, the Spanish authorities were formally informed of the planned service. A month later, the Spanish merchant marine replied that the service was prohibited and instructed the port authorities not to co-operate. One can only speculate what that may mean and the real reasons behind it. There is an element of politics, I think. Being one of the newer members of the Community, Spain is perhaps not yet used to the concept of European co-operation and what we have seen is perhaps something of a knee-jerking reaction to a successful entrepreneurial move by a British company. Moreover—although it may be inappropriate to say it—they may be blocking the way so that a Spanish company can come along shortly and compete.

Whatever the reason, this relatively small matter has momentous implications for the Community and poses a credibility problem for the Government to which I am sure they will rise. The Government have rightly fiercely opposed protectionism and subsidy. They have spent years telling United Kingdom ship owners that their best hopes lie in free trade. It sometimes seems as though we are the only country which goes along with that principle. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister what the Government intend to do to secure free access to the EC market.

Cenargo's first remedy is through the Spanish courts. I understand that there is a jurisdiction problem and those who have had any experience of Spanish courts will appreciate that there are always serious delays. If the matter went to the Spanish courts, the ferry service certainly would not start in April this year and it is questionable whether it would start in April next year.

The second remedy is to go to the Commission, which Cenargo has done. The Commission appears to have accepted the complaint, but the position is a little unclear. Perhaps my hon. Friend could clarify it when he replies. Again, of course, that remedy is a lengthy process.

The third remedy is the United Kingdom itself. I am aware that the Government have not been idle in the matter and I congratulate the Department on the way in which it has responded to the issue. I am also aware that there have been diplomatic moves. I understand that the Minister in the other place has had a meeting with the Spanish authorities, but there appears to be no sign that they intend to respond to the problem. Perhaps my hon. Friend could clarify that. There is a rumour, which I do not believe, that the Department accepts the Spanish position and recognises the Spanish bilateral agreement. I hope that my hon. Friend will deny that.

The impact of the problem on a small company like Cenargo is quite serious. It believed that it could rely on the EC regulation, but instead it will suffer huge financial losses. As a British company, it is entitled to expect member states to observe European Community law, especially that arising out of the treaty of Rome, as that does.

The problem shows the inadequacy of Spanish law in such cases. My hon. Friend may remember the Factortame case, when the English courts decided that they had power under EC law to stop the Government banning Spanish fishing boats operating in our waters under the British flag. There is a certain irony in the fact that that law is available in this country, but no such remedy is currently available in Spain.

It is a serious matter which will have serious consequences for British shipping. The House needs no reminding that the Government have told the industry many times that there will be no subsidy for British shipping, but the industry and the City are entitled to expect the Government's full-blooded support in such an outrageous situation. I hope that my hon. Friend will take robust action.

12.37 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Steve Norris): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) for giving the House the opportunity to debate this matter. My hon. Friend's interest in shipping matters goes back a long way—indeed, to when he and I first came to the House in 1983. He assiduously represents the interests of the Baltic Exchange and he maintains his interest in shipping matters generally.

I agree that the Cenargo International affair raises some important implications not only for the company, but for the whole future of shipping services within the Community. My hon. Friend was right to point out the slight irony that Spain had the closest interest in the Factortame case and the proceedings thereafter, because Spanish vessels were seeking to fish in United Kingdom waters. The British Government tried to take a view on the desirability of that practice in the context of jobs in the British fishing fleet.

Now, we are dealing with an issue which is just as important. I assure my hon. Friend that we take the matter seriously and we will try to resolve it as quickly and as directly as we can.

My hon. Friend set out the problem that Cenargo has encountered in trying to start a new service. I shall reiterate some of the major principles so that we are clear about the ground on which the Government are proceeding. My hon. Friend is right to congratulate Cenargo on the job that it does for Britain. I say that in terms of the earnings that it brings to the United Kingdom and of the standards that it adopts in running its shipping. I commend the company for its standards of safety. As my hon. Friend rightly said, it is much to be commended in a world where safety standards are not always what we would desire. Similarly, it is to be commended for the standard of service that it offers to its customers. Would that all shipping operations in Europe were conducted to the same high standards.

My hon. Friend observed that Cenargo has developed considerable expertise with roll on/roll off ferries. It has been seeking to embark on a new service between Almeria in southern Spain and Nador in Morocco.

I will not go over the background setting out how it came to try to start the service. Suffice it to say that my hon. Friend had the sense of it when he explained that there are two small Spanish enclaves on the north African coast, both surrounded entirely by the state of Morocco. One is Ceuta, which is opposite Gibraltar, and the other is Melilla about 15 miles north of Nador, which is the Moroccan port that Cenargo is seeking to gain entry to.

My hon. Friend is aware that there was a service from Marseilles to Nador. Until recently, on a heavily subsidised basis, it was carrying some of the traffic that the Moroccan authorities wanted to see in the port. I understand also that that service has recently been suspended. It is true that the authorities in Morocco are behind the general idea of the Cenargo service and want it to come to fruition.

My hon. Friend was right to say that EC regulation 4055/86 is the key regulation. It was adopted under the last-but-one United Kingdom presidency of the Community and it liberalised the freedom to provide international shipping services within the Community. My hon. Friend asked one or two questions about the United Kingdom's approach to the regulation and I will take this opportunity to remove any doubt that there may be, either in the minds of the members of the shipping community or in the minds of members of the Spanish Government, about the way in which we view the application of regulation 4055/86.

My hon. Friend was right that the provisions in the regulation were phased in over six years leading up to 1 January 1993. There were various derogations from the directive, which essentially—this is often the case with European legislation—allowed member states to bring their national law into line with treaty obligations. It also allowed them to renegotiate any bilateral arrangements that were covered by the scope of the directive.

[Mr. Steve Norris]

It is clear, however, that from 1 January 1993 all Community ship owners gain the right to operate freely between member states and between member states and third countries. That is precisely what Cenargo International is now attempting to do. The Government's view is that it is fully entitled so to do, to take advantage of the freedom that is conveyed to it under regulation 4055/86.

Sadly, the Spanish authorities have so far refused, as my hon. Friend said, to permit Cenargo to commence that service. They point to an agreement on maritime transport entered into in 1979 between Spain and Morocco, which governs ferry services between the two countries. However, as I have just said, regulation 4055 clearly states that previous bilateral agreements between member states and third countries should be discontinued or amended by 1 January 1993. That was precisely to ensure that the new single market rules were in place and working.

We understand that in any event—there is an irony here which will not be lost on my hon. Friend—the Moroccan authorities have waived the provision in the agreement on which the Spanish Government wish to rely. That is an interesting development. If the Moroccan Government insisted on the implementation of the previous bilateral arrangement, the Spanish Government could, presumably at least, point to that as the type of difficulty which they might have in implementing regulation 4055. But the Moroccan Government do not insist on the provisions of the 1979 bilateral agreement.

I make it clear to the House that we are drawn to the inescapable conclusion that the Spanish merchant marine ministry is in contravention of Spain's obligations under the regulation. The British Government wish to protect Cenargo's legitimate interests. The company has acted in the wholly justified belief that it was entitled to start its service from Almeria to Nador later this month. Indeed, it received a great deal of encouragement at a high level from the Moroccan Government. It also had support from the port management in Almeria.

The irony is that the authorities in Almeria recognise that the service would provide a considerable boost. That is where the previous service which operated from Marseilles to Nador is relevant. The demise of that service means that more business is available to the port of Almeria. Almeria is keen to diversify and boost its traffic levels. I understand that the relevant labour unions in Spain have also welcomed Cenargo's proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South may not have been aware of that, but my information is that that is the case.

So, having identified the opportunity provided by EC liberalisation to launch a new service, Cenargo has invested substantial sums of money in the infrastructure of the new operation, as my hon. Friend well knows. It has set up joint venture companies, acquired premises and set up an expensive computer reservations system. It has employed a considerable number of staff. I reiterate that the company is entitled to do that under the terms of the directive, and has been since 1 January.

I accept with great regret that the company will incur substantial losses if the service cannot begin on time. My hon. Friend made a point about recovery through the courts. He is a lawyer of some distinction and he will know that ultimately those losses will be recoverable through the courts, certainly on the basis of the legal framework that I have outlined. He made a comment about the speed of process in Spain. He will forgive me if I do not personally add a gloss to that. Suffice it to say that I understand the strength of the argument that he makes.

Recovery of costs through the courts could take far longer than is commercially desirable. In the meantime, Cenargo has left a substantial amount of money dead. The money cannot be used. The company has been frustrated in providing the service.

It is bad enough to look at the impact on Cenargo, but my hon. Friend has done the House a service, because he has highlighted the wider, important issue of principle. This is all about what the liberalisation of shipping services was intended to achieve. The British Government have taken the view that liberalisation is one of the most important achievements of the Community. The Council of Ministers worked hard to create an effective competitive framework within which Community shipping services could develop to the benefit of both the industry and users. A failure to permit Cenargo to start its proposed service would undermine that important policy.

I am sure that Opposition Members would join my hon. Friend and me in asking what is a single market without precisely that sort of liberalisation and without precisely such permission being available to non-national companies to provide such a service within previous national boundaries. My hon. Friend is right to say that the principle of the single market is at issue in this matter.

We are aware of the Spanish concern that Cenargo's proposed service might lead to unwelcome competition to Spanish ferry services on the route to Melilla. As my hon. Friend has said, Melilla has a population of about 8,000. It is a crowded port and it relies on delays for its own survival. Such gives Mellila the vestigial economic sustenance that it requires. If traffic disappeared in favour of a far more direct and sensible route between Almeria and Nador that would cause concern in Melilla.

Liberalisation cannot succeed, however, if member states are allowed to ignore binding Community legislation simply because of inconvenient internal domestic considerations. From time to time, we all have great inconveniences visited on us in the name of the single market. Most hon. Members and most British people see that as one of the prices that we must pay for the opportunities that are gained by membership of that single market. We cannot have a situation in which member states are simply allowed to ignore binding Community obligations.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be aware from my response that we take this matter seriously. I am sure that he will want to know what pressure we have brought to bear on the Spanish to comply with their Community commitments.

On 24 March, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport wrote to Señor Matutes, the European Commissioner for Transport to explain why the United Kingdom Government view this matter with such concern. We asked Señor Matutes to use his influence to persuade the Spanish Government to reconsider their policy. Failing a satisfactory and speedy resolution of the matter, my right hon. Friend urged the Commissioner to institute infraction proceedings against Spain under the terms of article 169 of the treaty of Rome. We understand that the Commission has now agreed to initiate those proceedings.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the infraction process takes a great deal of time to complete. A number of steps are built into it, quite properly, at various stages to enable the parties to those proceedings to produce considered responses. I fear that we cannot look to that process to produce a quick result. A finding that Spain is in breach, however, would be of great assistance to Cenargo in the legal proceedings on which it would subsequently embark.

That is not the totality of the representations that Her Majesty's Government have made. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also written to Mr. Borrell, who is his counterpart in the Spanish Government. The letter was delivered by our ambassador in Madrid and, in conveying that letter, our ambassador left the Spanish Government in no doubt about the significance that we attach to the matter. Our letter made it clear that the United Kingdom regards it as being of the highest importance that European Community member states fulfil their obligations to liberalise shipping services, in line with regulation 4055 and it specifically urges Mr. Borrell to intervene to permit Cenargo to proceed. I cannot tell my hon. Friend of the detail of any response to that letter, but I assure him that I will do my best to acquaint him with any subsequent developments on that front.

My hon. Friend referred to the intervention of my noble Friend the Minister for Shipping, who addressed the issue with his Spanish counterpart in the margins of the recent Transport Council. He has told me that he left his Spanish counterpart in no doubt whatever about his strength of feeling on the matter and, knowing my noble Friend as we both do, I imagine that there can be little doubt in the mind of the Spanish Government.

Incidentally, quite apart from parliamentary and ministerial colleagues, my officials also take every opportunity to make representations to their opposite numbers during normal contacts over other European Community shipping business. Our embassy in Rabat has been in close touch with senior officials in the Moroccan Ministry of Fisheries and Mercantile Marine and been assured of Morocco's support for Cenargo's proposed operation.

The House will be aware that within Europe there is the Council on Trans-European Networks, which is seeking to develop a network of European through routes, and such routes may be susceptible to funding on a Europewide basis. At a meeting in Brussels, the United Kingdom Government entered a reservation on Spain's suggested additions to the combined transport network to cover rail and sea links at Spanish Mediterranean ports for onward shipment to north Africa. The essence of Her Majesty's Government's arguments on that occasion was that a Community network should obviously include facilities that are open to all European Community operators and not only to home country operators.

It is untenable that the Spanish Government should be trying to include in a European Community network plan routes that are described as part of the trans-European network, but which are to be open only to one national carrier. Her Majesty's Government have made it clear that, in relation to the proposed Thames development, they propose to press that point strongly.

My hon. Friend has done the House a favour in allowing us to air the issue today. I hope that I have reassured him that we view the present situation with as much dismay as he does. My view, and that of my colleagues in the Department, is that Cenargo is fully entitled to expect to mount its new service without obstruction. That is just the kind of operation that Community legislation is designed to facilitate. There is every reason to suppose that it would bring substantial benefits to potential customers and to all those involved in providing the service.

We are disturbed that the problem has arisen. As I said earlier, the success of the Community depends on all member states working together, to agree effective legislation in the first place, and then implement it without discrimination or qualification. There can be no unilateral decision on whether to comply with the obligation that member states have undertaken.

The Government greatly value their relationship with Spain. We believe that the two countries' good relations have brought substantial mutual benefits in the past and can lead to more in the future. But we are concerned that an issue such as the Cenargo affair could throw that relationship off course. We believe that it is highly desirable that our two countries co-operate to the full over the many difficult transport issues that the Community faces. It would be extremely regrettable if that co-operation were to be impaired because of Spain's failure to meet its obligations over Cenargo's proposals.

I am pleased that the Commission has taken the first steps to rectify the situation. But, as I said earlier, infraction proceedings will not supply the quick remedy that Cenargo and its potential customers have a right to expect. My hon. Friend can be assured that the Government will continue to take every opportunity to bring about an early resolution to the problem and that we will continue to do so until the obstacles that Cenargo has encountered are removed.

Russia

1 pm

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): It is surprising that time has not been found in the parliamentary agenda over the past two or three weeks to discuss the momentous events that have been taking place in Russia. Unless I missed something, there has been merely one question to the Prime Minister from a Conservative Back Bencher in the past week or so. That seems strange because, according to the press, the Government have been quite active in making their views known in private to the Government of President Yeltsin and in briefing the press about them. There seems to be some conflict between what the Government said at the start of the crisis and the recent statement by the Foreign Secretary in Germany.

I will examine the origins of the crisis. It is easy for it to be portrayed as a crisis involving men grasping for power, between the Speaker of the Russian Parliament, Mr. Khasbulatov, and President Yeltsin. As is usually the case in politics, serious economic disagreements are the basis of the political rows now shaking the Russian constitution. The west has much to answer for, because of the economic advice that it gives to Russia. Harvard economists such as Jeoffrey Sachs, brilliant academics who have never run anything in their lives—not a company or even a local authority—have popped up in Russia at President Yeltsin's right hand and pontificated about how easily and rapidly the old Soviet command economy could be turned into a model of western democracy and free markets. Perhaps it would have been better if President Yeltsin had sought advice from people who had experience of running industry or a free market rather than turning to those who have broadly taken an academic approach.

None of the economies of the western capitalist societies that we consider to be successful came into being by following the classic academic approach that what one might call the neo-liberal economists have been pushing on the Russian leadership. All the present successful capitalist societies grew up behind trade barriers with degrees of Government intervention and with massive, and in some cases amazing, levels of inward investment. None of them came into being by following a textbook example. Britain built its economy behind trade barriers and the benefits that come from holding an empire. To suggest that somehow we can transform the Soviet command economy into a replica of western democracy in two or three years, or in 500 days, as one Russian economist advised ex-President Gorbachev, is nonsense.

The best record of growth in the world economy over the past 15 years has been in the People's Republic of China. In that country there have been moves towards liberalisation and, after the best part of a decade and a half, 15 per cent. of Chinese GDP could be considered to be in the free market and independent of the centralised state economy.

China has been successful because while it allowed private enterprises to grow up, it also preserved its state industries. If those industries are closed down, where will the people who are thrown out of work find the money to buy the goods that people in the emerging private enterprises are trying to sell them? The contrast between the relative success of the Chinese economic reforms and the problems in Russia is striking. If the privatisation programme is proceeded with as western academics and some western Governments urge, unemployment of 20 or 30 per cent. in Russia is likely, perhaps for the rest of the century. That will not be conducive to the green shoots of recovery emerging in Russia.

We know the debilitating effects of our small recession on our economy and unemployment; we know about people's caution and failure to spend because of fear. So the west should have given Russia and her leadership a range of advice and options, instead of which those who no longer have influence in the White House and in 10 Downing street. The people who advised Presidents Reagan and Bush and Mrs. Thatcher, and who have come close to bankrupting the British and American economies —and who have been booted out of those residences, are finding willing ears in the Kremlin, where they will doubtless successfully bankrupt the Russian economy.

Those in Russia who are paying close attention to the advice of the discredited western economists must be clearly told that those people are no longer listened to in the west: we are moving away from their lunatic free market approach. Even the British Government are moving away from it—and so are the Americans, following the defeat of President Bush and the election of President Clinton.

These are the issues around which the conflict really centres, although much of the British and western media have characterised that conflict as a simple power struggle in Russia. Boris Yeltsin is pursuing what we in the west now consider a rather discredited economic philosophy, while the Russian Parliament is taking a line that we would consider close to Keynesian. Yet the western media denounce everyone in the Russian Parliament as either Stalinists or fascists, claiming that the whole problem is due to their attempt to win power by undermining President Yeltsin.

In fact, a major economic issue is at stake and we need to tell the Russian Government that they must make up their own mind. It is not up to the west to intervene or decide the outcome of events in Russia; the Russian people themselves must resolve their crisis, which is taking place on a huge scale.

The crisis is so vast that there is not the slightest chance of Britain, western Europe or even Japan being able to come up with the amount of foreign capital investment that would be required for the west to step in and save the Russian economy. The Russians will have to do that themselves and the aid coming from the west will have but a marginal impact on their decisions.

The coverage of the crisis by the western media has done the British people a grave disservice. There were some remarkable comments in the Financial Times on Wednesday 17 March, when a leading editorial headed "The Choice over Russia" offered this jolly advice to the Russian people:

> "The west may have to choose between an anarchy created by totalitarians and an autocracy run by democrats. This choice has to be made in favour of those committed to reforming Russia ... Democracies must back even authoritarian rulers if the alternatives are worse."

That was the logic which led to the west supporting Franco decade after decade. How would we feel if we were on the receiving end of that sort of jolly advice? "Sorry, good people of Britain, the Government are not doing too well —a Labour Government might even be elected one day; the time has come to suspend Parliament and have a period of authoritarian rule."

We would call it dictatorship, and it is outrageous that well-off Financial Times editorial writers from the comfort of their Surrey mansions should pontificate in this way on the grim measures that the Russian people need to face. Those are the very sort of people who have done so well in recent years. Moreover, the popular press's depiction of events was even worse.

A remarkable amount of nonsense also appeared in much of the American press. Time said that Speaker Khasbulatov was very similar to Stalin because they both smoked pipes and came from the south. That is what passes for serious political analysis in Time, but it creates an impression and smears individuals. On Tuesday 16 March, The International Herald Tribune, in similar vein, said:

"Contrary to conventional wisdom, the economy has not caused the present crisis: While it is far from satisfactory"—— you can say that again, with the levels of unemployment—

"We are witnessing an attempt by the old Communist nomenklatura, or ruling class, to recapture power and the privileges that went with it, while using the parlous state of the economy as a pretext.

Led by an ambitious adventurer, Ruslan Khasbulatov, the chairman of the unrepresentative body called the Congress of People's Deputies, it is trying to gain by parliamentary manoeuvring what it failed to acquire by military power in August 1991."

That is the most damaging smear. Boris Yeltsin was not the only person who stood on the tanks and faced down the attempted coup in 1991. Khasbulatov stood there with him and Members of the Russian Parliament overwhelmingly opposed that attempted coup. It is nonsense so to depict events.

The reality is that elements in the west see rich pickings in the Russian privatisation programme. The International Monetary Fund's proposals for the Russian economy are devastating. That huge document, produced two years ago, proposes that Russia should be a supplier of cheap energy—coal, gas and oil—to the world markets, which would benefit our own economic prospects quite dramatically, and writes off Russian industry rather than trying to modernise or save it.

The truth is that however backward much of Russian industry might be, the choice is between reforming and modernising it, keeping people in work and building on the economy or, as the IMF wants, letting it collapse and creating a massive pool of unemployment. The report's impact on the peoples not only of Russia but of western Europe and others who wish to trade with it is potentially disastrous. That is the key: whether we are here simply to encourage a massive privatisation in Russia which offers a few rich pickings to western financial interests or whether we are seriously trying to assist the Russian people in their choices about how to modernise their economy and develop decent standards of living.

The reality was quite clearly revealed in the initial response to Yeltsin's conflict with the Parliament. The Parliament is reflecting popular concern about the economy. It is saying that the privatisation programme is going too far too fast. How can we object? We in the west are telling the Russians that they should privatise their entire economy in the next two or three years. Between 1979 and today, the British Government managed, at best, to shift 10 per cent. of our GDP from the public to private sector. What would have happened if they had done that in one go? The market could not have sustained it. There has been a slow—not as slow as many of us would have liked—shift in the economy, and even that has been difficult in many areas and has led to considerable complaints and objections. What we are proposing for the Russian people is something that we did not seek to do for ourselves when we had a Government quite capable of doing it.

The advice that has been given is disastrous for Russia. It has exacerbated the economic crisis that the Russian people face and reactionary elements in the west are advising President Yeltsin to be firm and to demolish the powers of the Russian Parliament and to go for rule by decree.

I gave notice yesterday of a specific question to which I should like an answer today. Precisely what was the advice of the British Government? Let us examine what appeared in the press. A very interesting article appeared in the Financial Times on 10 March which reported:

"In particular Mr. Kohl has passed a query from Mr. Yeltsin asking for confirmation of western political support if he is forced to introduce emergency measures in Russia."

On 12 March, Martin Walker wrote in The Guardian:

"In a message to the G7 leaders sent to Germany's Helmut Kohl, Boris Yeltsin has asked the west for a blank cheque, for a promise of continued political and economic support even if he has to bring back a Russian dictatorship, suspending parliament and ruling by decree."

That was followed by the kind of comments that I quoted earlier from the Financial Times.

I hope that the Minister will tell us what advice, formal or informal, was given by the British Government to President Yeltsin's Government and whether that reflects the more public comments from the Foreign Secretary in Germany on 29 March after Boris Yeltsin had been forced to back down by the opposition of the Russian Parliament and the Russian people. According to The Daily Telegraph of 30 March, the Foreign Secretary said:

"'We are interested in helping Yeltsin the reformer,' Mr. Hurd said in a clear warning to the Russian President that Britain's support was not for the man but for his policies. 'As Yeltsin contemplates the possibilities of rule by Presidential decree, he might comfort himself with the thought that the end justified the means. But that was the mistake made 70 years ago by the Communists,' Mr. Hurd said in reference to the early years of the Russian revolution."

That is the correct position, but it is a variance from what appeared in the press based on the usual off-the-record briefings. I am glad that we have had this debate so that the Government can, in more than just off-the-record briefings, state precisely what their position is.

I believe that the Russian Parliament is an embryonic democracy which is strengthening itself. When I went to Russia just before Christmas, I was impressed by the number of parliamentarians who were determined to make it a proper democratic Parliament. If we are to offer President Yeltsin any advice, it should be that if he is unhappy with some elements in the Parliament who were elected before the democratisation process had gone as far as it has today, he should call fresh elections.

I believe that there should be a new mandate in Russia before dramatic measures are taken. That should be the advice. President Yeltsin should build on the Parliament, strengthen it and allow the Russian people to judge the record of the parliamentarians and the president. Let them have the choice of the ballot box and say whether they support the privatisation programme and Yeltsin's economic policies or the more Keynesian line emerging inside the Russian Parliament.

[Mr. Ken Livingstone]

The way forward is to trust the Russian people, not for western Governments to conspire behind the scenes and call for the firm rule in Russia which would look suspiciously like the kind of policies that we saw in Chile under the Pinochet regime in respect of which the west played such a pitiful role, first in helping Pinochet to power and then in doing nothing to curtail his excesses.

We have a chance to help create a genuine and successful democracy in Russia. That can be achieved only if they build on the electoral system and renew the Parliament. It will not be achieved by setting the Parliament aside and having strong-man rule of the kind that we have seen across so much of the world to such disastrous effect in recent decades.

1.17 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am glad that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) has secured this debate. It is a useful opportunity for the House to reflect on the policies that we should adopt towards Russia and events within Russia as we now see them. However, I do not share the hon. Gentleman's surprise that neither the Government nor the Labour party have chosen Russia as a subject for prime-time debate. There are probably two reasons for that. First, in truth, events in Russia are very unpredictable and vary all the time. It is, therefore, very difficult to form a clear view of where Russia is going. Secondly—I share this thought with the hon. Gentleman—there is a limited amount that we can do either by assistance or by political pressure to influence the direction of the changes going on in Russia. I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that those changes are essentially a matter for the Russian people and that all the decisions of substance must be taken in Russia by Russians. Although a debate would be interesting and significant, it is true that neither we nor our friends, by our policies, will make a profound difference to what will happen in Russia.

Our support for Yeltsin is support for someone whom we believe to be a reformer. We judge him to be committed to a number of important democratic and market-oriented principles. We believe that he seeks to make Russia a democratic market economy. We believe that he wants to establish an effective and accountable system of government. We believe that he wants to provide systems that safeguard human rights and civil liberties in Russia and we believe that he wants to curb inflation, to bring the budget under proper control, to implement land reform and to privatise large and small businesses. We believe that those policies are in the interests of Russia. That is why we support President Yeltsin. We also believe that those policies are in our own interests, in that if they are implemented Russia will be a very much more comfortable neighbour than it will be if contrary policies are implemented.

None the less, we watch with concern what is happening in Russia and especially in Moscow. We are reassured by the fact that President Yeltsin has not circumscribed anybody's civil liberties. We are reassured by the fact that President Yeltsin has not introduced presidential rule, as the text of his decree makes plain. He has consistently called for the Russian people to be given a chance to decide how they are to be governed.

The hon. Gentleman referred several times to the Congress in Moscow. I believe that he was unduly kind to the Congress. It is not right to equate the Congress in Moscow with a western-style parliament. The Congress is a hangover from the Communist regime established when President Gorbachev was in power and the members of the Congress were elected under that system. It is not in the least surprising that many of them retain many of the attitudes that were then the current political philosophy. The hon. Gentleman was unduly indulgent to the members of the Congress when he referred to the economic dispute between President Yeltsin and the Congress. I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that Mr. Yeltsin's democratic credentials are more persuasive than those of his opponents in Congress. The President was popularly elected in June 1991 with 57 per cent. of the votes in a 74 per cent. turnout, a point which we should keep in mind. However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the questions are for the Russians themselves to answer.

The hon. Gentleman asked what our attitude would be if President Yeltsin gathered more and more power to himself and took on the characteristics of an autocrat. The proper response must be that we support President Yeltsin because he has supported policies of economic and political reform. We should be deeply troubled by any departure from that approach. It is not possible to speculate about what we should say if he adopted policies which, at present, must be wholly hypothetical. One can honestly say that the further that Mr. Yeltsin moved away from the principles of economic and political reform, the less we would support him. One cannot go further than that because the question is wholly speculative. Our support for Yeltsin is in his capacity as a reformer and it follows that if he ceases to be a reformer our support will fall away. The extent of the withdrawal of that support depends on the nature of his policies—all else is speculation.

One must also deal with what the west can do to assist Russia and Yeltsin in the process of reform. There are two strands of thought. The first is political support for Yeltsin and the process of reform and the second is economic support.

On political support, it is important that we continue to emphasise that Russia is a welcome partner in the western community. By that, I mean that we wish to work with Russia for a co-ordination of policy and co-operation across a broad spectrum of issues. We are, therefore, seeking to establish institutional and personal links through visits and constant dialogue. It is not coincidence that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be meeting the Russian Foreign Minister tonight. I had the opportunity, as part of the European Community troika, to go to Moscow last weekend. It is a process of trying to bind Russia into genuine discussion for the co-ordination of policy.

We welcome the positive way in which the Russian Government have worked with us and others within the United Nations Security Council. We want to thicken up those bilateral and multilateral contacts so that there is genuine harmony in policy making between Russia and her erstwhile opponents.

The hon. Member for Brent, East concentrated to a great extent on economic assistance. To some extent, I share his caution. I recognise that a profound change is being asked of Russia and it might be a degree of change that it cannot make, for the reasons that he outlined. There is, however, a weakness in his argument and I ask him to reflect on the fact that the problem is not merely that Russian industry is in the public sector and is state owned —that is not fundamental—but that it is wholly uncompetitive. The Russians are producing stuff which cannot readily be sold in western markets. That is the essential problem and Russian efforts and, to some extent, our own, must focus on that.

It is difficult to see how that problem can be tackled unless there is a fundamental change in the structure of Russian industry, which is the argument underpinning the case for privatisation and inward investment. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate the close link that must exist between the two because inward investment —bringing in new technologies, management styles and means to identify markets—will not take place if those selfsame industries are retained within the state sector by Russia. Therefore, if Russian industry is to be capable of trading in world markets, huge inward investment will be required, and that will not take place if it remains in the public sector.

On the question of aid, I state my own belief that although aid has a part to play, it is not so important as trade. What Russia requires are markets. We must recognise that and make adjustments to the policies that we have been pursuing. The United Kingdom has always been on the liberal wing of the argument—both in terms of free trade generally and in terms of enhanced market penetration.

There are also difficulties of which we must take account. The hon. Gentleman will know perfectly well the anxiety felt in this country and in France about the imports of Russian fish. Leaving aside the merits of that argument——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry, but we must move to the next debate.

Volunteer Work

1.30 pm

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): In every free nation, in every age, there is a tendency to dwell on the failings and shortcomings of society, usually at the expense of that which is good. One has only to look at the numerous stories in our media to gain the impression that thuggishness and criminal behaviour are the norm in this country. Yet it is the very fact that such activities are relatively rare that makes them so newsworthy. Paradoxically, their rarity leads us to believe that they are commonplace. But those activities in society that really are commonplace tend to be ignored. They do not get the recognition and prominence that they deserve.

It is pleasing, then, to have the opportunity of this Adjournment debate to pay tribute to the many millions of people in Britain who selflessly give up their time freely for the benefit of others. The National Council for Voluntary Organisations estimates that some 23 million people undertake some form of voluntary work each year. There are more than half a million organisations currently in this country whose existence depends largely on the generosity, time and good will of ordinary members of the public in providing help for a huge range of causes.

One need only look at some of the major charities in the United Kingdom to get an idea of the scope of the voluntary activity in this country today. Barnardos, for example, raises and spends more than £50 million each year on child care. The Royal National Lifeboat Institution, through the seemingly unending efforts of its fund raisers, provides, at no cost to the taxpayer, a totally comprehensive sea rescue service which is the envy of the world. Looking around at our hospitals, our schools, our citizens advice bureaux, we see millions of people giving their time for no reward save that of knowing that in some way they are improving the lives of others.

I think that it is easy to take for granted this huge welter of voluntary activities going on every day. We talk all too often of the great pillars that hold up our society, yet too seldom do we recognise the strength of the voluntary sector as one of those pillars, quietly touching most people and forming an important link between the individual and his or her fellow citizen. It is not just the big charitable organisations that do that. Look at the network of voluntary associations that tie people into their neighbourhood. Look at the parent-teacher associations, look at the meals-on-wheels, look at the scouts and the guides.

Within the constituency of every hon. and right hon. Member there are many hundreds, if not thousands, of active voluntary organisations. We should not forget that many of them have a laudably symbiotic relationship with the state, the latter providing some of the funding and encouragement to enable the former to mobilise volunteers to fulfil much-needed caring roles. These, surely, are some of the finest examples of genuine partnerships between the public and the private sector. Within my constituency one only has to cite the work of the Terrence Higgins Trust in its efforts to provide education to prevent the spread of HIV and AIDS and to care for those unfortunate enough to have contracted the virus. That is an excellent example of the state and private individuals working together for a common good. The funding that the Terrence Higgins

[Sir John Wheeler]

Trust receives from the Department of Health enables those volunteers to mobilise their skills to prevent the disastrous spread of this cruel disease.

I hope that, even in these times of financial hardship, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office will urge his colleagues to continue to recognise the practical and financial benefits of investing in that form of voluntary organisation. Funding from the Department of Health and, for education in our prisons, from the Home Office, is just the sort of pump priming that is needed to unleash the reserves of voluntary effort and remove the burden of those activities from the shoulders of an already overburdened state. It would not make sense to cut what, to the Government, are relatively small amounts of money for such organisations, if the Government then have to pick up the increased bills through other governmental bodies, such as the Health Education Council or local authorities.

I said earlier that people undertake those tasks for no tangible reward, yet there is no harm in recognising occasionally those who do not actively seek any recognition for their work. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has already hinted, in his Carlton club speech earlier this year, that the reform of the honours system is likely to lead to greater emphasis on rewarding those who give so much of themselves for the benefit of others. But he went further in that speech when he said:

"We need, through the honours system and other networks of recognition and encouragement to give the volunteering movement extra support".

Well, I should like today to raise an issue that would provide simple and practical encouragement to many organisations. I refer to the concept of Good Samaritanism. In essence, Good Samaritanism is a term used to describe the encouragement of indivduals to lend support to those in distress while freeing them from the discouragement brought about by the threat of potential civil action if something should go wrong.

Let me illustrate the point with an example brought to my attention by the St. John Ambulance Brigade, itself one of the two foundations of the Order of St. John of which Her Majesty the Queen is the sovereign head. The St. John Ambulance Brigade does unstinting work, both in teaching people first aid and in providing trained first aiders for public events. Indeed, many of the sporting events, fetes, and fairs that are enjoyed by millions of people throughout the country would not be possible without the wholly voluntary dedication of the St. John Ambulance Brigade. Last year, the brigade gave around 4 million hours of public duty. Its recent Breath of Life campaign gave some 100,000 people, free of charge, essential resuscitation information and techniques.

There is no doubt that the activities of the St. John Ambulance Brigade should be positively encouraged; yet in November 1988 it faced litigation in the High Court which signalled a serious threat to its activities. In brief, the bridgade had been providing first aid at a motor cycle scramble in Bedfordshire. During one race, a young man fell of his motor cycle and lay prone on the track. His father urged him from the sidelines to get back on his bike and finish the race, but he did not move. Members of St. John, having been unable to persuade the organisers to stop the race, went to his aid amid the noise and cacophony of the racing motor bikes. They asked him a series of basic questions to assess his state, one of which was whether he could move his toes—a way of testing for back injury. His replies led them to believe that he could safely be moved, and they proceeded to do this. Afterwards it transpired that the boy had suffered back injuries, which he claimed had been aggravated by the action of the St. John Ambulance Brigade. The brigade was therefore sued and was forced to fight his action in the courts. The learned judge concluded that the members of the brigade had strictly followed the indications in its first aid booklet and hence the brigade could not be guilty of negligence.

In this case, despite winning in court, costs were not awarded to the brigade's insurance company, which I believe had to pay some £50,000 for its defence. The result has been, naturally, a hefty increase in the subsequent insurance premiums. But the needless cost was not the only worring aspect of the case. The learned judge made it clear that it was the strict adherence to the first aid booklet which saved the St. John ambulance men from being found guilty of negligence. The implication of this is that a first aider, in the heat of the moment, possibly in a life-or-death situation, is protected only if he or she follows the text book to the letter.

At a time when the Prime Minister is seeking to encourage the greater involvement of people in the voluntary sector there seems here to be a positive and practical measure that can be used to remove a strong discouragement to certain forms of voluntary work.

In a number of states, both in Europe and America, there exists the legal concept of Good Samaritanism. I shall quote from the law of the state of Missouri in the United States of America. Its 1979 Act, entitled

"An Act relating to the Civil liability of physicians and registered professional members rendering emergency care and assistance", contains the following section:

"Any other person who has been trained to provide first aid in a standard recognised training program may, without compensation, render emergency care or assistance to the level for which he or she has been trained, at the scene of an emergency or accident, and shall not be liable for civil damages for acts or omissions other than damages occasioned by gross negligence or by wilful or wanton acts or omissions by such person rendering such emergency care".

I believe that this country would benefit from an adapted version of that law. I have in mind a Bill of just two clauses, the first of which might say:

"Any person who otherwise than for remuneration renders first aid or other personal care or assistance to a person injured or affected by any accident or emergency shall not incur thereby any civil liability save for gross negligence or wilful misconduct".

The second clause could state:

"A person so acting shall be entitled to the benefit of the foregoing section whether or not he or she is qualified or trained in medicine, nursing or first aid".

Such an Act, were it to be promoted, would wipe away the discouragement that currently prevails in certain parts of the voluntary sector.

I think that there is no doubt that concern for one's neighbour and knowing how to save his or her life is a part of good citizenship. Good Samaritans acting sensibly should be encouraged and should be legally protected. I urge my hon. Friend to consider seriously the possibility of introducing or supporting Good Samaritan legislation along the lines that I have described. Millions of people undertake voluntary work and none of them seeks any reward. But, similarly, none of them relishes the thought of protracted and precarious legal wranglings when he or she has acted responsibly and in good faith. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give me some reassurance when responding to the points that I have read.

1.44 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on obtaining this debate. He has raised an important subject in the House. I also thank him for his courtesy in telling me what would be the general line of his inquiry. I hope that my reply will be the better informed as a result of the courtesy that he has shown to me.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend put at the centre of his debate the St. John Ambulance Brigade. As someone who has taken part in motor sport, I understand the vital role that it plays in being there when it is needed. Perhaps all too often we take the service for granted because it is always there. One could hardly imagine a sporting occasion in Britain at which the brigade's smartly turned out uniforms and obvious awareness of what was happening were not evident. The brigade has become part of the furniture. The fact that my right hon Friend drew attention to that particular item of furniture is important.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will not mind if I presume a moment of his time to put on the record the work that St. John Ambulance does in Fylde. Mr. Michael Wren Hilton and Mr. Steve Williams have singularly dedicated themselves to that work. I took advantage of the foreknowledge that my right hon. Friend gave me of the subject of the debate to ask Mr. Wren Hilton for his thoughts on the central issue at the heart of the problem. He shares with my right hon. Friend the anxiety of St. John members. He acknowledged the relationship between the problem and public liability insurance. I shall say a word about that in a moment.

My right hon. Friend was also right to mention the concept of Good Samaritanism. I hope that in my remarks I shall not pass by on the other side of the road by ignoring any of the points that he raised. That is the essence of volunteering. The volunteer is the person who does not pass by the problem. The volunteer is the person who says, "I see a problem. What can I do to help?"

The selfless actions of the St. John Ambulance Brigade are a clear demonstration that there is a boundless pot of innate decency among most people in our society and a willingness to give and to help. In his new year message, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister touched that chord. It is a positive chord to strike at a time when, as my right hon. Friend rightly said in his comments about thuggery and crime, we must perform an important balancing act. We must recognise that all is not wrong in our society. A great deal is right, but a great deal more could be done.

I wish to spend a few moments on the technicalities as we see them of indemnity insurance and some of the risk factors to which my right hon. Friend drew the attention of the House. I fully recognise the anxieties of the volunteers who render emergency assistance. They come forward in good faith and with the greatest care. Yet they could somehow find themselves the target of litigation. I understand and share that anxiety. But I hope that the House will understand that I am, sadly, not in a position to comment on the specific case to which my right hon. Friend drew our attention.

The subject is difficult and complicated, as my right hon. Friend said. It has many legal implications. It goes wider than health care and beyond my remit as the Minister with responsibility for the voluntary sector. I accept the responsibility as rapporteur, if I may use that term. I shall comment in a little more detail on some of the points that my right hon. Friend made, but I undertake to ensure that the other parts of government who should be listening to what he says are fully appraised of his arguments.

My right hon. Friend drew attention to the subject of insurance. The position of charities engaged in community care activities is no different from that of non-charitable bodies in regard to the risk of claims for negligence. The charity trustees or charity can protect themselves and their staff and volunteers by taking out appropriate public liability insurance. Although my right hon. Friend drew our attention to some of the problems that arise when that insurance is invoked, I checked to ensure that that type of cover was generally available. I can confirm to my right hon. Friend that cover is available for those who seek it. Trustees, when taking out such insurance, should act prudently and in the best interests of the charity. They should ensure that they do not pay more than they need to and that the cover is appropriate to the risks involved.

We need to consider the questions that arise about matters of negligence, which lay at the heart of my right hon. Friend's speech. It is important to know how the law considers that issue. In some circumstances, those who act on a voluntary basis may be liable to compensate those injured as a result of their negligence, as my right hon. Friend said. As a matter of law, however, negligence comprises three legal elements—a duty of care, a duty in respect of breach of that duty and damage caused as a result of that breach.

In the case of volunteers, the first issue that arises is: do they owe a duty of care to any person injured as a result of their actions? Although the law often imposes a duty to take care not to injure others, there is no general duty to act for the benefit of others. I have put that in precise legal terms and I am glad to say that it does not inhibit the many thousands of volunteers who do care and, as my right hon. Friend rightly drew to our attention, give so generously of their time and talents.

When a person intervenes to help an injured party it is likely that a legal obligation arises to take care not to injure him further or to prevent intervention by a better qualified person. Should a situation arise in which a volunteer is held to owe a duty of care to a person injured as a result of his actions, the next stage to be considered is that of breach of duty. The standard of care, which conduct will be measured against, is that of the reasonable man. That standard may vary according to the circumstances of the case.

In terms of treatment of a road accident victim, a passer-by, who, in the absence of expert assistance, does his personal best to help, is likely to be judged by a lower standard than a person who is acting in the capacity of himself—a qualified member of a first aid organisation, albeit on a voluntary basis. Equally, I should also emphasise that the law would not see the work of the volunteers in the same light as professionally qualified medical workers. In saying that, I stress that I imply no criticism of the excellence of the work undertaken by the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to an important distinction in the perception of this matter. A victim would also have to show that he suffered as a result of the breach of duty—for example, that the volunteer caused his condition to worsen or that that volunteer prevented, in some way, his access to proper treatment. I hope that those specific comments are helpful and will act as a guideline to those who will read the debate and wonder how they or their organisations might be affected by those obligations.

My right hon. Friend gave us an outline of what he considered to be an elegant solution to the problem. It is one upon which those who read the record of the debate will want to reflect. My right hon. Friend referred to the Missouri Act, which might offer a simple way forward —as demonstrated by my right hon. Friend when he introduced his draft clauses. As far as we see it, however, that Act relies on a distinction being drawn between what is termed "gross" negligence and what might be described as "slight" or "ordinary" negligence. English law makes no such differentiation and it is important that the appropriate duty of care is exercised. It is for the courts to decide what that duty of care is. I do not want to leave this part of the debate without offering my right hon. Friend a further way forward, other than those words of observation. As the matter lies very much in the sector of health and the care that is associated with it, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health will be pleased to see my right hon. Friend and such representatives as he thinks appropriate from St. John's to discuss further the implications of what he has drawn to the attention of the House. I hope that he will take up that offer.

Sir John Wheeler: I thank my hon. Friend for that offer, which I am sure will be pursued with much enthusiasm.

Mr. Jack: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's response.

There was a great deal more in my right hon. Friend's speech on the wider issues of the voluntary sector and I shall now touch on those. In the broader context, it is perhaps worth reflecting that the Government spend £2·7 billion in the voluntary sector a year. Our focus is often on giving and not so much, as in this case, on spending. That is a substantial sum of money. It underlines the ever-growing appreciation of what the voluntary sector can contribute, in partnership with the Government, to the life of the country. One has only to look at the voluntary movement in housing to realise what a singularly important task is taken forward, by and large, by a great deal of voluntary activity. The fact that so much public money is invested in that sector underlines the importance that we attach to the voluntary contribution.

Many people ask for direct grant assistance, on which the Government spend £470 million a year in the voluntary sector. In addition, further assistance is given through taxation and my right hon. Friend will be aware that the changes announced in the recent Budget by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will further enhance that form of help. Many individual citizens find, for example, that schemes such as payroll giving and gift aid are a convenient way to make their personal statement of commitment to the voluntary sector.

I am responsible for the ministerial group for the voluntary sector. One of the issues that we have been considering, following remarks that I made at a Charities Aid Foundation annual meeting at the end of last year, is to renew the process of proofing that I asked other Departments to take into account in devising their policies. If my right hon. Friend's support for voluntary activity is to find its place in the realms of government, the Government have to continue to develop their appreciation and understanding of the effect that their policies have on the voluntary sector. We are reissuing those proofing guidelines to ensure that, as far as possible, that dimension of our public life is taken into account when other Departments are framing policies or legislation. That continual awareness can make a great difference in ensuring that the voluntary sector finds its place in partnership with government in many vital areas.

My right hon. Friend drew the attention of the House to the Prime Minister's new year initiative. I am excited by the idea, because I think that it taps into the innate goodness, the innate wish to give and to help, in our society. I can annouce that I am actively looking for ways to pursue that objective. I have it in mind to bring into the Home Office a group of representatives, organisations and individuals from the voluntary sector to sit with me and help me to take that initiative forward. That is again a way of underlining the importance of partnership, to which I attach a great deal of importance. If we are not, in simple terms, to reinvent the wheel, and instead to amplify what is there and derive great benefit for society out of that, the voluntary sector must play an equal part in developing the way forward. I am determined to see that work through.

As to my specific roles in terms of the criminal justice system, my right hon. Friend will be aware of the regard that the Home Office has for the work of the voluntary sector. For example, we have said that 5 per cent. of the probation services budget should be spent in the non-governmental sector in a spirit of partnership in dealing with offenders and ex-offenders in the community. That again underlines the importance of the voluntary sector in dealing with sometimes the most difficult of issues. It is sometimes easy for a good charity to persuade people to give, but it is much more difficult for that charity to show that it can work with difficult individuals. Organisations such as the Society of Voluntary Associates show what can be achieved.

Through our initiatives such as those on safer cities and on drug prevention, the voluntary sector is making an important contribution towards crime prevention. We in the Home Office do what we can to underline that by funding the superstructure of the voluntary sector. I am delighted that we are helping the National Council for Voluntary Organisations, the Community Development Foundation, the Volunteer Bureau and the Volunteer Centre. They all play their part in taking forward the move for greater volunteer——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We must move to the next topic.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

2 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): It is regrettable that the important subject of the channel tunnel rail link has to be raised exclusively by me on the day before we adjourn for Easter. We have not been afforded the opportunity of a full and comprehensive debate in Government time on a project which will have a major and lasting impact on the economy and the lives of the people of the United Kingdom, probably for a century or more. That is a great tragedy, bearing in mind the engineering achievement and technologies that have been developed to create that wonderful rail link under the channel. The United Kingdom will not only have a delayed London channel link, it will not have the best either.

The history of the matter is a sad tale of meanness, Government dogma, short-sightedness and political expediency, which culminated in the announcement of the route by the Secretary of State for Transport on 22 March. The line that he announced is not based on considerations of transport, geography or geology; nor is it based on primary engineering considerations. The route has been dictated by politics, principally to protect the interests of the Conservative party and to minimise its embarrassment rather than by any attempt to maximise the great engineering opportunities that are presented by the tunnel.

The tunnel history is in three chapters. First, the southerly route was canvassed. It was the swiftest way from Dover to London and had immense logic because such a route would have maximised the tunnel's opportunities for the United Kingdom. However, the then Prime Minister, Mrs. Thatcher, laid down in tablets of stone that no public money would be available for the project. As a result, the Ministers who had to decide the matter were caught between the choice of a cheap route which would cause enormous environmental damage in Kent and south-east London or one that which would have to be shifted because of the legitimate outrage of people whose homes, lives and businesses would be blighted or destroyed in those areas.

No money was to be made available for necessary tunnelling or to ameliorate harm. Therefore, there was an internal political row in the Conservative party which dictated that the swiftest and most logical route would not prevail, but, instead, a route to the east of London would have to be sought. I recognise that there are hon. Members in all parts of the House who rightly champion the interests of their constituents in this matter.

It would be hard to reach agreement in the House on the best route, but Labour Members can legitimately charge the Government with their refusal and failure to test any of the route options at an independent public inquiry or some other form of hearing such as the one held by Lord Justice Roskill into an airport some years ago. Such an inquiry would have been able to examine the best and cheapest ways of maximising the benefit of this great project for the whole United Kingdom, taking into account the limiting factors imposed by cost and environmental concerns. That is what should have happened and should still happen; instead, we have been presented with a route dictated by political considerations.

After the Government's move to look for an easterly route to minimise the political damage, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), then Secretary of State for Transport, arrived at the Conservative party conference in October 1991 to announce what he described, with much trumpeting, as an "historic" decision on the line of route. I commend to anyone interested in the history of these matters a number of articles written at the time, particularly the one by Tony Helm in the Sunday Times on 13 October of that year. Others in The Independent by David Black, Colin Brown and Michael Harrison—on 10 October—and in The Times of the same date were also instructive about the real motives for seeking the easterly route.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mackinlay: In no circumstances will I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The Sunday Telegraph article said that the then Secretary of State for Transport had decided on a southerly route. It said that he was prepared to resist all the pressures from within his party. He had pored over the decision for many months and was determined to see the southerly route through. British Rail's plan for a southerly route also looked cheaper and was far more advanced than those its rivals, including that of Ove Arup, which is broadly the route that we now have. The report in The Sunday Telegraph, which I choose to believe, went on:

"Mr. Rifkind stuck by his guns until the eve of the party conference and insisted he would not announce any decision at Blackpool but would do so as soon as Parliament returned."

Then, suddenly, on the Monday morning everything changed. Rumours circulated that the right hon. and learned Member for Pentlands had been caught in a last minute political pincer movement between the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and the right hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley), then Ministers with different portfolios from those they now hold.

It emerged that the Secretary of State for Transport was outnumbered in Cabinet and had to concede the easterly route, largely because of the looming general election which could not be long delayed. This version of events is substantiated by numerous articles of the time. The new decision was bad for the United Kingdom, but once it was given at least all the interested parties concerned—local authorities, residents, those promoting various channel tunnel projects—had some certainty. There was at last what was deemed to be a settlement of the issue, albeit inadequate. Some months later, keen readers of the Telegraph newspapers discovered that, following changes of Cabinet portfolios, the current President of the Board of Trade managed to persuade the Cabinet that the route needed to be reviewed yet again! It emerged some months ago that a major rethink was under way. It represented a betrayal by Ministers and an overturning of the former Secretary of State's decision—at enormous cost to the British people and the promoters of the channel tunnel projects.

When I challenged the Minister for Public Transport about this a little while ago he conceded that a further review of the route decided on in October 1991 was under way. He described it as a "local route variant within the broad route corridor."

It has emerged since that it is a major departure affecting large parts of Kent and my Essex constituency. It is not in the best interests of my constituents and it further dilutes the benefit that the United Kingdom can gain from the channel tunnel project. As a consequence, there is now acute blight in my constituency and other parts of the south-east. For example, people in the Pepper Hill area of Northfield in Kent fear that the route will affect their houses and make them extremely difficult to sell.

[Mr. Mackinlay]

My complaint is that the proposed line of route has never been tested at any independent public inquiry and never will be. That is undemocratic and it flies in the face of all our practices. If you, Madam Deputy Speaker, wished to put a small construction at the end of your garden, you would have to seek planning permission. If you wanted to construct an airport, you would have to seek planning permission. If your applications were refused, you would have the right and opportunity to test those refusals and argue your case at independent public inquiries. The Government and Union Railways, who are promoting the route, will deny local authorities, businesses, individuals and, indeed, the country the opportunity of testing the proposed route against normal planning, environmental or engineering criteria. That is an example of what Lord Hailsham referred to as parliamentary dictatorship. The Government will ignore the legitimate views of so many people and railroad—no pun intended—this route through, regardless of the impact that it will have.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Will the hon. Gentleman give way? It is just a short intervention.

Mr. Mackinlay: I made it abundantly clear that I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman in any circumstances.

Mr. Evans: Why? What are you afraid of?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I think that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has been here long enough to know that it is entirely within the capacity of the hon. Member who has the Floor whether he gives way or not—especially in a short Adjournment debate which, it is understood, is divided between the Member raising it and the Minister replying.

Mr. Mackinlay: On 22 March, the Secretary of State tried to reassure the House that there will be a minimum period of consultation. All the evidence shows that that is a sham—a charade. He also went on to say, and I have checked Hansard, that the consultation will be led by Union Railways, which is promoting the project and will be judge and advocate in its own court. The environmental impact will not be considered. The route will be imposed on the south-east regardless of the objections.

On the same day, the Government published a document, "Channel Tunnel Rail Link: An Independent Review". It is so independent that it was commissioned by the Department of Transport. That is somewhat cynical. Paragraph 48 of that document makes it abundantly clear that no criteria are laid down for judging the full environmental impact of such a project, despite the fact that the British Government should have laid down such criteria to fulfil the spirit and letter of the European directives on environmental impact assessments. No one will have the opportunity to say, "The Government and Union Railways are not applying the criteria that they should." As with so many other projects, the Government have proceeded slowly in laying down the criteria necessary to fulfil the European directive on environmental impact assessments.

It is a tragedy that the Ove Arup route—the easterly route—was chosen without assessing all the options at some form of independent, quasi-judicial hearing. As I have already said, if we have to have the easterly route, it is reasonable to expect the Government to be consistent and to stand by the decision taken in 1991. They have reneged on that and it is fair to ask why they have done that.

It is clear that the profit motive has become the primary, not the secondary, consideration. When I challenged someone at Union Rail about why the route had been altered to the disadvantage of my constituents, I was told that it was because the previous route, which took the line along the Dartford marshes and crossed the river Thames in the vicinity of the Kent-Essex boundary with the former Greater London council area—a proposal which was acceptable to many people—had overlooked the development potential of the Dartford marshes. There was, therefore, a need to shift the route.

I suspect also that the latest route is intended to go a little south of the area of Blue Water Park, Northfleet so as to maximise the opportunities where there is an intention to build a massive retail park. In my view, that is not a legitimate or primary reason for shaping the line of the route and I believe that it is wholly reprehensible that such considerations should enter the equation.

The route will cross the River Thames in a tunnel in the vicinity of Stoneness point. It will pass beneath West Thurrock power station which, incidentally, ceased production this week. It will emerge at ground level in the Oliver road trading estate area and then pass beneath the approach road to the Queen Elizabeth II bridge at the Thurrock-Dartford M25 crossing. This engineering exercise is breathtaking. The line will come out of the ground, pass over the approach road to the QE2 bridge, but also go through the piers of that great engineering project. That is like passing a thread through the smallest of needles. I am told that it can be done, but it is breathtaking bearing in mind that there will have to be the highest and steepest rail gradient in Europe—1 in 40—to achieve that. That wonderful fast train will have to negotiate a massive hill on its way to London. I doubt whether that has been fully and critically examined from an engineering point of view and I suspect that it is the product of the Government and Union Rail trying to rush the project through for the political reasons to which I referred earlier.

The line will then cross open land north of Van den Berghs on a viaduct crossing London road, Purfleet at the Stonehouse lane junction. It will run parallel to the Purfleet bypass on its southern side, crossing the brow of the hill of the Purfleet bypass in a cutting. It will then pass the northern edge of the Mardyke Park estate on a viaduct. The Mardyke Park estate is a very attractive, modern private residential estate in which people have invested their savings. They are very happy in that wonderful environment, but, under these proposals, they will have to endure a viaduct overlooking their properties. There will, in addition, be appalling noise consequences. The route will move on in a westerly direction towards London and merge with the existing London to Tilbury and Southend railway.

That is the position as it affects my constituents. It is grossly unfair that they should be hit in that way, with minimum notice, when the Minister confirmed in 1991 that they would not be so affected. This is a great betrayal and I make no apology for saying that it is the fault of the Conservative Government and of Conservative Members. I should like to know what help will be provided for those who are blighted. Will we have a full debate in Government time in which this whole wretched issue can be reviewed and scrutinised by hon. Members in all parts of the House? Will the Minister tell us the timing of the hybrid Bill, which will be the last opportunity for me, for my constituents and for the local authorities to try legitimately to frustrate this crazy route? How and when will Parliament be told how the project is to be funded?

The Secretary of State said that he still hoped to attract private funds. I have no objection to that for this project or for many others, but I say on behalf of the United Kingdom that the channel tunnel rail route needs to be in place as quickly as possible and that it needs to be the best. The route now being proposed is not the best. It is time the Government decided how the route, whichever one is chosen, is to be funded. They have signally failed to do that. Clearly, there will be enormous congestion on our railway network in decades to come because of the Government's failure to realise the needs of the channel tunnel project on its way to London from where it will give continental access to the rest of the United Kingdom.

I apologise for detaining the House at some length, but I point out that this is a matter of great importance to my constituents which is causing them great distress. They and many thousands of others in Kent and Essex have been treated grossly unfairly. Above all, the whole story is one of failure by the Government to do what is fair and best for the people living in Kent and Essex, and to do what is in the best interests of the United Kingdom generally.

2.20 pm

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): The one point on which I agree with the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) is that this is an important subject. I know that not only the hon. Gentleman but those of my hon. Friends who are affected by the route are concerned about this major project. I see my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) in his place and I know that he has taken a deep interest in this matter.

I was rather disappointed by the hon. Gentleman's contribution. I had hoped to be able to answer some detailed questions. What we got was a rather inconclusive, third-rate, sixth-form rant about the evils of the Conservative Government, which did not take him or his constituents any further. To assist the hon. Gentleman, I will suggest the questions that he might have asked me and which might have helped his constituents. I will then give the answers to those questions. At least there will then be a constructive contribution to this important debate. I note that my hon. Friend for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is also in her place and I know that she, too, has also taken a great interest in these matters. I see that she is breathless in anticipation of my remarks.

The thrust of the hon. Gentleman's rant appeared to be the absence of a public inquiry. The hon. Gentleman should know that, throughout the process of refining the route, Union Railways discussed the options available to those planning the route with representatives of local authorities, necessarily on a confidential basis, so that it could be sure that it was aware of the authorities' plans for the future and of other relevant matters.

Formal consultation with the authorities will take place over the next six months and it is recognised that authorities will wish to comment further from today. That consultation is vital and valuable, and it will give some scope for enhancing the horizontal or vertical alignments of the route. For the Government simply to have published all the options without stating a preference would not have been progress—it would have been going backwards. The Government want to take the project forward and to put an end to the blight that is the real enemy of the public interest in these circumstances. We want to bring about the benefits that will come with construction of the railway. There has now been an opportunity for the House to look at the details of my right hon. Friend's statement of 22 March and at the documents published in support of it.

The channel tunnel rail link, threading a route through the garden of England, across the Thames, through the edge of Essex and urban east London is an extraordinarily large project in its scope and imagination. I suggest that such a scheme cannot take place without some environmental impact. It is extraordinary that, for a 67 mile long route, the impacts are surprisingly few; only 11 residential properties are required to be demolished along the whole route. It has proved possible to produce an environmentally sensitive route which—crucially—the country can afford. It is important to appreciate the painstaking process through which the consultation process had to go to produce it.

The easterly route corridor was selected by the Government in 1991 because it has less environmental impact than other options and because it could foster regeneration in the east Thames corridor. I remind the House that there was all-party support for that choice. All the work since to optimise the route has proved that the original selection of the corridor was right. The route selected was conceived by Ove Arup and had been engineered in sufficient detail to prove its feasibility and to provide a reliable basis for comparison with the other principal options. Clearly, the selected route then had to be refined by comparing all the localised route options within a broad route corridor.

We have achieved substantial cost savings without any reduction in the level of environmental protection. The environmental standards applied are those used for other major transport infrastructure projects in this country.

On the section of the route local to the hon. Member for Thurrock, my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), all of whom are affected by the proposals, the section between Gravesham and Ford presented particular challenges because it has to include a crossing of the Thames in a fairly built-up area. Contaminated land is also an issue and there are extensive designations for nature conservation. We also had to provide for station options which will enable the east Thames corridor to reap the benefits of regeneration—and I stress the words "benefits of regeneration".

The route originally defined by Ove Arup had some significant environmental disadvantages, such as a serious impact on the Aveley marshes site of special scientific interest within Thurrock. Union Railways was duty bound to find out whether those impacts could be eliminated or reduced by local adjustment and Ove Arup was appointed as the lead consultant. It is impossible to devise a route that is devoid of environmental impact and the adjusted route for the section is described as "acceptable" by Union Railways' environmental consultants, compared with the description of "very difficult" for the alignment originally proposed by Ove Arup.

[Mr. Steve Norris]

As a result, more of the proposed route will be in Thurrock, but it is important not to base snap judgments on that fact alone and to consider the whole section from Gravesham to Ford when deciding on the preferred option. The cost saving on that section is about 15 per cent. of the cost—£70 million on £490 million—but the issue is that the route for consultation is markedly better in environmental terms.

I will deal with some of the matters affecting the constituency of the hon. Member for Thurrock. He mentioned Mardyke Park. I know the area well—the hon. Gentleman knows that we are all familiar with it. He was quoted in his local newspaper as saying that the scheme would ruin "the quality of life" for thousands of his constituents. His contribution to the debate has thus been to wipe hundreds of thousands of pounds off the values of homes on the Mardyke Park estate at one stroke. I remind him that no homes will need to be demolished in Thurrock. There will be a need for environmental mitigation measures. That has always been understood. There will also be a need to incorporate screening and whatever else may be necessary to prevent unnecessary impact on homes. It is entirely right and proper that we should consider such matters during the consultation period. I have no doubt that residents of the area will find that their concerns are met. It does the hon. Gentleman's constituents no favours whatever to turn this into a great anti-Government rant for his own party political purposes, given that it is their homes that are on the line.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): That's the trouble.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West for picking up that pearl of English usage.

The same is true of the industrial estate. The aim there will be to relocate any jobs displaced within the area. Considerable effort will be devoted to that and the rail link will also help to create substantial numbers of jobs in the east Thames corridor. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Thurrock is suggesting that there are enough jobs in Thurrock already. I have not heard him prosecute that argument before. I can tell him that my hon. Friends the Members for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and I would be more than happy to have those jobs; perhaps the hon. Member for Newham, North-West would, too.

The basic thesis that the hon. Member for Thurrock has advanced is that the whole exercise has been conducted without reference to public interest or concern. That is a false premise. The hon. Gentleman does his constituents no favours by pursuing that line. What I advise him to do in future is to consider in detail, in a properly studied and measured way——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

CARDIFF BAY BARRAGE BILL

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Amendment to the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill set out in the Lords Message of 18th March be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Hon. Members: Object.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Debate to be resumed what day?

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): Wednesday 14 April.

Commercial Whaling

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. As this is the last debate before the House adjourns, may I wish you the happiest of Easters—and long may I catch your eye.

This is not the first time that I have raised in the House the subject of the suffering inflicted on animal life by that most cruel and barbarous of all living creatures—the human being. We believe ourselves to be the highest form of life on the planet and the most intelligent of all creatures. Wrong. We are not. We are simply the most powerful life form—converting intelligence into arrogance and unspeakable brutality. Human beings are capable of scaling the heights of sublime creativity and guilty of plumbing the depths of depravity. From rape and torture in Bosnia to badger baiting in Britain, there is a continuum of cruelty which, in my darker moments, makes me believe that it would have been better had human beings never evolved from our most primitive state. I can think of nothing that we have ever achieved that compensates for the cruelty and suffering that we have inflicted both on ourselves and on other living creatures.

Among the most wondrous of all living creatures must be the great whales. They evoke awe and fascination in those of us capable of such decent feeling. They have lived on earth for some 50 million years, in perfect balance with nature until the brutal intervention of those relative newcomers, human beings. There are some 80 species of whale, dolphin and porpoise. The blue whale is the largest creature ever to have lived on the planet—more massive than even the largest dinosaur. The brain of the sperm whale is the largest to be found in any creature, including man. The song of the humpback whale is intricate and evocative and capable of being transmitted hundreds of miles through the sea. The toothed whales use a form of sonar for echo location up to 95 per cent. more accurate than the most sophisticated sonar developed by humans.

Whales great and small are highly intelligent, communal, warm-blooded mammals with complex social behaviour patterns. They deserve to be studied and cherished. There are so many unanswered questions about them. How do they manage to survive at great pressure during deep sea diving? How do they communicate one with another? They have so much to teach us, yet over the centuries we have slaughtered these gentle, harmless creatures for such worthless purposes as turning them into pet food, candles and perfume.

Even to the insensitive, exploitative human being, it eventually became evident that whales were being hunted to extinction. In 1982, the International Whaling Commission banned commercial whaling, the ban coming into force in 1985-86. Since then, more than 14,000 whales have been slaughtered by certain whaling countries—either under objections to the ban or through so-called scientific whaling. Japan takes approximately 300 minke whales each year in the Antarctic. The Norwegians started their scientific whaling in 1992 and, in the period to 1994, they intend to take some 400 minke whales.

The Norwegians now intend to go further and resume commercial whaling this year, regardless of the decision made by the IWC. It is that blatant disregard for the international community on the part of the Norwegian Government which has driven me to raise the issue this afternoon. I shall return later to the subject of Norway and its supposedly socialist and environmentally concerned Prime Minister, Mrs. Gro Harlem Brundtland, but first I want to say a few words about the method of whale killing. Cruelty starts not with the firing of the harpoon, but with the chase of the animal. It causes great stress for those creatures because it can take up to an hour or more. Sometimes, the whaling ships use sonar to confuse and scare the animal so that it comes to the surface and thus presents itself as an easier target to hit with the harpoon.

In 1980, the IWC humane killing workshop agreed on a definition:

"To cause death without pain, stress or distress perceptible to the animal."

At the same IWC workshop in 1993, the pro-whaling nations said categorically that such a definition could not be achieved in whaling operations. The solution, therefore, to people like myself, the Minister and others is simple, obvious and logical. If whales cannot be killed humanely, they should not be killed at all.

Despite all that, the slaughter still goes on. Japan and Norway are probably the worst offenders, followed by Iceland, but there are others. Japan and Norway attempt to camouflage their limited commercial whaling by calling it scientific whaling. It is a perversion of the word "scientific". It is rather like Dr. Josef Mengele experimenting on live human beings in Nazi concentration camps in the name of science.

What do those countries discover in their scientific whaling? When they have slaughtered the whales, they find that there are fewer whales in the sea than when they started. What happens to the meat? Surprise, surprise—if you happen to have a preference for whale meat, Madam Deputy Speaker, which I know is anathema to you as it is to me, that meat can be purchased in good restaurants in Tokyo and in supermarkets in Oslo. So much for scientific whaling.

What sort of cruelty are we actually talking about? The weapon used to kill whales is an explosive harpoon. Its head has two or four barbs, to which is screwed an explosive grenade. As the harpoon enters the body the grenade explodes, scattering whatever organs and tissue with which it happens to make contact. For the hunting of minke whales, the species now targeted by whalers, a different explosive has been developed for use in the harpoon. It is called penthrite—a powerful explosive that damages less of the whale meat than traditional explosive harpoons. Whales are mammals with a highly developed nervous system, comparable in many ways to that of land mammals, including man. Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that they are capable of feeling pain to the same extent.

I want now to return to the determination of Norway to recommence open commercial whaling later this year. In February, at the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg, the Norwegian Prime Minister, Mrs. Brundtland, addressed us. There were questions afterwards. I and two Conservative Members—one from the House and one from the other place—together with a German Member of Parliament asked why Norway was determined to ignore an international agreement on whaling. At that point, Mrs. Brundtland went nuclear. She gave us a long, rambling, incoherent, inaccurate and, indeed, devious reply. I have circulated copies of it to hon.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

Members. In my opinion, Mrs. Brundtland, who parades her green credentials around the world to polite applause from liberal-minded audiences, is nothing short of a hypocrite.

Mrs. Brundtland accused the IWC of being unscientific in its use of evidence to protect the North sea stock of minke whales. In 1991, the scientific committee of the IWC concluded that the north-east Atlantic minkes had been continuously declining throughout Norwegian whaling between 1953 and 1983. Norwegian scientists did not contest that fact. Mrs. Brundtland then accused the IWC of breaking its own rules, but Norway's killing of minke whales with explosive harpoons actually contravenes Norway's animal welfare regulations.

Having not succeeded up to that point, Mrs. Brundtland then resorted to the most bankrupt of all arguments. It was given to her by one of her officials, almost as an afterthought, and it would have been better had she not mentioned it. She said that whales had to be controlled because they eat too many fish. The depletion of fish stocks has nothing to do with whales and seals but everything to do with overfishing by man. I have heard the Minister speak about the matter on many occasions in the House and elsewhere. The answer lies in factory-ship fishing and the mismanagement of fish stocks. Before intensive fishing methods were employed, the seas teemed with all fish species. There was no fish shortage; nor was there a whale shortage. Whales were not endangered before the activities of purblind, stupid human beings intervened. If Mrs. Brundtland does not understand that, I believe her to be a total fool.

Whales are migratory creatures. They do not belong to any one nation or to any group of nations. They belong to the planet and in that sense they belong to us all. No body and no nation has a right to kill them, especially not in defiance of international agreements. Neither Norway nor Japan has any economic justification for killing whales. After all, they are two of the wealthiest countries in the world.

I ask the Minister to say what action we should take against Norway if it goes ahead with commercial whaling. If I had my way, I would give the crews of the whalers five minutes to leave their ships and then I would blow them, the ships, out of the water. I suspect that the Minister might not wish to go so far on this occasion. I hope, however, that he will take an aggressive stand in respect of the Norwegians.

I put a question to the Prime Minister recently on whaling. It was a gentle question and I hoped that it would be given a helpful reply. I could have been my usual, aggressive person and gone for his throat. I had some good questions at the back of my mind. To myself, I said, "No, the right hon. Gentleman is a decent sort and he will no doubt say something helpful." He did not. I then regretted having asked him such a gentle question. I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would oppose Norway's application to join the EEC if it persisted with its decision to resume commercial whaling. He just passed over the question. Unfortunately, his reply was not as good as the responses that I have been getting from his Ministers. Worse than that, the Prime Minister's answer was reported in the Norwegian press and taken up by Norwegian politicians on the basis that the British Government did not mind very much if the Norwegians went ahead with commercial whaling. That is how the right hon. Gentleman's answer was translated in the Norwegian press. I hope that the Minister will rectify the situation this afternoon and make the British Government's position clear so that no one can misinterpret their views. On this occasion, the Government will be speaking for us all.

As I have said, I think that the Minister must be pushed into taking an aggressive stand against Norway. There should be no negotiation with Norway over its European Community application should commercial whaling recommence. Appropriate sanctions should be taken on Norwegian fish exports by all the Community nations. Norwegian ships should be banned from European Community waters. I should like to see a ban placed on all Norwegian exports, including oil and gas. The country must be made to pay if it is to defy world opinion. I am sure that animal welfare organisations will organise boycotts and demonstrations against Norway should commercial whaling recommence.

I say in a calculated way that Norwegian embassies in several European countries will undoubtedly become a focus for protest. All the public relations companies that the Norwegian Government are busily and, I understand, unsuccessfully trying to retain will not be able to repair the enormous damage to Norway's image should it defy the great weight of public opinion in Europe and north America.

The British Government should not stop there. We still have to deal with Japan, which has continued to defy world opinion and the IWC for many years now. Worldwide measures must be taken to protect the whale.

I shall ask the Minister some specific questions. If he cannot answer them this afternoon, I will ensure that they reach him in written form so he can give me a considered response. Apart from myself, many citizens of this country and of others will be interested to hear his response. I believe that the United Kingdom should support the proposal of France that there should be a sanctuary in the southern oceans, including Antarctic waters. I received a welcome letter of support from the Falklands Islands Government. It was a thoughtful response and I will send a copy of that letter to the Minister.

The United Kingdom Government must rigorously and publicly oppose moves to reopen commercial whaling under the new revised management procedures. We must oppose it on the ground of cruelty. The British Government's voice must be heard unequivocally on the matter. We must not surrender to Norwegian and Japanese demands in order to save the IWC. That would be like giving way to terrorist demands.

Norway might be pushing for a negotiated position on the revised management procedures rather than seriously contemplating quitting the IWC. We must call Norway's bluff. Voting in the IWC must remain on the basis of requiring a three quarters majority. One knows that the Japanese are trying to secure voting on a simple majority basis and, I understand, busily buying up the votes of smaller countries to achieve that. It would be contrary to the convention to allow that to happen. Again, I hope that the British Government will speak out loudly on the matter.

Norwegian and Japanese Governments are spending huge sums of money on pro-whaling propaganda and a misinformation campaign. It all started with Mrs. Brundtland herself. It is essential that non-whaling Governments such as ours challenge the campaign and do not simply leave that challenge to the non-governmental organisations which are doing so much sterling work but lack the authority that a sovereign Government can bring to their statements.

There is enormous all-party opposition in the House to the whaling activities of Norway and Japan. The British Government must reflect that opinion in their dealings with those two wickedly misguided countries. I have spoken on the issue before in the House. I have spoken in previous Adjournment debates. I have always had a good response from the Government because they know the depth of feeling in the House and in the country.

But we seem to be getting nowhere with Norway and Japan. We must not allow them to defy civilised opinion in Britain, north America and the European Community. They must take some hard lessons. I hope that the British Government will start the process of delivering hard lessons and will protect those wonderful creatures, the whales. I hope that the British Government will tell the Norwegians and Japanese that they will not be allowed to kill the whales.

2.46 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): This is the third time that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and I have discussed this matter in the House. As I listened to him, I looked at the "BBC-Vacher's Guide to the New House of Commons". For the hon. Gentleman it says:

"Interests (Political) No details.
Interests (Personal) No details."

Vacher's cannot have been listening in the past few years to the hon. Gentleman's real concerns on environmental matters.

As the hon. Gentleman said, we have never had a disagreement of any significance. That will be the case today because the British Government take the view that they take not to reflect opinion within or outside the House, but because they share that opinion. They are not merely running in front of the crowd. We believe largely what most people believe about whaling.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Norwegian claim about fish stocks. He will be interested to know that, in the talks on the enlargement of the Community and bringing in the European Free Trade Association countries, projections were made of fish stocks. The Norwegians project a sustained increase and improvement in the cod stocks in the north Atlantic. So clearly, whatever depredations may be inflicted on the fish stocks, they do not stop the stocks showing a sustained improvement. We, too, benefit from that improvement.

I begin with Norway and the link with the enlargement of the Community because that was the main thrust of the hon. Gentleman's speech. As he knows, Norway has applied for membership of the European Community. Indeed, it applied before the referendum eventually went against membership. The EC has agreed to the habitats directive. That directive comes into force in May 1994. Under the directive, all species of cetaceans will be protected in the Community's territorial waters up to 200 miles. That includes whales.

All trade in whale products throughout the Community is banned under the EC CITES—Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species—regulations. Therefore, the cumulative effect of the agreements is a whaling ban in Community waters. There is no other way of interpreting them. When Norway comes into the Community it seems to me inconceivable that the Community would wish to relax that ban. Therefore, Norway has applied to join an organisation which bans whaling. In forthcoming negotiations, public and governmental attention will be focused on Norway and I cannot imagine that a proposal to change that situation would be readily negotiable. In one sense, Norway is moving towards a situation in which its freedom of manoeuvre is largely circumscribed. That is to be welcomed.

The remarks of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister do not in any way represent a dilution of the Government's stand. I have looked hard at what my right hon. Friend said and what has been said previously, and what I am saying has my right hon. Friend's agreement, as it does of every member of the Government. It is not the case that anyone in the Government is going soggy on this issue.

The issue of whaling unites the House and public opinion. It is timely for the hon. Gentleman to raise this matter now because the International Whaling Commission meets in Kyoto next month. Many issues are on the agenda and it is bound to cover the question of the future of Norwegian whaling and its access to the Community. Our position is clear: we will not even begin to contemplate commercial whaling unless a series of essential preconditions are met. First, the stocks should be in a healthy state, based on the very best scientific evidence available. Secondly, we should be satisfied about the humaneness of killing whales. As the hon. Gentleman said, we are a long way from obtaining satisfaction on that. I shall go into more detail on that, despite the fact that it is a gory subject, as the hon. Gentleman would recognise. Thirdly, full, effective and transparent means of monitoring and observing whaling operations which command international respect should be in place. We have not even started to elaborate that dossier and the Kyoto meeting will take the first steps towards that.

There is an argument about the state of the stocks and the scientific evidence about them. One's decision about whether they are sustainable is based on whether one wants to hunt them and is a function of that hunting. As to the humaneness of the killing and effective monitoring, we are nowhere near reaching a decision to the effect that we might wish to bring the moratorium to an end.

We have been a firm supporter of the moratorium on commercial whaling and we played an important role in getting it agreed. It was established in the 1985-86 season and it can be overturned only by a three quarters majority vote. The United Kingdom has no intention of lending itself to any manoeuvre to dilute that vote. As the hon. Gentleman said, certain members of the International Whaling Commission use their wealth—I put it no better than that—to influence the votes of less important members of the commission, who have no effective interest in whaling and whose membership of the commission stems from historical reasons.

That moratorium was long overdue because the former management procedures were discredited. The state of the stocks were giving rise to serious concern, although many of the great whales, which had been seriously over-hunted, had been protected since the 1960s and, in some cases, from even earlier. The remaining stocks of the commercial species were, however, under immense pressure.

[Mr. David Curry]

We have also taken a strong stance on the question of humane killing. We played a major part in getting the so-called "cold" or non-explosive harpoon banned by the IWC. We have consistently pressed humaneness issues in the commission and we promoted a three-day study of them at the previous commission meeting in Glasgow. We secured a consensus for the 11-point action plan to promote further investigation into equipment, methods, times to death and other similar difficult details, including improvement in the analysis and presentation of past and present data on whaling and regular progress reviews. As I said, we believe that the present methods have a long way to go before they could even remotely be described as humane. Enormous concern remains about the time of death and secondary killing methods such as using rifles and cold harpoons to dispatch the whales that have not been killed quickly.

It is equally true that we must have credible, open and thoroughly effective schemes for observation and enforcement, plus minimum data standards, and we do not believe that we can rely on national inspection by the whaling nations alone. That would not be acceptable. Although the hon. Gentleman did not mention it, we are equally concerned about the Faroese whale hunt and we know what public opinion is on that. We were active in Glasgow in that respect, trying to focus concerns over that fishery and seeking improvements in the killing methods and linking that with the general resolution on humane killing. We have consistently pressed for significant improvements in that conduct, through the commission, and we will continue to do so. We look for a positive response to last year's resolution.

A number of issues will have to be discussed in Kyoto. The first is the maintenance of the moratorium on commercial whaling. The preconditions have not been met. We are keenly interested in the proposals for the whale sanctuary circling the polar regions. As the hon. Gentleman knows, they were submitted too late for consideration at the last commission meeting, but will come forward this time. That is an interesting and challenging approach and we see strong parallels with the United Kingdom's approach, which was adopted at the commission last year, based on global environmental threats and the way in which those can impact on cetacean stocks and their management.

We also wish to promote another aspect, which may be one of the best ways forward—ecotourism, or allowing people to go to look at whales. In other words, whales can be used in a way that will allow people to benefit from that remarkable creation. It is a non-lethal alternative to commercial whaling. It could be a commercial industry. It is fast growing. We reckon that in 1991 it generated an income of £185 million world wide. That is a perfect form of co-existence between human beings who have a fascination for the creatures and the creatures themselves. It will also generate income for communities that were dependent on whaling.

We must make further progress on humane killing. Japan and Norway have been put on notice and detailed work on the further protection of small cetaceans is required to build on the success of a number of United Kingdom co-sponsored resolutions last year which highlighted those threatened species. We have kept in close touch with the environmental groups connected with whales and their protection and conservation. The Department has already had meetings with organisations such as Greenpeace, the Environmental Investigation Agency, the RSPCA and the World Wide Fund for Nature. Some of them were represented on our delegation last year and my right hon. Friend the Minister is due to meet them later this month in the run-up to Kyoto. We look forward to participation and continuing close co-operation in Kyoto and beyond.

As my hon. Friend said—on the last day of the term, on this issue, perhaps we might be permitted to breach the normal conventions—Norway started a major scientific whaling programme last year. Substantial numbers of minke whales have been taken and there were failures in harpoon technology. The scientific programme was strongly criticised by the commission last year in terms of both its purpose and scale. Norway declared at the beginning of last year's meeting that she would start commercial whaling this year, whatever decisions were taken by the International Whaling Commission. It has been suggested that Norway could retune the IWC computer catch limit model to produce the numbers of minke whales that it wanted. One has to be careful, if one cannot get the external evidence to suit one, not to start playing around with the numbers that come up on the screen.

We find Norway's claim incomprehensible, as the hon. Member has said, coming from a nation which prides itself on its environmental record and its declared wish to work through and not against international organisations. Therefore, Norwegian actions have been condemned here and abroad and have clearly cost Norway's reputation dear. It is curious that a nation which most people would regard as a model for a certain concept of international responsibility should depart from that for an industry, which, looked at objectively in the light of Norway's declared aims for her future, seems to be incapable of being sustained in any case. That seems counterproductive, self-destructive and short term.

We are clear that Norway's actions are incompatible with Community regulations on whales, on the protection of species under CITES and with the habitats directive. The Commission takes the same view on the de facto ban on whaling and we have made it clear to Norway that she has to accept this as part of the aquis of coming into the Community. In practice, Norwegian accession would mean the end of Norwegian whaling in EC territorial waters and the end of any possibility of trade in whale products. We can at least look forward to that as an important step on the way to ending this practice.

The motion having been made after half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock till Wednesday 14 April, pursuant to the Resolution [1 April].

House of Commons

Wednesday 14 April 1993

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

NEW WRIT

For Newbury, in the room of the hon. Mrs. Sybil Judith Chaplin, deceased.—[Mr. David Lightbown.]

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Russia

1. Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Russian Foreign Secretary over the last four weeks on relations between the United Kingdom and Russia; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met Mr. Kozyrev in Moscow on 2 April, and will see him in Tokyo tomorrow, with our G7 partners. I also met Mr. Kozyrev in Moscow on 27 March. Our relations with Russia are excellent. In our contacts we have repeated our support for the economic and political reforms which President Yeltsin and his Government have pursued.

Mr. Ancram: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that full reply. Will he assure the House that, at this time of considerable political uncertainty in Russia in the lead-up to the referendum, he and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will make it clear to their counterparts that future aid, both technical and economic, from this country in particular and the west in general will be contingent on continued economic and political reform, continued improvements in human rights and swift withdrawal from the Baltic states?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The purpose of supporting economic change in Russia is, at least in part, to support the process towards genuine political pluralism. Therefore, we want to make it plain to all that our support is dependent on that continued process; at the same time, we want to ensure that such economic aid as we make available is most likely to underpin a genuine restructuring of the economy.

Mr. Winnick: Is there full agreement between Russia and Britain on the need for substantial progress in South Africa? Have the Russian Government and the British Government come to the conclusion that what happened over the weekend—the tragic assassination of Chris Hani—was a terrible disaster? I hope that the British Government will make their views known clearly and publicly as soon as possible. Does the Minister agree that it should be made perfectly clear that the peace process in South Africa should continue—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is totally out of order. The question relates to relations between the United Kingdom and Russia. If the hon. Gentleman has a question directed to that subject I shall hear it, but he must not abuse the House as he is doing.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Minister agree that both Russia and Britain should come to the conclusion that the peace process in South Africa should continue as quickly as possible?—[Interruption].

Madam Speaker: Order. We will now move on. I call Mr. John Marshall.

Know-how Funds

2. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the know-how funds available for eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The purpose of the know-how fund is to support economic and political reform in central and eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union and the Baltic states. Since the fund was launched in 1989, we have spent more than £100 million. The budget for 1993-94 is £54·3 million.

Mr. Marshall: May I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer and congratulate the know-how funds on being much more cost-effective than the European bank for reconstruction and development, the excesses of which are an affront to the people and the taxpayers of this country?

Mr. Hogg: I shall certainly accept that compliment in the spirit in which it was tendered.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister know that the President of Lithuania, the governor of his bank and others are in this country at the moment searching for more help from the know-how funds and generally? Does the Minister accept that now is the time for such help to be given while those countries are on the path to democracy and seeking to remain with the west? If the Government wait too long, there may be disaster.

Mr. Hogg: I certainly agree that economic aid plays an important part in underpinning and supporting political reform. However, it is important to keep in mind the fairly limited nature of the know-how funds and their principal purpose, which is the transfer of technical know-how. That said, if the Lithuanians have proposals that they wish us to consider, I shall be willing to have them examined.

France

3. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on relations with France.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): We enjoy close and friendly relations with France based on many shared interests, included membership of the European Community, the Security Council, NATO, the Group of 7 and many other international organisations. In recent years close practical co-operation has increased as a result of the world-wide role of our two countries. We expect the close relationship to continue with the new Government.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is there not something faintly disreputable about a country which expects to be able to export a high proportion of the food that it produces but which takes minimal action against its own producers when they burn lorry loads of live English lamb and wreck consignments of fish? Should we not gently tell our French partners that they have no right to deny European consumers, who already subsidise them through taxes, a wider and freer choice of food by trying to wreck the GATT round which has been so painstakingly negotiated and which is so near to a successful conclusion?

Mr. Garel-Jones: France is our third largest trading partner. My hon. Friend is right in the sense that France has not only a population similar to that of the United Kingdom but similar consumer interests. I certainly believe that the French stand to gain more from an open market approach than from the sort of protectionist approach that my hon. Friend mentions. We have no reason to believe that the French Government are about to adopt protectionist policies. The new Government have inherited some difficult policy decisions but remain committed to working within the European Community framework for a successful conclusion to the GATT round.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that it is no wonder that France has friendly relations with Britain when we consider that its trading surplus with us is very large and that we are running a trade deficit with France? Part of the reason for that is that we subsidise French electricity and then kindly buy an amount equivalent to about 6 million tonnes of coal. If this Minister and the Tory Government had any guts at all, they would tell the French that we intend to cut the interconnector and save the British pits.

Mr. Garel-Jones: This Minister and this Government believe in free trade. It is our intention and our policy, wherever possible, to ensure that the British consumer gets the best value, whether in energy, food or in any other matter.

European Foreign Policies

4. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next proposes to have discussions with his European Community partners concerning the development of common European foreign policies.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We meet our European partners regularly to discuss the strengthening of intergovernmental co-operation on foreign policy.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the foreign affairs and security provisions in the Maastrich treaty build on the concept of political co-operation, which was an important part of the Single European Act? Does he further agree that this country has played a major part in the development of that political co-operation?

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. European political co-operation and the single market were two of the great achievements of the Single European Act. The Government have played and will continue to play a forward role in European political co-operation and in the common foreign and security policy when it is set up after ratification of the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Does the Minister agree that those of us who support ratification of the Maastricht treaty must be mindful of the criticisms being made of western Europe and the European Community—by, among others, Baroness Thatcher last night—in relation to the tragedy in the former Yugoslavia? Will the Minister take the opportunity to remind the House and others outside that what that means is that we must ratify Maastricht, build on those provisions and move towards a more united and coherent defence and foreign policy for the European Community as a whole so that tragedies of that nature within our own perimeter of influence can be much more urgently addressed?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that he hopes for a peaceful settlement in Yugoslavia. That rests on the Vance-Owen initiative, which has been strongly supported by the European Community and this Administration.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to discuss with his opposite number in Paris the possible withdrawal of General Philippe Morillon from his United Nations command in Bosnia? Will my right hon. Friend pay tribute to that highly controversial general, who, none the less, has shown great dedication to the cause of the United Nations and whose courage is exemplary?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall be travelling to Paris on Friday to meet my new opposite number. I will not hesitate to pay tribute to the courage and dedication of General Morillon.

Dr. John Cunningham: Does the Minister accept that, where possible, European Community foreign policies should be welcome and effective? In that connection, will he work with our European partners to construct a common foreign policy towards South Africa, and particularly to assist in progress towards a democratic, non-racial South Africa? Should not Europe unite in condemning the appalling brutal murder of Chris Hani, which is a tragedy for the whole of South Africa? Should we not also welcome the statesmanship of Nelson Mandela in appealing for calm and continued progress and work towards a democratic, non-racial South Africa?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I certainly join the right hon. Gentleman in applauding the approach that Mr. Mandela has taken. I think that Mr. Mandela and this Government are right to believe that the best tribute to the man who has been assassinated is to continue to pursue the peace process. Certainly the European Community, through the election monitors it has sent and the police training it has offered, is supporting the democratic forces for change in South Africa.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Returning to the question put by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), does my right hon. Friend agree that what is needed is not just the courage shown by the French general and many of the troops of all nations in the United Nations force in the former Yugoslavia, but to build on the emotional demands for a rational way forward so that we make matters not worse but better?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. Like me, he will not be surprised that many Members and also people outside the House feel very strongly about what is going on in the former Yugoslavia, given the horrific nature of the events taking place there. Nevertheless, the course that the Government and the European Community have pursued—that of support for the Owen-Vance initiative, difficult furrow though it is to plough—is the right one.

Middle East

6. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps he is planning in support of the middle east peace process.

10. Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the middle east peace conference.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The American and Russian co-sponsors of the middle east peace process have issued invitations to a further round of bilateral negotiations in Washington on 20 April. The Israelis have accepted the invitation. The Arab parties are in Washington this week for consultations, which we hope will result in their agreement to resume negotiations.

Mr. Watson: Will the Minister join me in welcoming the acceptance by the Israeli authorities of the appointment of Mr. Feisal Husseini as leader of the Palestinian delegation to the peace talks? Does the Minister accept that that gives at least some hope of a way forward, particularly as Mr. Husseini is from east Jerusalen and is a resident of that city? In terms of legitimising the position of east Jerusalem as an occupied territory, in line with EC policy, can the Minister confirm that one way to move forward the peace talks would be for President Clinton to urge the Israeli authorities to adopt resolutions 242 and 338 so that the peace talks could begin to move forward in a meaningful way?

Mr. Hogg: I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Feisal Husseini a little whole ago. I certainly recognise the important role that he plays in the peace negotiations and I welcome any step that promotes that role. As to resolutions 242 and 338, it is important for all of us to recognise that negotiations within the peace process must move forward on the basis of those two Security Council resolutions.

Mr. Streeter: While recognising the frustration of many Palestinians, does not my right hon. and learned Friend roundly condemn the recent murderous attacks on Israeli citizens and soldiers in parts of the occupied territories? Does he agree that that does not contribute to the peace process? Will my right hon. and learned Friend continue to put pressure on moderate Palestinian leaders to reduce the level of violence and give peace a chance?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes a very real point. About 69 Palestinians and 22 Israelis have been killed since the beginning of this year. That is lamentable. Escalating violence is something that we all deplore as strongly as we can, and it reinforces the importance of all the parties getting back into bilateral talks as speedily as possible.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The Minister will have seen reports in the press at the weekend of the death of Mohammed Suweiti, a citizen of Hebron, who was unable to travel from Hebron to Jerusalem for essential hospital treatment because of the closure of the west bank. Does the Minister not agree that the closure of the west bank and the division of the occupied territories into three is itself a form of collective punishment? If we are to encourage the Palestinians to return to the peace table, does the Minister agree that one of his roles is to seek assurances from the Israeli Government that they, as an occupying power, accept their responsibilities under the fourth Geneva convention?

Mr. Hogg: On the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question, yes, indeed—the fourth Geneva convention applies to the occupation by the Israelis of the occupied territories. To take the hon. Gentleman's question more broadly, he is right indeed to deplore the fact that both Gaza and the occupied territories have been closed and that the flow of occupants of those two areas into Israel where previously they worked is very restricted. That will not promote a peace settlement. We need to do all that we can to persuade the Israelis to lift the burden of the occupation.

Mr. Rathbone: In the light of the Palestinian slaughter and the deportation of Palestinians from Israel, can my right hon. and learned Friend tell us how the talks with representatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation are going?

Mr. Hogg: I am not quite sure to which group of people my hon. Friend is referring at this point. What we want to do is to see all the parties to the bilaterals return to those bilaterals as speedily as possible. That means accepting the invitation to attend on 20 April.

Mr. George Robertson: May I reinforce two of the points that the Minister has made to the House? First, I join him in condemning all the violence in the occupied territories and in Israel, wherever that violence comes from; none of it helps the peace process, nor will it lead to an ultimate solution for either side. Secondly, I join him in welcoming the reports that the Israeli Government are willing to recognise that Mr. Feisal Husseini, a resident of east Jerusalem, should be given his rightful position as the spokesman and leader of the Palestinian community in those talks. That would be a step forward—as would the rumoured move by the Israeli Government to allow some long-standing exiled deportees to return to their native land for the first time in many years. As the Minister pushes the urgency of the middle east peace process further and further up the agenda, notwithstanding all the competition that it faces, will he ensure that the Israeli Government comply both with international law and with international civilised standards so as to ensure that whatever punishment they mete out to the civilian Palestinian population is not so disproportionate as the present decision to close off the occupied territories seems to be?

Mr. Hogg: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his first two points and for the support that he has given the Government. I agree entirely about welcoming the possibility of allowing people who were deported some considerable time ago to return to Israel and I agree with the general point about the proportionality of any response to acts of violence, but it would be very much easier for the Israeli Government to make progress in the talks if the violence being committed by the Palestinians were to stop.

Mr. Batiste: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the peace process in the middle east would be much enhanced if all middle eastern states signed the international convention banning chemical weapons and had equal opportunities to participate in the watchdog organisation set up under that convention? What steps is he taking to promote that process?

Mr. Hogg: The point that my hon. Friend makes about the chemical convention, in particular—and, by implication, weapons of mass destruction in general—is wholly correct. We want all the parties to ratify, and thereafter implement, the chemical warfare convention. We must work to achieve the removal from the middle east of weapons of mass destruction, but those desirable and essential objectives are unlikely fully to be achieved unless and until there is a general settlement within the framework of the current peace process.

Maastricht Treaty (Danish Referendum)

7. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Danish Government about the forthcoming referendum on the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed this and other issues with the Danish Foreign Minister, Mr. Helveg Petersen, in London on 22 March.

Mr. Salmond: Did the Foreign Secretary at any stage communicate to his Danish counterpart the view held by Members both for and against Maastricht and also substantially by people outside the House—that Maastricht is exactly the sort of constitutional issue which should be decided by the people in a referendum? Is there any prospect of the Government accepting that strong viewpoint and changing tack, or will they merely depend on Labour Front-Bench spokesmen to bail them out in the vote next week?

Mr. Garel-Jones: No, there is no such prospect: the Government, like previous British Governments, will depend on the will of the House.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Has the Minister been able to clarify whether it remains the position of the Government that they will not seek to invite the House to approve the Third Reading of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill until after the Danes have had their second referendum? Is that still the position?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Yes, that remains the position.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister recall that in a recent written answer he stated that the obligations placed on Denmark by the treaty on European union signed at Maastricht were not changed by the decision reached intergovernmentally at Edinburgh? In that case, will not the question that the Danish people have to answer on 18 May be substantially, if not exactly, the same as they answered previously?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I recall that answer, but the question put to the Danish people and the answer that they give are matters for the Danish Government and the Danish people and not for me.

Hong Kong

8. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Governor of Hong Kong's constitutional proposals for the colony.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): We support the Governor's proposals for broadening democracy in Hong Kong. We have long wanted to hold discussions with the Chinese Government on these proposals with the aim of achieving a smooth transition in 1997. We and the Chinese Government announced yesterday that talks on these issues will start in Peking on 22 April.

Mr. Coombs: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fact that talks are now resuming with China vindicates the firm position taken by the Governor of Hong Kong on extending democracy in Hong Kong? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that representatives of the Hong Kong community will be at the negotiations, and will he ensure that the Chinese do not use the negotiations as a means of prolonging the process to prevent the introduction of the electoral law and the widening of democracy in the 1995 elections in the way that the Governor wishes?

Mr. Goodlad: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. As we have said, the talks are between the two sovereign powers. The British representative will be Sir Robin McLaren, Her Majesty's ambassador in Peking. Other officials from the British and Hong Kong Governments will participate in the talks in exactly the same way as they have in the past.

On the question of timing, we and the Hong Kong Government need to have legislation in place in good time for the district board elections in 1994 and the Legislative Council elections in 1995. We therefore want quick progress, but there is quite a lot of difficult ground to cover.

We are going into these talks with the aim of reaching an understanding, but not at any price. It remains an essential point for us and the Governor that elections held under British administration should be fair, open and acceptable to the people of Hong Kong.

Dr. Bray: Is it the Government's intention to continue to consult widely the people of Hong Kong, including their elected representatives in the Legislative Council, during the progress of the talks with China?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Can my right hon. Friend tell the House whether he feels that the Chinese Government are keeping to the letter and spirit of the treaty between the Government and the Chinese Government on the handover of Hong Kong's sovereignty in 1997? Judging from China's record so far, does he believe that China will keep to the treaty after the handover? Do we have any way of renegotiating the treaty or getting out of it if we feel that China is not meeting its obligations?

Mr. Goodlad: The Chinese leaders say that they will abide by the joint declaration and the Basic Law. Under the joint declaration, we are of course responsible for administering Hong Kong until July 1997.

Mr. Rogers: We warmly welcome the recommencement of talks as laid out in the proposals announced yesterday. However, may I say that we hope that, during future negotiations, the minimal democratic propositions put forward by the Governor are at least adhered to and that, in whatever negotiations come about, the people of Hong Kong will finally have a say, rather than the British Government alone?

Mr. Goodlad: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. As I said, our aim is to reach an understanding with China on arrangements to ensure that the elections will be fair, open and acceptable to the people of Hong Kong. If we reach an understanding with China, the British and Hong Kong Governments will recommend it to the Legislative Council and it will be for it to pass the necessary legislation.

Bosnia

9. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's involvement in Bosnia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Britain is playing a major role in efforts to restore peace in Bosnia and to provide humanitarian relief for millions of civilians caught up in the conflict. We are the largest single national troop contributor to the United Nations protection force in Bosnia, escorting relief convoys. Our troops and aid workers are doing a magnificent job in difficult and often dangerous circumstances. We have also devoted considerable material resources to the aid operation.

Mr. Illsley: Will the Minister take this opportunity to distance the Government from the suggestions made by Baroness Thatcher which, if implemented, would perhaps lead to an extension of the conflict in Bosnia, to the further killing of military and civilian personnel and would perhaps jeopardise the humanitarian aid effort? Does he also agree that the situation in Bosnia cannot be allowed to continue and that existing sanctions should be properly enforced and tougher sanctions implemented?

Mr. Hogg: The broad nature of the policy that we are currently pursuing is, I think, the right one and the one to which we should hold. We need to continue to put all the pressure that we can on Serbia to get Serbia to induce the Bosnian Serbs to sign up to the Vance-Owen plan. That must be the heart of the policy. I think, too, that it is desirable that the sanctions be yet further tightened. As the hon. Gentleman will know, there is a draft resolution to hand, but, for reasons that I think are good, it has been decided to defer the vote on the resolution until the end of April—but I hope that if the resolution is passed its implementation will be immediate and that no grace period, has proposed in the original draft, will be provided.

Mr. Cormack: I do not wish to do anything other than praise the bravery of our British troops, but may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to agree that our right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Thatcher, with whom I do not always agree, spoke for many people yesterday when she talked of the sense of horror and shame that people throughout this country feel when they see our troops having to stand by while women and children are shot down? Will my right hon. and learned Friend talk to the Foreign Secretary on the telephone today and ask him to summon an urgent meeting of his fellow Foreign Ministers so that we can begin to act a little more effectively?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is clearly right when he describes what is going on in Bosnia as a tragedy and a crime. I do not suppose that a more appalling set of events has taken place since the end of the second world war. But on the question of shame—no, I cannot agree with him, because I look at what British troops in Bosnia are doing. We have 2,600 men there performing acts of great courage and gallantry. We—or rather, I should say, they—have escorted some 448 convoys conveying something like 33,399 tonnes of supply. I am proud of that contribution.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Does the Minister accept that Lady Thatcher is not alone in believing that the present arms embargo plays into the hands of the Croats and the Serbs, and places the Bosnian Muslims at a great disadvantage? Does he further accept that there is an increasing feeling that the arms embargo should be partially lifted so that the Bosnian Muslims will at least be able to defend themselves against the atrocities being committed against their nation?

Mr. Hogg: I do not try to deny that a case can be argued for lifting the arms embargo, but I put to the House two considerations that point in the opposite direction. The first is that if we were to lift the arms embargo for the Bosnian Muslims I believe that others would speedily supply arms to the Croats and the Bosnian Serbs. That would not bring about an early ceasefire. The second consideration, which I find even more persuasive, is that it would take time for the arms to be delivered to the Bosnian Muslims and even more time for those people to be trained and expert in their use. I ask what would happen in the meantime; and I answer that rhetorical question by saying that the Bosnian Serbs would be likely to redouble their aggression so as to grab yet more land against the possibility that the Muslims might be in a better position thereafter.

Mr. William Powell: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the continuing horror caused by the evidence of alleged war crimes in the former Yugoslavia, not least that now forwarded by the International Red Cross to the special commissioners appointed under UN resolution 780? Is he aware that under resolution 808 the Secretary-General has to report by 22 April on the proposals to establish an ad hoc tribunal to try and, if necessary, punish people alleged to have been engaged in war crimes? Will he do all that he can on behalf of the British Government to ensure that such a tribunal is established as quickly as possible?

Mr. Hogg: I am, indeed, aware of the resolution. I am also aware that the Secretary-General has been commissioned to report back to the Security Council by the end of April on ways in which to carry forward the holding of a war crimes tribunal. I think that that is an important object of policy and, to the extent that it is possible—one must recognise the difficulties—that people who are guilty or who are alleged to be guilty of war crimes need to be brought before that tribunal and punished appropriately.

Dr. John Cunningham: Do not the Government recognise that even for those of us who have supported the peace process and the decisions of the Security Council, the policy of the United Nations appears to be falling apart in Bosnia? Is not it clear that sanctions are being widely breached by certain countries, including Russia, and should not any aid to Mr. Yeltsin be contingent on his obeying the mandatory sanctions against Serbia imposed by the Security Council?

Is not it also clear that the humanitarian aid programme is in danger of failing not because the High Commissioner has not organised convoys, but because members of the United Nations, including members of the European Community, have failed to keep their promises to provide food aid for Bosnia? Are we to stand aside and watch the slaughter of perhaps 50,000 innocent civilians in Srebrenica? Are not those all reasons why we should have an immediate recall of the Security Council to discuss the deteriorating situation in Bosnia? Is not it deplorable that the Government have agreed to delay those discussions in the Security Council for two weeks, apparently at the request of Mr. Yeltsin?

Mr. Hogg: Our purpose—it must be—is to achieve continued consensus within the Security Council, because it is only by maintaining a united front between the five permanent members that we can hope to continue to place great pressure on Serbia. Against that background, we must consider the request by the Russian Government not to put the matter to the vote until the end of April. Our purpose must be to keep Russian consent, because if we lose it, the ability of the Security Council to act effectively will disappear entirely. That is the thinking behind our decision to accede to the Russian request. I believe that it was a right decision.

United States

11. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations beween the EC and the USA.

Mr. Garel-Jones: EC-US relations are close, crucially important and wide ranging, including especially trade relations and political dialogue. We are committed to maintaining and developing this relationship on the basis of the November 1990 EC-US declaration which sets out shared aims and principles. The next EC-US summit will take place in Washington on 7 May.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is vital for both the European Community and the United States that there is a successful outcome to the negotiations on the general agreement on tariffs and trade? Will he confirm that the Government will do everything in their power to ensure that the protectionist tendencies of Mr. Delors, of French politicians and of some within the Clinton Administration are not allowed to stand in the way of a successful outcome to those negotiations?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of a successful conclusion to the GATT Uruguay round. I assure him that the Government will continue to give the highest priority to that. The initial signals coming from the new United States Administration are encouraging. The trade representative, Mr. Kantor, recently confirmed President Clinton's commitment to a more open trading system and to the successful conclusion of the Uruguay round. He also confirmed the United States Administration's commitment to seeking an extension to the fast track authority, which is also a very positive step.

As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), the new French Administration have inherited some difficult problems from their predecessors. I am convinced that France has as much to gain as any other country in the Community from a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round, not least because it is the largest exporter of services in the whole of the European Community and would have a great deal to gain from a successful conclusion to this round.

Mr. Hain: But could the Minister press for a joint initiative between the EC and the United States of America to put pressure on the South African Government to ensure that white terrorism is rooted out from both the community and the security forces? The tragic death of Chris Hani over the weekend is a clear example of the way in which white terrorists are being assisted——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have again to call an hon. Member to order. The hon. Gentleman started out reasonably but moved so far away from the question that his remarks really were out of order. I ask all hon. Members to look at the questions very carefully, and not to try to put one over on the Speaker, as they sometimes do.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: No. We will now move on.

South Korea

14. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's relations with South Korea.

Mr. Goodlad: Our relations are excellent. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary paid a successful visit to the Republic of Korea last week. He had full and useful exchanges with—among others—the President, the Foreign Minister and the Defence Minister. As well as bilateral matters, their discussions covered regional and international issues, including North Korea, market access, trade, technology co-operation, investment and the European Community. This was a very good opportunity to establish contact with the new South Korean Administration. My right hon. Friend also met and had useful discussions with representatives of the British business community.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that extremely informative reply. Does he share South Korea's grave concern about North Korea's threatened withdrawal from the non-proliferation treaty? Does he agree that that poses the threat of destabilisation throughout the region and that there is an urgent need for the International Atomic Energy Agency to move in and carry out an inspection? Will he seek the support of the Government of the People's Republic of China in putting pressure on North Korea?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes. North Korea's announcement of its intention to withdraw from the non-proliferation treaty is a cause for great concern and its refusal to allow the International Atomic Energy Agency's special inspections gives further cause to question the intentions of the North Korean Government. The United Kingdom is determined to maintain and strengthen the non-proliferation treaty. We urge North Korea to reconsider its position and we intend to explore all possible avenues with our Security Council colleagues to persuade North Korea to change its mind.

My hon. Friend is quite right that China has a vital role to play in attempts to persuade the North Koreans to reverse their position and we look to the Chinese to exercise that responsibility. We also attach the greatest importance to full co-operation among all states on the Security Council, especially the permanent five.

Hong Kong

16. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and where he intends to have talks with the Government of the People's Republic of China on the development of democracy in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: We and the Chinese Government announced yesterday that talks on Hong Kong's electoral arrangements will begin in Peking on 22 April. Our aim will be to reach an understanding with the Chinese side on arrangements which will ensure that elections are fair, open and acceptable to the people of Hong Kong. If we can reach such an understanding, we and the Hong Kong Government will recommend it to Hong Kong's Legislative Council. It will be for that body to pass the necessary legislation.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that although it was the Governor who tabled the proposals for constitutional change in Hong Kong, those proposals were, none the less, the recommendations of Her Majesty's Government and have the broad support of hon. Members on both sides of the House? Furthermore, they are within the Basic Law. If the People's Republic of China thinks otherwise, it would help the proposed talks if the Chinese were to be specific about the respects in which they think that the proposals depart from the Basic Law so that those matters can be addressed in detail before the talks take place.

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is correct in every particular.

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister keeps talking about reaching an understanding with China. Is it not a fact that any understanding with China can result only in a further watering down of proposals that were already grossly inadequate in terms of what the Hong Kong Legislative Council and OMELCO have asked for? Is it not also a fact that continual caving in to Chinese tactics of delay and dilution will result in there being very little democracy indeed to be handed over in 1997?

Mr. Goodlad: The right hon. Gentleman's views are well known to the House. I can reiterate only that the outcome of the talks will be placed before the Legislative Council in Hong Kong and will, we hope, be acceptable to the people of Hong Kong.

Peru

17. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Peruvian ambassador to discuss the democratic process in that country.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary last discussed Peru with the Peruvian ambassador on 18 November 1992. I visited Lima from 7 to 9 January and was able to assess the progress that Peru has made in restoring democratic government.

Mr. McFall: Is the Minister aware that when I visited Peru last year, I witnessed for myself the evil which the Sendero Luminoso is perpetrating on the people of Peru? However, there is no social welfare programme in that country, and the more President Fujimori goes ahead with his proposals and ignores the social reality, the worse it will be for the western world, particularly in relation to drugs. When the Secretary of State next meets the ambassador, will he impress on him the overall need for democracy in Peru so that that helps the people of that country?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his perfectly correct remarks about Sendero Luminoso which is probably the most horrific terrorist organisation operating anywhere on the globe today. We must recognise that since the autumn coup—as I believe it is called—President Fujimori has made progress in the restoration of democracy and the new constitutional assembly holds out considerable hope for the future of Peru. When I was there, I was able to speak not only to the Speaker of that assembly, but to a number of human rights groups. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, in the end, although the activities of Sendero Luminoso may be challenging and deeply repulsive, the route to its defeat must be through the proper restoration of full democratic human rights in Peru.

Malaysia

20. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have taken place with the Government of Malaysia on United Kingdom-Malaysian relations.

Mr. Goodlad: I visited Malaysia from 1 to 5 April and was able to see at first hand that our relations with Malaysia are excellent. I met the Minister of Finance, Mr. Anwar Ibrahim—who had himself visited the United Kingdom earlier this year—and had wide-ranging discussions with him and a number of his ministerial colleagues. I also visited the free trade zone in Penang and the Forestry Research Institute of Malaysia.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Is it not important that British firms should try to secure contracts in respect of the new Kuala Lumpur airport? What are the Government doing to assist?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is plenty of scope for British firms to increase British business in Malaysia; the new planned airport at Sepang is an important example of that. In February, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister offered up to £42 million-worth of grant finance to be used in association with export credits and contracts that may be awarded to British companies of up to £120 million-worth of United Kingdom goods and services for the planned new airport. Any firm commitment will be subject to the usual appraisal procedures and contacts with our Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development partners in line with internationally agreed rules on the provision of tied aid. I very much hope that our companies will be successful.

Mr. Dalyell: As the Minister said that he visited the forestry institute, what did it say about the rate of logging and the destruction of rain forest in Sabah and Sarawak and on the Malaysian mainland?

Mr. Goodlad: Nothing, Madam Speaker.

Serbia and Montenegro

21. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to improve the effectiveness and impact of United Nations and European Community sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have provided customs personnel to the sanctions assistance missions, which are helping Serbia's neighbours enforce sanctions more effectively, and £100,000 to establish a communications network along the Danube. I am confident that sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro are already having an impact, but sanctions may need to be tightened still further to put pressure on the Serbs to sign the Vance-Owen plan; further action is under consideration in New York.

Mr. Mackinlay: Has the Minister had an opportunity to read the report of the debate in European Standing Committee B which, a few weeks ago, probed the Government on the policing and implementation of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro as they relate to this country? It was shown that there was an hiatus and an unsatisfactory system of controlling and policing exports from the United Kingdom to the former states of Yugoslavia. Further, there was an indication from the Minister that Greece was, to say the least, sloppy in its policing of the sanctions regime. Will the Minister bear that in mind and tell us whether the Government have taken measures to ensure that the United Kingdom is rigorously applying the sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro and that there is no sloppiness on behalf of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hogg: It is certainly our intention rigorously to impose sanctions and I am not aware of any shortcomings. If the hon. Gentleman—or any other hon. Member, for that matter—has evidence of substantial shortcomings, the Government will be anxious to look at it.

The point has been made to Greece on a number of occasions that it is important that all Community members most vigorously and rigorously eforce the sanctions. As the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) knows, there is a draft resolution in New York that will further tighten the sanctions regime if it is voted for in the Security Council.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is one thing to have tight sanctions to try to bring the parties in the former Yugoslavia to their senses and to a peaceful resolution, but that it is another thing to start talking from the comfort of another place about military intervention, which would mean that the fighting forces in Yugoslavia would move into the towns where the bombing would be on civilians and children?

Ms Eagle: It already is.

Mr. Dickens: Yes. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that many people in the United Kingdom and, indeed, the Chamber would be aggrieved if the British armed forces were used in a warlike manner in the former Yugoslavia? The people who are crying for military intervention would soon be crying for the bodies of our men and women if they were returned in body bags to Southampton and other airports.

Mr. Hogg: I agree with a lot of what my hon. Friend said. It seems that there are two different sorts of military action that one should consider. The first is whether it would be right to deploy United Kingdom ground troops in an aggressive role—and then the question is whether it would be right in what is effectively a civil war to take action that would condemn probably a substantial number of British soldiers to die. That is a question which the House must consider. My view is that it would not be right.

A different question is whether it would be right in any circumstances to use air power. That question is constantly kept under review because there is a case to be made for it. Against that, there are serious disadvantages associated with that policy. So far, it has been held—in my view, rightly—that the disadvantages outweigh the advantages.

Ms Short: Does the Minister agree that there are awful parallels between Europe's failure to protect the jews before the second world war and our failure to protect the Bosnians from the systematic use of rape and ethnic cleansing? Is it not proposed that massive ground forces will be put in place if the Vance-Owen proposals are carried? The Serbs are refusing to accept implementation of those proposals. Can we not have an alternative plan at least to create some safe havens for the Bosnians?

Mr. Hogg: There is a distinction to be made between deploying troops in a peacemaking role and deploying troops in a peacekeeping role. So far as the latter is concerned, if there were a genuine agreement and a sustainable ceasefire, and if there were substantial troop contributions from a number of other countries—most notably the United States—and the control and command mechanisms seemed right, we should look sympathetically at a proposal that British troops should be used in a peacekeeping role.

There is a major distinction between that operation and what the hon. Lady is referring to, which is to use troops in a peacemaking role—to enforce peace by military action. I ask the hon. Lady rhetorically: is it right to condemn British soldiers to die for that purpose? I say no.

Commonwealth of Independent States

22. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to support and assist the independent republics of the CIS to ensure a smooth transition to democracy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We fully support the development of democratic and economic reforms in all the countries of the former Soviet Union. We contribute to this process through our bilateral aid programmes, such as the know-how fund, and play a substantial part in multilateral efforts. We are doing all that we can to foster contacts and exchanges with the newly independent states through international forums to support democratic processes.

Ms Eagle: Following the demise of the Soviet Union, there is great instability in the former Soviet states that are now independent within the Commonwealth of Independent States. One of the problems is that Ukraine and Kazakhstan have access to nuclear weapons. What is the Government's opinion on trying to force these states to sign strategic arms reduction talks in exchange for aid so that we can help them on the path to democracy and alleviate their poverty?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady is right with her general point that there is instability. We look to the conference on security and co-operation in Europe as the instrument most likely to provide the solution of regional and ethnic problems in the former Soviet Union.

As for nuclear-weapon states, our real concern is focused on Ukraine. That is because the tension between Ukraine and Russia is increasing. The view is expressed in the Ukrainian Parliament that Ukraine should not relinquish its nuclear weapons while there is the tension to which I have referred. We regard that as a disastrous mistake. We shall do all that we can, both by way of negative security assurances and by persuasion, and to some extent by assistance, to persuade the Ukrainians to sign the non-proliferation treaty as a non-nuclear state.

Bosnia

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, I should like to make a statement.

The House will share the Government's feelings of outrage at the artillery attack on Srebrenica on Monday, in which, according to reports, at least 56 people were killed and 70 wounded. That was a new milestone of inhumanity in a conflict which had already spawned many atrocities. On that occasion, as on many others, the Bosnian Serbs appear to have been responsible. We should remember that the Serbs in Bosnia are not uniquely guilty, although they bear the main responsibility for current events in Bosnia. The other parties too have committed crimes. Indeed, the British soldier who was killed in January while escorting a convoy of sick and wounded did not fall to a Serbian bullet.

It is not for want of effort by the international community that those horrors continue. The Government have been at the forefront of these efforts. The London conference last August, co-chaired by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, renewed the search for a negotiated settlement of the conflicts in former Yugoslavia —not only in Bosnia. Since then, the Government have given its fullest support to the efforts of Lord Owen and Mr. Vance to achieve such a settlement.

Success seemed in sight three weeks ago, when the Bosnian Muslims joined the Bosnian Croats in signing all the elements of the Owen-Vance peace plan. It is a matter of the deepest regret that the Bosnian Serbs have not yet been prepared to sign. I hope that, even at this late stage, and despite all that has happened, they will be prepared to reconsider.

Meanwhile, our armed forces have played a leading and distinguished part both in bringing relief to the suffering in Bosnia and in enforcing the arms embargo against the whole of former Yugoslavia and the wider sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Since November, the Cheshire battalion group has escorted more than 33,000 tonnes of food and other humanitarian aid to destinations in Bosnia. RAF Hercules aircraft have flown 427 sorties to Sarajevo, and delivered nearly 6,000 tonnes of aid. Ships of the Royal Navy, assisted by airborne early warning and maritime patrol aircraft of the Royal Air Force, have patrolled the Adriatic and its surrounding air space, alongside allies in NATO and the Western European Union, to enforce the embargo and the sanctions.

Earlier this week, pressure on the warring factions was increased, when NATO aircraft began patrolling Bosnian air space to enforce the no-fly zone in accordance with Security Council resolution 816. RAF Tornado F3s and tankers are on standby to fly to bases in Italy to join in that operation when called forward by SACEUR to do so.

The Government fully share the widespread frustration that diplomacy and military pressure have not yet succeeded, and that the suffering still continues. Other weapons are available. The sanctions noose is being drawn tighter against Serbia, whose future is grim—she faces isolation and economic ruin.

At the same time, the House will recognise that there are no easy solutions to a conflict in which all three ethnic groups have willingly engaged and which has many of the characteristics of a civil war. If there had been, the international community would have applied them long ago. Some argue that, if the outside world is not prepared to intervene militarily, it should at least refrain from enforcing an arms embargo that is bound to favour the Serbs, since they have access to the arsenals of the Yugoslav national army.

That is an understandable argument, but we should be clear where it leads. Removal of the United Nations arms embargo would certainly result in the Bosnian Muslims being free to acquire all the weapons they needed. Presumably, the Bosnian Serbs for their part would also seek more arms from other countries. The result would be to prolong the conflict and to make it even bloodier and more vicious than it is today, bringing continuing suffering to innocent civilians.

In those circumstances, it is difficult to see how UNPROFOR's humanitarian mission could continue. The chances of negotiating aid through the front lines, as at present, would be sharply diminished. Meanwhile, the international consensus would almost certainly have been lost. The United Nations' efforts in former Yugoslavia so far have been made possible by Russian willingness to support the necessary resolutions and to put pressure on the Serbs. That co-operation has been invaluable, but, given the internal situation in Russia, it cannot be taken for granted. It would be unlikely to survive an escalation of the conflict through the removal of the arms embargo.

There have also been calls for the use of air strikes to enforce a peace settlement. There could be circumstances in which the selective use of air power would be relevant. NATO, at the request of the United Nations, is enforcing the no-fly zone at the present time, but the clear military advice received by the Government is that air strikes unsupported by substantial numbers of troops on the ground would be unlikely to be effective given the nature of the conflict, the weapons deployed and the terrain. The chances of civilian casualties would be high. Meanwhile, the risks to British and other United Nations troops, and to the success of the humanitarian relief operation, would remain. While one should not rule out that expedient absolutely, it is one that would change in a fundamental way the role of the UN and bring it into the heart of the conflict as a combatant.

The right course to pursue is the current policy, thankless and frustrating though it is. Diplomacy must continue. Pressure on those responsible for prolonging the conflict must be increased. The plight of the suffering must be alleviated. The international consensus necessary to do all those things must be maintained. They will continue to be the Government's objectives.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I am sure that I speak for the whole House when I say how appalled we all were to see the maiming and murder of innocent victims in Srebrenica and elsewhere in Bosnia. It reminded us graphically of the barbarity of war, and behoves us to redouble our efforts to make sure that this particular war ends as speedily as possible.

We would like to be associated with the Secretary of State's comments about our own troops in Bosnia. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was right to highlight their bravery and fortitude. At no small risk to themselves, those troops ensured that thousands of tonnes of humanitarian aid got through and saved many lives. It is true to say that, thankfully, our worst fears about starvation have not been realised.

But that raises another point. There have been reports that the United Nations is now running out of food. If that is the case, what are her Majesty's Government doing about that? Is it not offensive that thousands of tonnes of food are rotting away in EC intervention stores when people in Europe are starving? Will the Minister take that on board and see what can be done?

The Secretary of State is right when he says that we cannot lift the arms embargo to the Muslims. It has always seemed to us rather crazy to try to douse a fire with petrol. It never works. Will he confirm that much weaponry is already in the hands of the 190,000 fighters from the three sides of the bloody conflict? Will he further confirm that planes with middle east markings and carrying arms have landed in Croatia?

The Secretary of State is also correct to rule out the use of ground troops before a peace agreement has been made. If it is envisaged that 70,000 troops will be needed to keep the peace after an agreement, has the Secretary of State made any estimate of the number of troops required to contain the fighting before the agreement has been made?

Does the Secretary of State accept that this civil war cannot be solved by external military intervention? If so, why are the Government so reluctant to come forward with new initiatives? Why have the Government agreed with the other G7 members to postpone further urgent discussions on Bosnia in the United Nations Security Council?

If the matter is to be solved by diplomacy, it will be through the United Nations, and we plead with and urge the Government to raise the matter once again in the Security Council. It is truly through diplomacy, pressure and tighter economic sanctions that the Serbs will be made to sign the peace agreement, so that we have the possibility of a lasting peace in that country. There is a feeling of a lack of urgency on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Rifkind: First, I thank the hon. Gentleman for his tribute to the work being carried out by our forces in Bosnia. It is helpful for their contribution to be seen to be recognised by the House.

The hon. Gentleman can be assured that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will monitor carefully whether extra aid is required to prevent starvation in Bosnia. Fortunately, the effort that has been carried out so far has, as he rightly says, ensured that the predictions of mass starvation have not come about during the winter months, and we wish to ensure that that situation continues.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether middle east aircraft had been seen landing in Bosnia. I cannot confirm the details of that, but we have reason to believe that some arms have been supplied to the Bosnian Muslim forces and to other factions taking part in the war.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the number of troops that might be required if there was to be military intervention in Bosnia. The answer to that would depend on whether such intervention followed the signing of a peace treaty by all three parties and was in the form of a United Nations peacekeeping role, or whether it was to impose a peace settlement that had not been agreed by the parties.

Even if there was agreement to a ceasefire, some 50,000 to 60,000 United Nations forces might be required, and, if there was no peace treaty or ceasefire, clearly the number that would have to be contemplated would be much larger, and, in a situation of continuing warfare in Bosnia, could run into hundreds of thousands.

Her Majesty's Government entirely share the desire to get through as quickly as possible the new United Nations resolution increasing the sanctions proposals. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that that requires unanimity in the Security Council and that Russia has, for reasons that are well known to the hon. Gentleman, asked for some delay in the consideration of that resolution.

That will not necessarily lead to any delay in its implementation. The current resolution before the Security Council allows a 15-day period after it has been passed before it comes into effect. It is possible that, even if there is a delay in passing the resolution, there will not then be a need for that 15-day period to elapse before the new resolution comes into effect. Therefore, the Russians' request may not have the consequences that the hon. Gentleman fears.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): I very much welcome the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend, which sets out the difficulties of intervening in the tragic affairs in Bosnia. I particularly welcome the caution that he shows about the proposal that we should indulge in air strikes against Serbian artillery positions. We have many troops sitting under the barrels of Serbian artillery, and I have no doubt that they would be the subject of retaliation the moment that any air attacks were launched. Therefore, will my right hon. and learned Friend give the House an absolute assurance that, should circumstances change and an attack on Serbian artillery positions be contemplated, British troops currently giving humanitarian aid in Bosnia would be withdrawn before such attacks took place?

Mr. Rifkind: We attach the greatest importance to the physical safety and security of the British forces in Bosnia. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is difficult, if not impossible, to see how one could contemplate continuing a humanitarian operation in the name of the United Nations if the United Nations was simultaneously authorising military strikes on the combatants on the ground in the same areas where the United Nations relief operations were taking place. It is difficult, if not impossible, to see how those two objectives could be reconciled.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman and I disagree about a number of elements of this matter, I believe him to be fundamentally right in resisting calls for the relaxation of the arms embargo, from whatever quarters those calls may come. However, may I remind him that Srebrenica is territory assigned to the Bosnian Muslims. What military assessment has been made of the prospects of Srebrenica being captured by the Bosnian Serbs who are presently laying seige to it? What political assessment has been made of the consequences for the Vance-Owen plan if the Bosnian Serbs were to succeed in capturing Srebrenica?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his earlier remarks. On the latter part of his question, clearly, any conflict in Bosnia, whether in Srebrenica or elsewhere, goes against the spirit and objectives of the

[Mr. Rifkind]

Vance-Owen plan. We very much hope to achieve a ceasefire by all the parties and an end to the conflict in Srebrenica and elsewhere in order to promote the circumstances to enable a more lasting peace to be achieved throughout Bosnia.

Srebrenica is the most immediate issue, on which our attention is focused—a few weeks ago, it was focused on Sarajevo, and earlier on Dubrovnik. Clearly, a number of localities dominate the headlines at any given time. But unless we can achieve peace throughout Bosnia, local agreements in specific parts of Bosnia will be unlikely to contribute to the overall objectives.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that he and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary are right to warn against the dangers of making policy for the medium term in the emotional heat of the moment? However, does he accept that the present position is untenable and there is a real danger, which we must anticipate, of being dragged into a far wider and more difficult conflict unless some check is imposed on the Serbian-driven expansionism and aggression, which we are presently witnessing, and which is leading to all the blood and slaughter? While I recognise my right hon. and learned Friend's caution and the difficulties faced by all policy makers in such circumstances, may I ask him at least to assure us that we are actively considering such matters with our United States and United Nations allies?

Mr. Rifkind: I very much agree with what my right hon. Friend has said. The thinking behind the tightening of economic sanctions is to bring home to the Serbians the heavy price they pay for their continued activity. It is important not to underestimate the effect that sanctions have already had. Industrial production has come down by more than 40 per cent. since sanctions were imposed, more than 65 per cent. of the work force are unemployed or temporarily laid off, and Serbian figures suggest that the first eight months of sanctions cost Serbia more than $10 billion in lost revenue. Therefore, the sanctions are clearly having a powerful impact on the Serbian economy. We must hope that that will help bring those responsible for that country's policy to their senses.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): What is to be done about men of fighting age in Srebrenica? Will they be given arms so they can defend themselves? Will they be evacuated under United Nations military protection, or will they be left to be slaughtered by the Serbian forces?

Mr. Rifkind: The UN forces in the area are the best judges of how they can contribute to the humanitarian objectives in accordance with the mandate that has been laid down. In recent months, UN forces throughout Bosnia have carried out activities which have been slightly broader than those originally envisaged. We originally expected them to be carrying out obligations in relation to the supply of food and aid. In recent weeks, they have been carrying out additional activities, involving giving transport to refugees wishing to go from war zones to areas of relative peace. It is important to allow the UN that discretion as long as it is consistent with the humanitarian framework—the mandate under which it currently operates.

Mrs. Edwina Currie: (Derbyshire, South): The Secretary of State will be aware that a number of my constituents are serving in Bosnia at the moment. Does he accept that those of us who are reluctant to send thousands more young men and women to that fighting area are acting not from lack of moral courage or lack of moral fibre but from sincere and heartfelt worries about what would happen to our constituents and their families—people to whom we as elected Members have to respond every weekend—should we take any decisions that would embroil them in that dreadful conflict?

Mr. Rifkind: Important moral dimensions have to be taken into account when our service men and service women are asked to go into a war zone. First, we must consider whether it is right and proper for them to be there, and secondly we must consider whether they have a reasonable prospect of carrying out the role for which they have been sent. If one comes, however reluctantly, to the judgment that there is not a military solution to the problem we face, it will not do any service either to the victims of aggression or to the wider moral and ethical issues to take action which one believes is foredoomed to failure.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the general thrust of the statement. I represent people who have already suffered because of the conflict in Bosnia, and I join the Minister in paying tribute to our security forces. We in Northern Ireland have experience of their professionalism, and we have no doubt that they are doing the same sort of job in Bosnia.

I should like to press the Minister on the concept of sanctions. When have sanctions really been effective? Time and again, the House has been assured that they do not work. Does the Secretary of State accept that it is easy to give moral lectures on political courage, as the Prime Minister did recently in Northern Ireland, but that they do not rest well on the shoulders of someone who in her turn yielded moral courage and, at the behest of terrorists, moved towards signing an agreement that yielded to them? The Government should not follow the line proposed by Baroness Thatcher.

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the history of sanctions does not give one great confidence that by themselves they will achieve the desired objective; but that is not to say that they cannot be part of a wider strategy and cannot make an important contribution towards maintaining the maximum pressure on those who are responsible for aggression. Sanctions have a role to play, but only as part of a wider strategy.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealdon): I warmly welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's statement, and especially his cool, rational analysis, and the recognition of his moral obligation to ensure that our troops are not involved in a dispute that is not of their making. I also welcome the recognition of the fact that it is not in the interests of the United Kingdom to plunge British troops into armed intervention in a national civil war. What assessment has been made by NATO high command of the time it would take to involve NATO itself in peacekeeping, should there be an agreement between the three conflicting parties in the former Yugoslavia?

Mr. Rifkind: In part, the answer to my hon. Friend's question clearly depends on how much contingency work has been done in advance of any such ceasefire. It would also depend on the judgment about whether any agreement signed by the three parties could be assumed to be a reliable treaty which they honourably intended to carry out and were able to deliver. We should have to be cautious in seeking to identify whether any treaty that might be signed at some future time was qualitatively different from some of the previous agreements that were signed and then dishonoured almost within minutes of their making.

Such decisions are difficult and delicate. We hope that the Vance-Owen agreement will be signed by the Bosnian Serbs as well as by the other two parties, and that, in signing it, they intend to deliver the commitments into which they have entered.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Since last August, a number of Opposition Members have positively supported the use of military intervention, in the form of air strikes, against Serbian positions because we believe that it is impossible to negotiate with fascism. We believe that fascism sets its objectives and ignores its victims. Fascism is what we have in Serbia. Is not it about time that this country, the European Community, the United Nations and NATO realised that this cancer growing at the very heart of Europe has got to be stopped now before it spreads even further?

Mr. Rifkind: Without commenting on the hon. Gentleman's description of the Serbian or Yugoslav authorities as fascists, I put it to him that there is at least one fundamental flaw in his approach. I understand that he wishes to see military strikes but, along with every hon. Member, does not wish to see the deployment of ground forces. It is difficult to understand that distinction if military might is to be used to achieve the objectives the hon. Gentleman seeks. The hon. Gentleman must consider, if he believes in the use of military power, on what basis he seeks to distinguish between air strikes and the use of all forces which might be available to the international community.

Mr. Winston Churchill (Davyhulme): My right hon. and learned Friend is more aware than most that the Serbs started this conflict with at least 10 times as much military hardware and ammunition supplies as the Muslims. I therefore ask my right hon. and learned Friend the question that I asked our right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary last November: is it not unprecedented for the United Nations to impose an arms embargo on the victim of military aggression—in this case, the Bosnian Muslims?

Do not the Government see that the inevitable consequence of the present policy is that ethnic cleansing and genocide will continue, because nothing whatsoever is being done by the international community to stop it? Has not the time come to get the Russians on side in this matter at the United Nations, and to threaten the Serbs with selective air strikes in the event that they do not sign up for a ceasefire and the Vance-Owen plan?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct in that, at the beginning of the conflict, the Bosnian Serbs had a preponderance of the military equipment that they inherited from the old Yugoslav armed forces. However, he should take into account the fact that this conflict is not simply an act of aggression by one faction against another. It is the consequence of the collapse of Yugoslavia and the development of a conflict within Bosnia among three sections of the community—all of which are Bosnian—which has many of the characteristics of a civil war.

Although I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of keeping Russian support for the actions of the United Nations—it is necessary if there is to be agreement within the Security Council—I do not believe that that support would be forthcoming for the military strikes that he has simultaneously proposed. He has to choose one or the other: he cannot expect a policy of military intervention to receive Russian support in the Security Council.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Before the United Nations has to go into the ranks of the Conservative party to keep the warring sides apart, will the Secretary of State agree that Margaret Thatcher at least articulated the deep anger and frustration that many people in this country feel about the inability of European Community powers to do anything about the situation in Bosnia? Is it not time to consider giving an ultimatum to the Serbian Government that, unless they are able to bring the Bosnian Serbs to account, there will be strikes against military targets inside Serbia in order to cut off the supply of arms from Serbia to the Bosnian Serbs?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's suggestion, which is similiar to that made by my right hon. and noble Friend Lady Thatcher, would fundamentally change the role of the United Nations. The United Nations would then become, consciously and deliberately, a combatant in that war. Although I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman puts forward that view with knowledge of the implications, he must also realise that that would not only terminate the humanitarian efforts of the United Nations, including those of the United Kingdom, but would fundamentally change the whole nature of international involvement in that war, without any certainty or likelihood that it would bring an earlier end to the conflict in question.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am grateful for the compliments paid by my right hon. and learned Friend to the Cheshire battalion group in Bosnia. I agree with the general thrust of his statement, but does he not think that there is a ghastly parallel between the feebleness of the United Nations' stance today and that of the League of Nations, some 60 years ago, against expansionism? I do not know the answer, but it is there and we ought to start to look for it. We cannot find it by military intervention at the moment, but we must start to look beyond sanctions and find another method; otherwise, we shall go through exactly what we went through 60 years ago.

Mr. Rifkind: I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comparison. When there is a conflict, whether it be the conflict in Bosnia or the Spanish civil war in the 1930s, for example, it is incredibly difficult for the international community to make a meaningful contribution towards ending it. The difference since the second world war is that, when a sovereign country is invaded by a foreign power, the United Nations, as we saw in the Gulf, is remarkably more successful than the League of Nations in the previous period. My hon. Friend has to take that fact into account when making historical comparisons.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Although many people may not agree with the solutions proposed by

[Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones]

Baroness Thatcher, I believe that she struck a chord when she expressed her sentiments about the horror of ethnic cleansing and the systematic rape and driving of women and children from their homes. The Secretary of State has been reluctant to contemplate limited air strikes against Bosnian Serbs in Serbia, but he has been careful not to rule them out completely. In what circumstances can he foresee limited air strikes being used?

Mr. Rifkind: I have already said that the use of air power in certain circumstances can be relevant, and that we are using it at the moment to enforce the no-fly zone. As to the hon. Gentleman's question whether air power could be used in some other way, that is not in itself an ethical question. It is a question whether, in the circumstances proposed, it would produce the benefit that has been identified by those who advocate it.

Our judgment is that that would not be the case, having regard to the proposals currently being made. It would not only destroy the humanitarian effort of the United Nations but would transform the United Nation's role. That, it seems to us, would not be in accordance with the objectives we seek.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that it is just over a year since Her Majesty's Government, in common with many other Governments, recognised Bosnia as an independent sovereign state; that during that year 2 million or more people have been displaced; that well over 100,000 people have been killed; that the killing still goes on; and that there is continued evidence of Serbian involvement, from Serbia itself, in these atrocities? Does my right hon. and learned Friend also accept that, today, the Bosnian Government are ethnically mixed, and that, whatever their shortcomings, they are far more democratic than the Government of that other nation, Kuwait, to whose aid we rightly went?

Mr. Rifkind: Although my hon. Friend is correct when he says that Bosnia is an independent state which has been recognised by the international community, the fact is that those who are involved in the combat within Bosnia are themselves Bosnian citizens—Bosnian Croats, Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims—and that they are all involved in this carnage against one another. Until my hon. Friend comes to terms with that fact, it is not possible to think of this as simply an international war of the kind that he has occasionally sought to portray.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): In the discussions that I had with Dr. Karadzic at the end of last year, he claimed that he had made an offer to the United Nations to provide it with the facility to have monitors at every command post of the Bosnian Serb army and at every Bosnian Serb airfield. Why has that offer not been taken up? That would be less precarious and risky for our 2,800 troops who are there now than their present position. That facility could have determined precisely who pulled the trigger first and fired shells at Srebrenica. Why do we not take up Dr. Karadzic's offer and put United Nations monitors in place?

Mr. Rifkind: As I recollect it, Dr. Karadzic made that proposal as a way of avoiding an enforcement resolution for the no-fly zone proposals. Since then, for the first time, Dr. Karadzic's supporters—the Bosnian Serbs—have introduced Bosnian Serb combat aircraft over the Bosnian skies. That is why it was necessary for the Security Council to pass the enforcement resolution, which is now being implemented by NATO on the United Nations' behalf.

Mr. Harold Elletson (Blackpool, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the quickest available short cut to a general Balkan war and an escalation of the conflict far beyond the borders of Yugoslavia would be to bomb Serbian positions? Will he therefore treat the recent comments of Baroness Thatcher with the contempt that they deserve?

Mr. Rifkind: It is certainly important that we do all within our power to prevent the internationalisation of the crisis in Bosnia. That must be an objective in the interests of the whole world. I believe that bombing Serbia would exacerbate the situation in a way that would be unlikely to bring peace to that part of the world any earlier.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Secretary of State realise how widespread the disappointment will be throughout the country that he has again used this opportunity to nail his colours so firmly to the fence? How many more millions of people must be driven from their homes and tens of thousands of people killed before the Government propose a policy commensurate with the genocide that we are witnessing?

Mr. Rifkind: I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman, and I was waiting to hear which policy he would propose. He knows that, sadly, there are many such wars going on around the world at the present time—in Angola, in Cambodia and in Azerbaijan—as well as in Bosnia.

Mr. Field: This is in Europe.

Mr. Rifkind: I am not aware of any ethical distinction between a war in Bosnia and a war in Angola or Cambodia. If the hon. Gentleman is appealing to the Government on moral grounds, it is a curious moral distinction that is prepared to tolerate conflict in other parts of the world but not in Bosnia. Unless he has specific proposals that have not already been considered, I ask him to realise that the options that are being advanced by some of his hon. Friends are not, in our judgment, likely to produce the results that he and Conservative Members would like to see.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there will be widespread support for taking care not to risk the lives of British service men? Does he further accept that, throughout the country and across party divides, there is growing concern about the dilemma of where we are going and how we shall deal with this appalling problem? On the one hand we appear to be refusing to allow Bosnian Muslims to be adequately armed, but on the other hand the United Nations, by not using force, is denying those Muslims the right to defence. While their territory is continually being reduced, more and more of them are being slaughtered.

Is there no point at which the Government and the United Nations will say that enough is enough? We must say that or get out completely, because the ultimate result of the war will be many more thousands killed. The British people understand the Government's point of view but are a little ashamed that we have not been able to do enough to save the lives of many innocent people.

Mr. Rifkind: We would all be anxious to do more if proposals were identified that would help to achieve the aims that my hon. Friend and I, and all other hon. Members, share. My hon. Friend says that we should tell the Bosnian Serbs, "Enough is enough," or that we should pull out from Bosnia entirely. In practice, that would mean pulling out the 2,500 British forces who have taken thousands of tonnes of aid to rescue many Bosnians, from all communities, from the starvation that they would have faced over the winter months.

In recent weeks, we have seen how United Nations forces have been helping refugees by taking people to safe places away from the war zone. It may not be the most heroic policy and may not resolve the overall problems in Bosnia, but to say that, because we cannot achieve all we would like, we must resign ourselves to doing nothing, is a counsel of despair, and not one that would commend itself to the House or the country.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the Secretary of State recognise that there has been a shift of opinion, certainly across the country and in the House in recent months? I was among those who argued six or eight months ago against any form of military intervention. However, in view of the continued slaughter of innocent Bosnian civilians, is it not clear that far greater pressure must be placed on the Serbian leadership and military commanders? To a certain extent, one can draw an analogy with the ruler of Baghdad.

Is it not the case that the Serbs continue their aggression, war crimes and atrocities because they know that no force will be used to stop them? Whether Lady Thatcher is right or wrong, are we to be appeasers in the face of some of the worst crimes in Europe since the end of the second world war?

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to draw parallels with the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein and the occupation of Kuwait, he should reflect on the fact that Kuwait and the Iraqi forces in Kuwait were subject to the largest strikes of air power for a sustained period of weeks, if not months, that the world had ever known, but that those strikes did not achieve the desired effect. They did not lead to the withdrawal of a single Iraqi soldier from the Gulf. It was only when a massive international coalition army went in on the ground that we achieved the liberation of Kuwait. Therefore, people who argue for selective air strikes must ponder whether that is likely to achieve the result that they have in mind.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): Although I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his measured response to those who want further military involvement, what evidence does he have that the no-fly zone, fully implemented, will have any effect on ground fighting in the area? Is there not a danger that the escalation of the involvement of NATO and others could encourage those who believe that, if they make enough noise, more support will be given and that we will be drawn in gradually, which could be dangerous in the future?

Mr. Rifkind: The purpose of the no-fly zone is to ensure that the United Nations resolution of some months ago, banning the use of Bosnian aircraft by any of the fighting parties, should be implemented. We had considerable doubts and reservations about the wisdom or necessity of a no-fly zone enforcement resolution but those concerns became irrelevant when some weeks ago the Bosnian Serbs for the first time decided to reintroduce combat aircraft into Bosnia. Once they had done that, it became inevitable and necessary for the United Nations to enforce its own resolution. That is what the NATO operation, at the behest of the United Nations, is doing at the moment.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): What representations are being made to the Russian Government at the moment to ensure that they change their attitude to the enforcement of sanctions in the next two weeks? What action is being taken within the European Community to stop the flouting of sanctions via the Danube, which has been going on for months? Why has it taken so long for air exclusion zones to be imposed when they were being talked about several months ago? Why is it only now that people are talking about truly enforcing sanctions, when we knew last summer that they were being broken?

Mr. Rifkind: The increase in sanctions currently being considered by the Security Council includes the stricter monitoring of the Danube. My right hon. Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary is of course making strong representations to his Russian colleagues. I remind the hon. Gentleman what I told the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark): the current resolution allows for a 15-day period before any new Security Council sanction enforcement measures would apply but, if there is any delay because of the Russians, it may not be necessary to have that 15-day period after the passing of the resolution. Therefore, there may be no time lost as a result of the current Russian position.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will acknowledge that none the less there is widespread anger in the community when we watch the reports that most of us saw yesterday. Does he accept, however, that he stands at the Dispatch Box not to express emotion and anger but to exercise his realistic judgment, and that the reasoned stand that he has taken today has the full support of the House? Will he please explain to the House the effect of deploying air power alone, as opposed to the use of air power with massive ground troop reinforcement, which some have urged—some of us believe unrealistically—on the nation?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. Of course, there can be circumstances in which air power by itself can achieve a desired result—for instance, if there is a particular target that can be identified, taken out from the air and eliminated. But in general, the use of air power as we have seen it exercised over the years has been to soften up a target that can then de dealt with by forces on the ground.

I know that my hon. Friend shares my view that, in the context of the terrain with which the Royal Air Force and other air forces would have to deal in Bosnia, it is difficult to believe that targets, including mobile artillery in heavily forested country, could easily be picked out and eliminated by the selective use of air power. At the end of the day, unless ground forces are also used, it is difficult to believe that such an operation could have more than a limited effect.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Does the Secretary of State accept that considerable unhappiness has been expressed on both sides of the House about policies which will in effect give comfort to the Serbs when they listen to, or hear about, our discussion? We have ruled out certain action, and that decision has had support, but we have been given no suggestion of extra action. It is clear that, for the very reasons with which the Secretary of State started his statement, our present policies are ineffective. He referred to yesterday's shelling and——

[Mr. John Gunnell]

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a question.

Mr. Gunnell: I am coming to the question, Madam Speaker.

As extra pressure has been mentioned, what extra pressure can in practice be brought to bear on the Serbs? It is imperative that, when they are redoubling their efforts to take more land, we adopt practical measures to curb them—[Interruption.] I should like the Secretary of State to say——

Madam Speaker: Order. I call the Secretary of State.

Mr. Rifkind: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, in the past week the United Nations has for the first time taken effective measures to prevent the use of air space by Bosnian Serbian combat aircraft. In the Security Council, we are currently discussing a substantial tightening of the economic sanctions that have already devastated the Serbian economy. No doubt other measures, which we hope will contribute to the result that we all wish to see achieved, will be considered.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: We are now moving to the second statement. I had hoped to call more hon. Members to question the Secretary of State, and would have been able to do so if Members had put direct questions and not made such long statements.

Competition

4.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): With permission, I should like to make a statement about strengthening the law to curb anti-competitive practices in the marketplace.

Last November my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced to the House the publication of a Green Paper on "Abuse of Market Power" which outlined three possible options for strengthening the law. Those options were to strengthen the existing legislation, to replace it with a prohibition, or to run the two systems in parallel.

We received 143 responses to the Green Paper. Copies of a summary of them have been placed in the Vote Office. There was no consensus amongst those who responded on which of the options represented the best way forward. Each of the options received roughly equal support. This contrasts with the overwhelming support for introducing a prohibition on restrictive trade practices. I can assure the House that the Government remain committed to introducing such a prohibition when legislative time permits.

Having carefully considered the arguments advanced for and against each of the options, the Government have decided that the best choice is to strengthen the existing system. With this strengthened regime we can retain the current wide scope and flexibility of powers without increasing the regulatory burden on firms.

It is proposed to strengthen the current legislation in four ways: stronger powers of investigation; additional scope for enforceable undertakings; provision of interim orders to suspend anti-competitive practices; and some coverage of property rights. Stronger investigative powers for the Director General of Fair Trading should enable him to establish more quickly whether there should be a full-scale investigation.

The director general currently has discretion to accept enforceable undertakings in lieu of a Competition Act reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. It is proposed to extend this ability to enable him to accept such undertakings, subject to suitable safeguards, before his formal investigation under the Competition Act, and in lieu of a monopoly reference under the Fair Trading Act 1973. Breaches of these undertakings would be enforceable in the courts. This proposal received considerable support from respondents.

The Green Paper suggested that companies might be made liable for penalties and damages from the point at which an MMC reference was made if they continued with a practice that was subsequently found to be against the public interest. A number of respondents argued that would be unjust and that it might lead a company to abandon a practice that was later found not to be against the public interest. That argument is accepted. But there can be cases in which immediate action is necessary. We therefore intend to take up the suggestion made by some respondents that we should be able to make interim orders under the Competition Act. These would prohibit specified activities by a firm if there was good reason to believe that a competitor, customer or supplier ran the risk of suffering serious damage during the period of the MMC's investigation.

The Green Paper considered the very limited scope of both the Fair Trading Act and the Competition Act to deal with competition problems concerning property rights. Fundamental change is not proposed in this area, but it is important to be able to deal with some limited situations in which specific property rights—for example, rights of access—are exercised in a way that damages competition. We shall hold further discussions with interested parties to resolve how best to deal with those problems.

As regards the other options in the Green Paper, the Government are not convinced that a compelling case for repealing the current legislation and replacing it with a prohibition on abuse of market power has been made. Nor are we convinced that such a prohibition should be added on top of the existing monopoly controls.

It is clear from the consultation that a prohibition would increase the regulatory burden on companies and introduce uncertainty for business. Despite experience of EC law, the identificatiiton of abuses of market power in many cases remains a matter of fine judgment. It can be very difficult to assess in advance what will be regarded as anti-competitive and what as acceptable business behaviour. That inherent uncertainty, coupled with the possibility of fines and private actions, could run the risk of inhibiting rather than promoting competition. In contrast, restrictive agreements can be more readily defined and prohibited, as set out in the 1989 White Paper.

When my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade introduced the Green Paper to the House last November, a number of hon. Members raised particular areas of concern, such as relations between the high street banks and business customers. In addition, a number of the Green Paper responses that supported a prohibition implied that this support was conditional on the prohibition being able to deal with alleged unfair practices in their particular markets. One of the tests we applied when considering the various options was the extent to which they would be able to meet those concerns. The conclusion is that a prohibition would bite on fewer market situations than our present legislation does. That is especially true in markets in which there is more than one major player.

The changes I have outlined today will enable us to build on the strengths of the existing legislation. I commend them to the House as they will provide the benefits of vigorous competition without stifling wealth creation. It is intended to include the changes in legislation to introduce the prohibition on restrictive trade practices.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Does the Minister understand that consumers will be disappointed that the Government have accepted the most timid of the three options set out in the Green Paper? Can he explain, for instance, why the Government have rejected the advice of the Consumers Association, which favoured clear prohibitions and substantial penalties for breaching them, and full rights for third-party redress?

Why have the Government failed to deal with the shortcomings in the existing legislation, which the President of the Board of Trade himself identified in his November statement? Why, for example, are there no penalties for past misconduct—a weakness which the President of the Board of Trade referred to in that statement?

In what ways will the Minister's statement help small businesses that complain about the abuse of market power by the high street banks? Is it not true that not a single small business will be helped by the Minister's statement today? Is it not the case that, after five months, we have again had words from the Minister but no action to help small businesses?

Would the Minister's statement in any way have changed the refusal by the President of the Board of Trade to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the hostile bid by Airtours for Owners Abroad? Will the Government be under any obligation after today's statement to accept the advice of the Office of Fair Trading? Why give additional powers of investigation when there is no need for the Government to accept the recommendations of the Office of Fair Trading or the Director General of Fair Trading?

Not once in his statement did the Minister refer to the interests or wishes of consumers. In adopting the option that has been announced, the Government can be accused of putting vested interests before the interests of consumers. This Government do not represent consumers' interests.

Mr. Hamilton: As a representative of a party that cannot even change its constitution, clause 4 of which advocates statutory monopolies throughout the country, the hon. Gentleman makes an unconvincing proponent of competition.

Let me answer the questions that the hon. Gentleman has put to me. In deciding which of the three options to adopt—principally, of course, in consumers' interests—we had to consider what would ultimately be likely to benefit consumers. We concluded that to introduce an unnecessarily complex, burdensome and bureaucratic system which, in certain circumstances, might stifle rather than enhance competition would not ultimately be to the benefit of consumers.

We decided instead to build upon the strength of the existing system—which, in my opinion, has been very effective over the years in defending the interests of consumers—and to plug certain gaps and close certain loopholes in that system. That is precisely what we have done: we have opted for certainty and flexibility; for the least burdensome option; and to build upon a system that is regarded as largely effective.

The Consumers Association principally wanted to ensure that we introduced a system that was certain and simple to understand. The option that the association selected—option 3—would have been the most complex and confusing of the various options. That is why we decided against it.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the practices, which have been widely criticised, adopted by the banks. We are dealing here with the abuse of market power—in particular, in circumstances where one company has a large share of the market and abuses the power that that large share gives it. That is not the case with banks, which are already covered by the existing competition legislation.

Under the Fair Trading Act, a complex monopoly occurs where companies together act in a way that is contrary to the interests of consumers or against the public interest, in circumstances where those companies together have more than 25 per cent. of the market. It is perfectly open to anyone aggrieved by the practice adopted by the banks at present to make a complaint to the Office of Fair

[Mr. Hamilton]

Trading, which can consider the matter. If the complaint appears to have substance, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission can be brought into play.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Airtours bid. I cannot in any way speculate as to what the outcome of any application might have been if the law had been different. What I can say is that the President of the Board of Trade decided in the circumstances of the case—which was widely regarded as being a matter for fine judgment—that there was no case for investigation. The curious outcome —at which the hon. Gentleman may be rather surprised —is that the market, having been allowed to work in those circumstances, has reduced the level of uncertainty for the company that did not wish to be bid for. Hence the most speedy outcome has been determined as a consequence of the President's decision.

Mr. Dennis Skinner: (Bolsover): Come on.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is complaining about the fact that I am treating the comments of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) seriously. I know that the hon. Member for Bolsover does not treat his Opposition Front-Bench colleagues seriously, but I, at least, am paying them that compliment.

The official Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Leeds, Central, asked whether we should have changed the legislation to make it a requirement that Ministers should accept the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. There would be no point in giving Ministers advice if they were obliged to accept it as it would not then be advice. The hon. Gentleman is asking us to remove his opportunity to hold Ministers accountable for the decisions of competition authorities. I do not know whether everyone would agree with that.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): While I welcome the extension of investigatory powers under fair trading and competition legislation, does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that what he has announced this afternoon will be no consolation to the customers of high street banks who believe that they have been bilked by banks over the past two years? Does he also accept that his announcement will be no consolation to water ratepayers, particularly those in the south-west who will be paying increased charges of more than 16 per cent. this year? Frankly, water ratepayers have no confidence in the regulatory authorities or in Ofwat. Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to give them some words of comfort?

Mr. Hamilton: All I can say to my hon. Friend is what I said to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central a moment ago. With regard to the banks, our current competition legislation is apt to cover the kinds of circumstances about which my hon. Friend complains. If the Director General of Fair Trading formed the view that certain practices were contrary to the public interest, he could make a recommendation that the matter should be investigated by the MMC. So far, he has chosen not to do that.

As my hon. Friend will be aware, the water industry, like all the privatised utilities, is subject to a significant degree of regulation in the interests of consumers. The Director General of Water Services has power to consider all matters that might adversely affect the interests of consumers and to take the necessary action accordingly. Once again, it is not for me to second-guess the decisions of the Director General of Water Services. However, it is open to anyone who is aggrieved to take a case to the director general and make the argument for it.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The elegant but labyrinthine language of the Minister's statement has left many of us and some consumer groups puzzled. Why will the weakest of the three options stop some of the inexcusable bullying by large companies of smaller emerging companies? Why have the Government not taken the second or third option in the Green Paper—for a prohibition regime of a type which works extremely well in numerous other countries and which is the norm in the rest of the European Community?

Mr. Hamilton: I am afraid that the hon. and learned Gentleman's hearing aid must be defective. I have already answered that question twice. We have chosen the option that is likely to be the least burdensome and least costly and to build upon the effectiveness of the existing system.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Can my hon. Friend assure me that the way in which his proposals will impact on small and medium-sized businesses will not increase bureaucracy, paperwork and regulation and that small and medium-sized businesses have something to look forward to under the proposals?

Mr. Hamilton: I think that I can confirm what my hon. Friend has asked. As Minister responsible for the deregulation initiative, I had very much in mind the impact of costs upon businesses. We must consider the proportionality of what we do in the House by way of imposing legislative burdens. For very small improvements in consumer benefits, we might impose significant costs on companies which, ultimately, have to be borne by consumers as well.

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): As the Minister has taken a fairly soft option, and as we are all aware that where there is no competition, such as in the nationalised industries which have now become private monopolies, we rely on the regulator, which, in my view, is little better than a panacea to keep the public happy, what is the position if we have a regulator like Professor Littlechild, who has brought the art of slothfulness almost to the point of atrophy and has led to the destruction of the coal industry? Will the legislation do anything to prevent such a dreadful recurrence, as we have seen in this incident?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman has an impressive command of polysyllables but a rather less sure grasp of the legislation which governs privatised utilities. I doubt whether the privatised utilities would share his opinion that the director generals who are responsible for their operations are weak or ineffective. I am fairly certain that British Gas does not take that view.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): Does my hon. Friend agree that small businesses, especially sole traders, often feel that they are penalised by larger companies? I appreciate and welcome my hon. Friend's statement today. Will he ensure that large companies which are found guilty under the new proposals are required by statute to publish in their annual reports where they have been found wanting?

Mr. Hamilton: That is an interesting suggestion which I have not heard from anyone else. As the Minister responsible for company law, I shall give consideration to it.

Mr. Skinner: The Minister must think that we have dropped off a Christmas tree if he thinks that we believe all the mumbo-jumbo which he has trotted out today, especially when we consider fair trading against the background of petrol stations rigging their prices and banks ripping off customers. Prices are rigged in the Common Market, lawyers fix their fees to extortionate heights and nuclear power is subsidised by £1·3 billion to the detriment of coal—and the Minister asks us to believe that he is talking about fair trading. Take it back and chuck it in the dustbin.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not know which specific ornament the hon. Gentleman would be on the Christmas tree. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) suggests that the hon. Gentleman would be the fairy at the top. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's weighty opinion in this area, as in all others, will be treated by the House with the degree of importance which it deserves.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): Does my hon. Friend accept that the fact that little evidence has been produced of a significant abuse of market power by private sector companies which are not already subject to the oversight of a specific regulator suggests that the present system is generally working well? Is there not a risk that a more significant amendment to the law, such as that involved in options 2 and 3, would add to the bureaucratic burden on firms to little benefit?

Mr. Hamilton: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Many of the complaints of small businesses in particular relate more to inequality of bargaining power rather than to an abuse of a dominant position. That is a much more difficult question to deal with, and it is not one which was addressed by the Green Paper.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Can the Minister tell us whether the policy announced today will have any effect on the beam in the Government's eye? I am sure that he is aware that many firms absolutely depend on contracts from the Ministry of Defence. Does he realise that such contracts are placed through a division of the Property Services Agency, which is forcing firms to forgo their right to payment within 30 days and requiring them to accept that they will be paid only when the Property Services Agency has been paid by the Ministry of Defence? That is an abuse of market power which conflicts with what the Chancellor promised in the 1922 Budget and in which Ministers are conspiring.

Mr. Hamilton: It would have been less of a problem if there had been a Labour Government because there would have been fewer defence contracts for small suppliers. A Labour Government would have made swingeing reductions in defence expenditure, despite the crocodile tears which Labour Members now shed at the outcome of "Options for Change".

With regard to the specific question about late payment, the Government are committed to paying their bills in due time, and that goes for their main contractors as well. We hope that main contractors will impose the same terms on sub-contractors because we take seriously the question of late payment of debt.

A number of other measures have been proposed recently. As the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) knows, we have a consultation paper outstanding on whether we should have some sort of statement or audit of the payment practices of companies published in annual reports and accounts. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give us the benefit of his views on that matter.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the private monopolies that have come out of the public utilities will be subject to the terms of the statement? Is he aware that the charges of South West Water amount now to an additional 18 per cent.? That is the result of the National Rivers Authority—the regulatory authority—demanding higher and higher standards faster and faster. I found my hon. Friend's statement helpful, but does he agree that the private monopoly—in this instance, South West Water—is abusing its power? It has no choice, but it is costing Devon and Cornwall water charge payers an arm and a leg.

Mr. Hamilton: The principal reason for water charges having to rise by more than the rate of inflation is that the Labour Government cut substantially water authorities' capital programmes. I note that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside is on the Government Front Bench. I am sure that he would confirm that we are now having to catch up, in effect, because of the Labour Government's failures during the 1970s.

I do not know the details of South West Water's charges. I am sure, however, that my hon. Friend the Minister of State heard what my hon. Friend said.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Minister's statement give any comfort to those in the pharmaceutical industry who have been concerned about the practice of one of the major manufacturers?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman's question is rather cryptic. I am not aware——

Rev. Martin Smyth: I have written to the Minister about the matter.

Mr. Hamilton: I understand. His question takes up the case that he has set out in correspondence with me. The proposals that are set out in the Green Paper are not designed—[Interruption.] As the hon. Gentleman did not identify the case, I was not certain whether he was referring to the one that I now fully recollect.

Mr. Skinner: Has the Minister written to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth)?

Mr. Hamilton: I have done more than that: I have discussed the matter with the hon. Member for Belfast, South.

The case which the hon. Gentleman raised with me in correspondence is not apt to be considered in the circumstances that are set out in the Green Paper, which concern the abuse of a dominant position, especially when one producer has a position in the market which enables him to oppress the smaller operators within it.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I add my welcome for my hon. Friend's excellent statement. Will he confirm that the option that he has chosen will not cause a rash of third party actions, which would be expensive for industry and commerce, would slow down the decision-making process and would not necessarily add anything to the existing excellent regime for competition?

Mr. Hamilton: I can confirm that. As a lawyer, albeit one who has retired into public life, I am rather surprised by the stance taken by the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett). As I understand it, he believes that there should be a right of private actions. That would lead to a bonanza for lawyers and would impose significant costs on companies. Ultimately it would not be in the interests of consumers.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As one who went with the Amalgamated Engineering Union and its lawyers before the Monopolies and Mergers Commission as a witness in the case of the Atlas steel foundry, I was impressed by its method of operation. However, in factory situations of a sort that might arise in any constituency, there is a need to be a bit quicker. Events in factories overtake the MMC whatever it wanted to do in the first place.

I asked the Minister a question that arises from paragraph 13 of the Department of Trade and Industry's paper on intellectual property rights, which states:

"intellectual property rights were adequately dealt with in existing legislation. 4 of these"—

the respondents—

"favoured intellectual property rights being covered by a general prohibition, with three saying that the role of the Copyright Tribunal would then need to be reviewed."

Does the Minister agree with those respondents? Does he think that there should be a review and extension of the work of the crucially important Copyright Tribunal?

Mr. Hamilton: That is a matter for my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I shall draw my hon. Friend's attention to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Bearing in mind the fact that virtually the only monopolies operating in Britain in recent history were those set up and sanctioned in the public sectors by Labour Governments, that the Labour party has consistently opposed every attempt to introduce competition, ranging from trying to prevent consumers even from having a choice of telephone to proposing any competition on the domestic routes of British Airways, that nothing is more certain than that the Labour party will support vested interests, as it did recently when we were dealing with the coal industry, does my hon. Friend agree that Opposition Members have a cheek to pose in the Chamber as the champions of consumers?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, they have, but it comes as no surprise.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Is it not heart-warming to see so many converts on the Tory Benches this afternoon—Tory Members who are now against the privatisation of the water industry, a measure for which they all voted? They are now complaining about the extortionate prices, salaries and dividends that are now being charged, drawn and distributed.

Is it not right that the Minister has taken the soft option, recognising in passing that some regulation is necessary, that capitalism and free markets do not work by themselves and that the Government must intervene—but not too far, as that would expose the nasty, villainous tactics that many big businesses pursue?

Why do the Government have these double standards? There are no soft options for those who are on income support or for those on the lowest of incomes. For those people there are comprehensive regulations and criminal penalties. Why cannot there be the same approach to big businesses? Is the answer that big businesses know very well that, if they make plenty of large donations to the Tory party, they can get away with whatever they want?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman performs a most valuable function by reminding us what the Labour party is really like.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): To wrap this up, I am delighted that my hon. Friend has opted for certainty. I do not think that I am alone, however, in saying that I am rather uncertain about what that certainty is. I am not sure what the targets are at which he is aiming. It might be helpful if he would explain to me in what sector I should sell shares—if I had any, which I have not—and, if I intended to invest, which I do not, what shares I should buy.

Mr. Hamilton: I have many functions to perform as an Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Trade and Industry. Fortunately, financial services, which used to be my responsibility, have gone to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. I shall direct my hon. Friend's question to him. I am sure that his advice would be better than mine, in any event.

Points of Order

4.47 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I wish to raise with you, Madam Speaker, on a point of order, a matter which I submit affects the rights and privileges of the House.

I wrote in October 1992 to the Secretary of State for Social Security about a case that concerned a disabled child in my constituency. The right hon. Gentleman replied to me more than two months later, saying that the case was being dealt with. I wrote to him again in February because, after more than four months, the case had not been dealt with and settled. As he did not reply, I tabled a question for answer on 1 April in which I asked him when he intended to reply to my letter. There was a response from the Minister of State for Social Security and Disabled People. The Minister stated that he understood that I had "already received from the Benefits Agency a reply both to my earlier letter and to my question."

I had not received that reply, but a little later I did receive it. The letter came from a person called Ann Robinson, director of policy and planning. It began extremely ungrammatically by saying

"As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is the responsibility of Mr. Michael Bichard to answer questions on relevant operational matters."

The letter continues:

"However, as Mr. Bichard is away at the moment I am replying on his behalf to your recent Parliamentary Question."

A non-Member was writing that she was replying to a question that I had tabled to a Minister and to which the Minister had not replied.

I submit, Madam Speaker, that when hon. Members table questions to Ministers, they have a right to expect answers from Ministers. Furthermore, it is not open to someone who is not a Member to purport to reply to a question from a Member by saying:

"I am replying . . . to your recent Parliamentary Question."

Ann Robinson ended her letter:

"I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.—[Official Report, 1 April 1993; Vol. 222, c. 421.]

Here is a non-Member saying, purporting, claiming, that she can arrange for a reply to be published in the Official Report and for a copy to be placed in the Library when she herself has no right to enter the Library of the House of Commons.

The matter affects the right of every Member of Parliament to table a question to a Minister and to receive a Minister's reply. Also, someone who is not a Member of Parliament must not be permitted to state that she is replying to a parliamentary question or that she is arranging for a reply to appear in the Official Report and to be placed in the Library.

The matter is for the House. It is a question not of my dispute with a Minister over policy or individual cases, but of whether Members of Parliament who table questions have the undeniable right to obtain answers from Ministers and of ensuring that those outside the House are not permitted to usurp the rights of the House of Commons.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I am also concerned about Ministers having all the power and the glory and no responsibility. As for writing to a Minister for information and being referred to a chief executive, you, Madam Speaker, rightly said that you are not responsible for what is said by a Minister in the House. However, could you rule on whether a Secretary of State or other Minister would be responsible for anything said by chief executives of all the quangos that the Government have created?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I intend to answer those two points of order, and the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) may be satisfied when he hears my response.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for giving me notice of his point of order, on an issue about which the right hon. Gentleman has previously expressed concern. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that Ministers remain fully accountable for the work of their Departments, including that of executive agencies. It is for the Minister concerned to decide whether or not to refer a question to the chief executive of an agency for a detailed answer.

Since last October, following a recommendation from the Administration Committee, such answers have been printed in the Official Report. The Benefits Agency operates in exactly the same way as other agencies. Right hon. and hon. Members are able to table questions about its work and to seek an Adjournment debate on particular issues—as did the right hon. Member for Gorton just before Easter. However, I will look further into the matter.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. There can be no further points of order. I gave a ruling and said that I would look further into the matter. We ought to leave it at that, unless the hon. Gentleman has a point of order on a different matter.

Mr. Cryer: It is, Madam Speaker. As you know, the Government are extending the system whereby chief executives reply to questions about the prison service. I ask you to consider whether it should be necessary for the House—not the Government—to agree to any extension by means, for example, of an affirmative resolution. Then at least the decision to extend that power would be in the hands of the House, not the Executive.

Madam Speaker: I have already made a statement, and I told the right hon. Gentleman that I was taking the matter no further at this stage.

BILL PRESENTED

Welfare of Animals at Markets

Sir Richard Body presented a Bill to prohibit the sale of lambs of under twenty eight days of age at auction markets: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 23 April, and to be printed. [Bill 177.]

Coastal Waters (Water Quality Standards) (Costs)

4.53 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the costs of maintaining and improving water quality in coastal waters to be a collective charge on sewerage undertakings; to establish a scheme for determining such costs and their allocation between undertakings; and for connected purposes.

There is in progress in the United Kingdom the greatest clean-up of our coastal water ever undertaken, and it arises directly from the many years of neglect which went before. Change finally comes about because of the EC bathing waters directive, which requires 455 of the United Kingdom's beaches to be brought up to standard, and 130 of them lie in the area of South West Water—a larger number than in any other water company area. It means that 32 per cent. of all the beaches in the United Kingdom covered by the directive are to be found in the south-west.

That those beaches are brought up to standard should be cause for national celebration, but for the people of Teignbridge and the south-west such celebration has become a regional nightmare. What should clearly be a national responsibility is being funded on a local basis. The cost of cleaning up one third of the nation's beaches is being met by just 1·5 million people—or more exactly, the 650,000 paying customers who already receive bills which are on average 35 per cent. higher than in the rest of Britain and which are due to go far higher still.

It will not stop there. We can expect ever-increasing demands to upgrade our water still further. Standards which may be acceptable now will not be acceptable in the 21st century. If we do not rectify the cost mechanism now, the situation will get progressively worse.

The typical south-west domestic household charge of £230 per year will reach £400 at the end of the decade. For many people in an area of relatively high rateable values, those charges can go higher still. Operation Cleansweep is set to cost £2 billion over the next 10 years—expenditure of something like £4 million per week. To fund that, Ofwat has allowed an increase for the current year of inflation plus a staggering 11·5 per cent. The effect of that formula is that bills have risen more than 40 per cent. in just three years.

Let us consider those who have to shoulder those bills in practice. The south-west has a high proportion of elderly, retired people. Just under 26 per cent. of Teignbridge's population are of retirement age, and a great many other people are on the threshold of retirement. Those people have, for the most part, worked hard all their working lives and are now slightly above the income support rate. They are not in the business of asking for state handouts. Their generation and that of their parents have served this country well, yet they see their income slashed by the fall in interest rates. They recoil in horror at the prospect of value added tax on their heating costs. Now, in the autumn of their years, they are faced with costs that they cannot control on the one ingredient that they cannot live without. One can economise on most things. One may be able to make savings on gas and electricity, but for the vast majority of people, savings in water consumption which lead to a reduction in costs are literally impossible.

Let there be no doubt that the south-west is unique. It has the highest charges in the country. The Anglian authority—the next highest—has an average charge of £227·5p as opposed to £227·84p, but when one considers the proportion of that which is the sewerage charge, the south-west has the highest charge, at £134·58p as opposed to £120·97 for the next highest charger, Anglian Water. Anglia also has a very different age profile from the south-west. In terms also of average gross weekly earnings, Anglia has within it some of the country's wealthiest counties. By contrast, Devon and Cornwall together are, by that measure, the poorest region of all. By comparison, a largely inland authority such as Thames Water produces a total bill of £138·78, of which the sewerage charge amounts to just £69·39.

The cost of cleaning up the nation's coast should be met on a national basis. No one suggests that the cost of maintaining the Royal Navy should be met on a local basis. It is funded nationally. My Bill would do the same for water by providing for the sewerage element to be equalised across all water authorities.

In so doing, my Bill hardly breaks new ground. As long ago as 1638, John Hampden challenged his obligation to pay taxes to protect the coasts from the attentions of Barbary corsairs. One ground for his challenge was that he lived in an inland area. He failed at that time and he deserved to fail. In proposing this mechanism for what threatens our coast today, I am hardly breaking new ground. I am relying on a British sense of fairness.

What objections could there be to my suggestion? Is it sufficient to say that since local people benefit, local people must pay? Can we just glibly remark that because it is good for tourism, it must be good for the local people? Tell that to the many hundreds of people who have written to me about this. Better still, tell it to a 70-year-old widow who receives a retirement pension increase of £10·64 per month to meet increases in council tax and water charges of £11·71. She is not topping up her swimming pool with new squeaky clean water or spending her leisure hours wind-surfing her way around the south-west. It would be stupefyingly complacent merely to reply that water industry investment to raise environmental standards means that charges must rise in real terms, and to suggest that that statement should be the end of the argument.

There will inevitably be those who say that the situation shows that privatisation was wrong all along. In fact, it shows no such thing. Failure to invest in water quality and to face up to the massive pollution that civilisation generates goes back a full hundred years and beyond. Privatisation has enabled massive sums to be invested and it is clearly in the nation's interest that its coastal waters should be as clean as possible. But any policy needs to be adjusted in the light of changing circumstances. Who could honestly have predicted the sudden and immediate demands that the EC bathing water directive would make on us?

Even if it is not the Government's fault that we are in this predicament, only the Government can ultimately deliver a solution. Far from just complaining and whingeing, I have suggested a solution. I have even done so without proposing an increase in taxation and a massive Exchequer grant. The Bill addresses an injustice which becomes more obvious with every day that passes. It is a situation which, in common fairness, cannot be allowed to stand.

I have with me today a number of my west country colleagues who support me in my endeavour and I have presented the Bill and the case for it with all the force that I can command. I commend it to the House.

5.1 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I oppose the Bill. No hon. Members in their right minds think other than that coastal pollution is an extremely important subject for Britain. If fair and effective measures were brought forward under a ten-minute Bill or any other procedure to do something about coastal pollution, I and others like me would not oppose them.

We listened extremely carefully to the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), but what we heard was political posturing of the worst kind. He said that the problem concerned the west country. People are entitled to special pleading, but it would come better from someone who had not, throughout, voted for water privatisation.

The truth of the matter is that, when the water industry was regarded as a public utility, it was in a far better position to do something about such problems. [Interruption.] Yes, it was. The hon. Gentleman talked about fuel bills, but who was it in their Budget who extended VAT to fuel, and who voted for it?

This is a classic case of Members happily going through the Government lobby and then whingeing when the consequences of their actions catch up with them. Those who vote in a particular way should be prepared to face the consequences of their actions. This is an attempt by the hon. Gentleman, surrounded by a phalanx of his hon. Friends from the west country, to persuade people in the west country that they are trying to do something about the problem when in fact the fault originated with the Government whom they so loyally supported. This is the worst kind of posturing, trying to have one's cake and eat it.

A sensible Bill on coastal pollution would have made some reference to the Braer disaster off Shetland. There would have been some reference to those tankers going through the Minch and other protected waters, about which nothing has been done. The Home Secretary is said to be an effective Minister, but he has not persuaded the Cabinet to stop those foreign tankers going through the Minch and off Shetland. If this had been a worthy measure, attention would have been paid to that.

No attention has been paid to the real problems of the benthic community—the creatures who live at the bottom of the seas and are affected by disasters such as the Braer. The Bill is not about coastal pollution, but about short-term political advantage, and should therefore be opposed.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

The House divided: Ayes 39, Noes 65.

Division No. 230] [5.05 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Alton, David
Ashby, David
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Beith, Rt Hon A. J.
Blackburn, Dr John G.
Budgen, Nicholas
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Dover, Den
Dowd, Jim
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Faber, David
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Harris, David
Hawkins, Nick
Jenkin, Bernard
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Mitchell, Sir David (Hants NW)
Neubert, Sir Michael
Nicholls, Patrick
Porter, David (Waveney)
Rathbone, Tim
Robathan, Andrew
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townsend, Cyril D. (Bexl'yh'th)
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whittingdale, John
Wilkinson, John

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mrs. Angela Browning and
Sir John Hannam.

NOES

Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Ashton, Joe
Barnes, Harry
Bermingham, Gerald
Boyes, Roland
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Corbett, Robin
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Alistair
Dixon, Don
Donohoe, Brian H.
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Enright, Derek
Etherington, Bill
Fisher, Mark
Flynn, Paul
Garrett, John
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Hinchliffe, David
Howells, Dr. Kim (Pontypridd)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Khabra, Piara S.
Macdonald, Calum
McFall, John
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McNamara, Kevin
Madden, Max
Mahon, Alice
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Morgan, Rhodri
O'Brien, Michael (N W'kshire)
O'Hara, Edward
O'Neill, Martin
Pickthall, Colin
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Purchase, Ken
Raynsford, Nick
Redmond, Martin
Roche, Mrs. Barbara
Simpson, Alan
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Spellar, John
Steinberg, Gerry
Trimble, David
Vaz, Keith
Watson, Mike
Wigley, Dafydd

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Bob Cryer and Mr. Dennis Skinner.

Question accordingly negatived.

Orders of the Day

Criminal Justice Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

5.16 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I hope that this Criminal Justice Bill may arouse a little less controversy than the measure on which the House has just divided. It covers a comparatively narrow range of issues—but they are important, and I hope that, in principle, the Bill will command widespread support.

The Bill focuses on a relatively modern phenomenon: financial or so-called white collar crime. Financial crime and fraud are as criminal and as big a menace to society as theft, robbery and burglary. They need to be dealt with as effectively and as severely as other crime. But the increasing sophistication of modern financial markets and modern fraudsters means that the law has to be strengthened and kept up to date in a sophisticated way to eliminate loopholes and remove technical defences. For that reason, the Bill is technical and, I am afraid, complex. It includes measures on insider dealing, on banking and on money laundering. The Bill will substantially increase the powers available to our enforcement authorities to bring fraudsters and insider dealers to justice.

A vital section of the Bill, to which I attach the utmost importance, is the part that tackles the profits of drug trafficking. We need to strengthen our law yet further against money laundering by and on behalf of drug traffickers. The substantial success of our enforcement agencies against the drug trade must be backed by laws which prevent the people detected and convicted from ever enjoying the profits of their trade. We shall be proposing that ultimately the Bill will deal with terrorist finances. Those are extremely serious crimes and I hope that all hon. Members will agree that we need to tackle them with vigour and determination.

The Bill is not a measure that will open up issues of political division or principle within the House. I believe that its aims will attract near-universal approval. I might almost hope—perhaps optimistically—for a little praise for the Government for their prompt action. Recent experiences of Criminal Justices Bills will remind the House, however, that in this sphere it is important to get the detail right.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I should like to ask about the intriguing matter that the Bill will deal with terrorism in due course. Will that mean the confiscation of assets and will it be an amendment to the prevention of terrorism Act? Why was such an amendment not introduced in the House of Lords and why was such provision not in the Bill when it commenced its passage?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): That is a good point.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that it is a good point. However, an amendment to an aspect of the law different from that in the first draft of the Bill is required. The time has come to improve the Bill and to extend its provisions to cover confiscation for terrorist offences. From what the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) has said, I gather that he will welcome those amendments when they are presented.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Will the Home Secretary be able to use the Bill to rectify two of the mistakes in the Criminal Justice Act 1991—unit fines and the inability of courts to take previous offences into account? Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that there are no little details in the Bill which will make it more difficult to convict criminals? That was the effective result of the previous measure.

Mr. Clarke: The matters to which my hon. Friend refers are outside the scope of the Bill. I entirely share his concern about the way in which the provisions of the 1991 Act are working in practice. At the moment we are anxiously looking at the way in which the unit fines system works. I share the view of the Magistrates Association that in principle unit fines are right. However, we know that in practice they are producing some odd results, perhaps partly because of the way in which the rules to implement the Act have been drawn up and partly because some magistrates courts are not familiar with their powers.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State who will reply to the debate is personally taking charge of the current review of unit fines. He and I hope that we may be able to get the system to work as closely as possible to the way in which it was intended without the need for more primary legislation. However, we shall introduce primary legislation if that is necessary. I share some of my hon. Friend's concerns about other provisions of the 1991 Act which may not be working out as they were originally intended.

The 1991 Act followed a long process of consultation with the magistrates and the judiciary and others, but now the magistracy and the judiciary are expressing discontent in a way that certainly strikes a chord with me. We shall look at the matter again. If primary legislation is required we shall have to present another Bill. All hon. Members will accept that such matters must be tackled with care because we do not want rushed provisions that will go wrong. As soon as parliamentary time allows, I shall introduce such primary legislation as is called for.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) underlines my point that the House should scrutinise the Bill with special care to make sure that we get the law right and strengthen it against money laundering, financial fraud and other offences with which the Bill is designed to deal.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I should like to put some questions to the Minister before he moves to the more technical parts of the Bill. He says that we should not move too quickly in such difficult areas. Why did the Government move so quickly and consult so inadequately about the drafting of the Bill? For example, the stock exchange was provided with draft clauses at the end of July and was expected to supply answers by the end of August, which is a curious month for consultation in the stock exchange. There was no consultation at all with the CBI. That does not seem to be the right way to embark upon producing the measures that the Government hope to see.

Mr. Clarke: There has been enormous consultation on the part of the Bill that deals with insider trading and that consultation will continue. I shall deal with that when I come to the relevant part of the Bill. That matter is being handled by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury who is in his place. He and his Department have been consulted and have submitted draft clauses.

We shall continue to consult, and if we are satisfied that further amendment is required to make the position clear and satisfactory to the legitimate interests of the stock exchange and others, we shall consult on further draft clauses. This part of the Bill is being taken forward with considerable care. It is essential that we do not do anything that will damage the ordinary, legitimate activity of the City, which is so vital to the country's economy. As I have said, we shall consult for as long and as widely as is necessary in the same way as we have consulted carefully so far.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The Home Secretary spoke about drugs and in that context part II of the Bill is important. I should like to mention the effective work of the north Wales police in drugs-related crimes at the port of Holyhead and perhaps even on the English border. If the Minister wishes to crack this problem he must ensure that there are more police. I would like an assurance that he will look carefully, seriously and urgently at the request by the north Wales police for 54 policemen on their establishment. Will he please do that?

Mr. Clarke: That is an extremely ingenious request. I agree that the police and the Customs and Excise have been successful in the seizure of drugs and the prosecution of those who are responsible for trafficking. That is not a function of having more and more policemen but of ever-improving intelligence and effectiveness in deploying the specialist squads that are required. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are more suitable occasions for discussing police manpower and deployment. We have an excellent record on increasing police manpower. It expanded enormously over the 1980s and it is obvious that continued improvements in the way that manpower is deployed is more important than bids each year from police forces.

I propose in the police reforms that the north Wales police and every other force will not have to come to the Home Secretary each year to ask him to decide how many police should be deployed in each county force. I propose much more discretion for chief constables and a strengthened police authority. They will decide how best to deploy the resources that are within the ability of the economy to afford. However, those are matters for another day.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): My right hon. and learned Friend spoke about a review of the unit fines system. People, magistrates and judges are incensed by the fact that a middle income man exceeding the speed limit on a motorway at 2 o'clock in the morning will suffer a more severe financial penalty than most drug traffickers. People are not asking for a review of unit fines. They want them abolished and previous powers restored.

Mr. Clarke: I do not agree with my hon. Friend. I have said that I do not like the way in which the unit fines system works. That is why my hon. Friend the Minister of State is again urgently addressing the matter. In principle, courts have always related fines to the ability of the offender to pay. That must continue so that a comparatively prosperous offender who can afford it will pay a large sum for a speeding offence and a not very well-off thief will pay no more because he may not have the means. However, for a thief and certainly for a drug offender, fines may not be the appropriate penalty: custodial sentences of some kind may be called for.

We are addressing the anomalies that appear to be occurring in practice so that we retain the sensible provision that a financial penalty, when appropriate, should reflect the ability of the offender to pay without some of the absurdities that have occurred. Some of those absurdities were self-inflicted by people without means who did not fill out the form and were fined the maximum amount. Some magistrates do not take any action against people who have not filled in the form but impose the maximum fine. I hope that such hiccups can be eliminated in practice. Meanwhile, we need to look again at the rules.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The Minister was asked about recruiting more police but that is pointless unless they are backed by the actions of sheriffs and judges in Scotland, for example. The public perceive inconsistencies in sentencing but nobody seems to review the performance of sheriffs and judges and, no doubt, magistrates in England. Perhaps my right hon. and learned Friend will bear that in mind.

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor is responsible for the judiciary. No Minister ever comments on the sentence in any individual case.

We give the powers to the courts, and we expect the courts to make full and proper use of those powers. I should stress that it is not part of the Government's policy to inhibit the courts in the proper exercise of their powers. If the Criminal Justice Act 1991 is impeding in some way what the judiciary feel is their public duty, we will rapidly address that and remedy it as soon as we can. In the end, it is a matter for the judiciary to impose the right sentence based on the facts of a particular case. Parliament is here to indicate the range of penalties we think are suitable and give them the powers that they need. I hope that, in Scotland and south of the border, the powers are used.

Mr. Barry Jones: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I must get on. I cannot allow a second question about the police in north Wales. I have been generous enough already, and I would now like to turn to the detail of the Bill.

The House must return—although it may not be willing to do so—to the legal detail. The objects are worthy; the text requires some explanation. I hope to guide the debate by setting out some of the detail as clearly as possible.

Part I of the Bill fills some gaps in our courts' jurisdiction to try offences of fraud and dishonesty with a significant foreign element. It enacts, with some modifications, the recommendations of the Law Commission's 1989 report on the subject. Part I applies only to England and Wales; Scotland and Northern Ireland have their own legal systems, and this part will not apply there. Part I is a largely technical adjustment of existing legal rules, and remains rather daunting reading. It may help if I try to set out briefly the existing legal position and how part I will change it.

The courts in England and Wales exercise a "territorial" jurisdiction, which means, with very few exceptions, that they are only able to try people for crimes committed in England and Wales. Part I retains this important principle, but is designed to change the rules by which the courts decide whether or not an offence has been committed in these two countries. That is not as straightforward a matter as it might at first appear. As the Law Commission explained in its report:

[Mr. Clarke]

"The planning, preparation and execution of the many operations which are involved in a complicated swindle frequently takes place in several different countries. Under the present law none of the participants can be prosecuted here unless the last event which makes up the underlying crime occurs in England or Wales. Moreover, in cases in which those concerned are detected before they have completed their purpose, it is unlikely that they will be prosecuted in the country where they plan to reap the benefit, and because the underlying crime was not complete here they cannot be tried in England and Wales. In the result, they will in all probability not be convicted anywhere".

I will try to give a more day-to-day example. Let us imagine that a criminal in London places an advertisement in The Times inviting people to invest in a non-existent factory in Japan by paying money into a Tokyo bank account. A victim responds to the advertisement, and instructs his bank to transfer money to Tokyo. When the criminal retrieves his money, he has no need at all to flee to South America—unless he wishes to escape from our winter weather, or has some other purpose—because as things stand he has committed no offence under English law and cannot be prosecuted here. That is because the last element of the crime—obtaining of the proceeds in Tokyo—did not occur here. So, if the victim can be induced to part with his money outside this country, then our courts will not have jurisdiction.

This gap in jurisdiction was largely theoretical in the past but it has become more and more real with the advent of new technology, which has made the transfer of money around the globe an easy and everyday—or, rather, every-minute—activity. We want the law to keep up with the fraudsters, if not ahead of them. So this Bill will provide that, in a case such as I have outlined—where a fraud has a significant connection with this country—our courts will have jurisdiction, whether or not the final element of the crime occurred here.

The substantive fraud and dishonesty offences to which this change will apply are listed in clause 1, and are called group A offences. Experience tells us these are the sort of offences committed by the international criminals at whom this measure is aimed. If the list needs amending in future to catch up with developments in the criminal world, The Secretary of State is given the power by clause 1 to add offences to the list or to delete them, subject to Parliament's approval.

Part I will also catch those who fully intend to defraud others but, through no merit of their own, fail to do so. In the case I gave earlier, the criminal would still be guilty of an offence here even if the police had spotted his advertisement and arrested him before anyone had lost their money.

Clauses 5 and 6 fill another gap in our law by giving our courts jurisdiction over incitements, conspiracies and attempts in this country which are aimed at the commission of the equivalent of a group A offence abroad; there needs to be an equivalent offence in the country concerned. So, for example, people who plot in this country to defraud victims in Japan will in future be guilty of an offence here and be triable by our courts.

Mr. Ashby: The example my right hon. and learned Friend gives is one of obtaining property by deception in the United Kingdom. There are many cases of this sort and it is the Attorney-General's reference No. 2 of, I believe, 1986 that part 1 is intended to cover. What worries me is whether my right hon. and learned Friend can assure the House that potential defendants will not be put in double jeopardy by being tried abroad—because most of the crime will be tried abroad—and, if they are aquitted abroad, retried over here, or vice versa. It would be a gross injustice if people were to be put in double jeopardy and be tried several times around Europe for offences committed inter-state. Will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that that will not happen?

Mr. Clarke: With great respect to my hon. Friend, I am not sure that it is as clear as he believes it is that the example I give is of an offence in this country. I would incline to the view that it is not. Although I accept that there are conflicting authorities, they are probably sufficiently in conflict for no one to be prosecuted. I think there is little chance of double jeopardy in that particular case unless a person was foolish enough to go to Japan, because it is not necessary to go there to get the proceeds.

We are making it clear that someone in this country who commits a crime the last element of which takes effect in Tokyo is committing an offence here so long as a relevant part of the offence was committed in England. I think that is a valuable clarification of the law.

I quite accept, however, that my hon. Friend has a good point about double jeopardy. We do not want international crime to be dealt with in such a way that people keep being tried in different countries for the same offence. I will be happy to address that point again, or others will in Committee.

We need safeguards, but I think we can assume that in practice prosecuting authorities around the world will not normally keep prosecuting the same person for the same offence as he foolishly moves around the world going from jurisdiction to jurisdiction to collect the full total of his just deserts. I will give more thought to that point and, if necessary, address it in Committee.

Parts II and III of the Bill deal with money laundering and the confiscation of the proceeds of crime. I am glad to say that these parts received most attention in the debates in another place. I think this is the most important part of the Bill as far as the general public is concerned. We can and must have many serious discussions about the causes of crime; debates about the changing nature of society and the restoration of values are important but rarely come to definite or immediately practical conclusions.

The most straightforward specific cause of crime—which is most tangibly within the reach of government, the authorities and the public to tackle—is the abuse of drugs and the illegal traffic in drugs. Police, Customs, the courts and the public must be helped to maintain a relentless fight against drug trafficking; but the trade is immensely, fabulously lucrative, and the best policing efforts will be in vain if the profits are not attacked and retrieved by the courts of every country affected.

One of the main purposes of my visit to Latin America last year was to discuss with Governments menaced by hugely wealthy drug organisations how we might strengthen international action against that ill-gotten wealth. Britain is in the forefront of countries that have ratified the Vienna convention, legislated against money laundering and got under way with the seizure and confiscation of criminal gains, but we must go further. I am determined that Britain should have one of the most effective—and just—sets of legal provisions in the world to take the fight to where it damages drug trafficking most—the removal of the vast profits which inspire and finance the individual traffic.

Part II will amend and strengthen the confiscation procedures in the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that these measures and all the other measures that this House has enacted in recent years are effective only if the basis of the intelligence information which the police and Customs authorities receive in the United Kingdom is well organised? Will my right hon. and learned Friend refer to the increasing success of our drug liaison officers overseas and to the way that they channel back intelligence which is used by the regional crime squads, Customs and the police? Is it not that—not necessarily the number of police and Customs officers—which makes their work effective? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is the effectiveness of the information that is received and how it is made use of that will make the measure that we propose to enact today successful?

Mr. Clarke: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. His question relates to the detection of drug trafficking in particular but also to intelligence about where the assets are going. Intelligence is the key to any success with drug trafficking or terrorism. Our drug liaison officers around the world are extremely courageous and invaluable people, and they have had enormous success. Our activities in that area are as good as those of any other country. They probably rival those of the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, although that agency enjoys vast resources, compared with ours. The organisation and effectiveness of the individuals who specialise in this work matters far more than just pouring in huge numbers of people to do routine work. Organisation and effectiveness are how one makes progress. That is why we have made substantial progress in recent years.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Personally I welcome very much the fact that the British Home Secretary went to South America to discuss this problem on the spot and to see for himself, but what has come out of his visit and what is the strategy for persuading the hard-pressed Governments of countries such as Colombia and Peru to do something, however willing they may be, about an acute terrorist problem for them?

Mr. Clarke: If I may confine myself to Colombia, we provide considerable material assistance to the Government of Colombia, who are fighting courageously against very powerful drugs cartels which threaten their ability to govern their country. The Government of Colombia are on the right side in this struggle and they are making good progress. We are contributing very much to the training of their most effective police units, which operate in the jungles and search for the coca itself and the laboratories. We are also giving valuable assistance in developing their criminal justice system. They are therefore setting up a much more effective system for prosecuting and bringing to justice those whom they arrest. Since I went to Colombia, we have given further material support to the Colombian Government for that purpose.

I discussed also with the Colombian Government how we could take further forward bilateral agreements with them on the confiscation of the assets of drug traffickers. The trade is often organised by a combination of Colombian and British criminals, working in international organisations. I hope that we shall make progress on that front, too. We are actively working with the Colombian Government. It is important that we, from our end, as well as the other European countries and the United States, work with the Colombians against something which is just as much a threat to Colombia as it is to ourselves and which needs to be tackled at international level.

Part II will make its contribution to the Bill by strengthening yet further the procedures that were introduced in the 1986 Act. Hon. Members will recall that when it was introduced the 1986 Act was described by some people as draconian, but its measures were necessary and justified. The 1986 Act was intended to remove the profit motive by allowing the confiscation of all the trafficker's proceeds from drug trafficking, following conviction. The Act was also intended to ensure that the profits from drug trafficking could not be recycled to fund yet more trafficking. That Act needs to be strengthened.

This part of the Bill—clauses 7 to 15—is largely based on the report of the Home Office working group on confiscation, which was published in May 1991 for consultation. That group was established in response to the report of the Home Affairs Select Committee on drug trafficking and related serious crime, published in November 1989. The Home Office working group found that the 1986 Act had worked reasonably well, but it identified a number of important practical difficulties in its operation.

I do not propose to go through each clause in detail. Instead, I shall draw the attention of the House to those provisions which I consider to be the most important.

Clause 7 will end the uncertainty that has arisen in the courts over the standard of proof applicable in confiscation hearings. It makes it clear that the standard applicable is the civil standard—and its probability. This was, I believe, the intention when the 1986 Act was passed, but it was not made clear on the face of the legislation. Clause 7 also relieves the court from following the confiscation procedures in the 1986 Act each time that it convicts a drug trafficker.

Confiscation will take place only when notice is served on the court by the prosecutor, or at the court's discretion. This will filter out those cases in which there is obviously little or no benefit, or no realisable property. This does not mean that we are softening our approach to drug traffickers. The minor cases that do not attract a confiscation hearing under the new arrangements will continue to be dealt with severely by means of fines and forfeiture orders, as well as by imprisonment.

Clauses 12 and 14 will allow the court to confiscate proceeds in circumstances where that is not possible at present. Clause 12 will allow the prosecutor to return to the court within six years of a conviction for drug trafficking to seek a revaluation of the offender's benefit from drug trafficking, where further benefit has subsequently come to light. Clause 14 will enable a confiscation order to be made, even if a convicted trafficker dies or absconds. Confiscation will also be possible where a defendant absconds before conviction. We have included safeguards, such as rights of audience for third parties at confiscation hearings and compensation where an absconder returns and is actually acquitted.

[Mr. Clarke]

Part II also contains the primary legislation necessary to implement a European Community directive on money laundering, following the proposals set out in a Treasury consultation paper last May. The United Kingdom was closely involved in the drafting of this directive. Since it draws heavily upon the 1988 United Nations convention on drug trafficking and money laundering, which the United Kingdom ratified in June 1991, very little legislation is necessary.

Three new or extended criminal offences are created in the money laundering area: first, failure to report knowledge or suspicion of money laundering gained in the course of employment; secondly, acquiring, possessing or using the proceeds of drug trafficking for less than adequate consideration, in the knowledge that they are such proceeds; and, thirdly, prejudicing an investigation into money laundering by tipping off a third party.

Part III deals with the confiscation of the proceeds of crime in general. The effect is that a number of the changes made to the Drug Trafficking Offences Act in part II, which I have just described, are read across to other organised crime in part III, by amending the general confiscation provisions in part VI of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

This is an extremely significant change. We are extending the existing and most of the new drugs money laundering offences to crime in general. Until now, it has not been an offence to launder the proceeds of any crime other than drug trafficking and, in certain restricted circumstances, terrorism. That allowed a suspected money launderer to say that the money he was dealing with came from pornography or serious fraud rather than from drug trafficking and enabled the suspect to avoid being convicted of money laundering. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that that was absurd and indefensible. I am pleased to say that the banking and financial communities have given their full support to these new measures, which extend the money laundering provisions to most organised crime. Ministers are extremely grateful for their help.

I am also glad to be able to announce to the House that the Government intend to introduce in this House amendments to the Bill in Committee to reproduce, in the terrorism legislation, many of the changes being made in part II of the Bill to the confiscation and money laundering provisions contained in the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. Part III does not, as at present drafted, apply to the proceeds of terrorist offences because they are not covered by part VI of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. However, the Government regard tackling terrorist funds as an equally high priority.

The United Kingdom was the first country to introduce legislative measures against terrorist finances. These measures have given the police an additional and invaluable tool, which has enabled them to tackle the funds themselves and to obtain information on the movements and activities of the terrorists.

Finance remains the lifeblood of terrorist organisations. Such organisations and those who handle money on their behalf have become increasingly sophisticated in the way in which they raise and launder money. Disrupting the fund-raising efforts of terrorists and confiscating their resources and the proceeds of activities should be as important a new tool against terrorism as it should be against drug trafficking and other serious organised crime. I am sure that the House will agree that it is only right that the measures that are taken against terrorists' finances should, as far as is possible, match those taken against drug proceeds. Personally, I hold both forms of crime in the same profound contempt.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): As I understand it, once someone has been convicted of drug trafficking, the proceeds, whether or not they are related to that specific offence, can be confiscated. Will the same apply to terrorism and other offences?

Mr. Clarke: Some confiscation powers are already available under the prevention of terrorism legislation. In Committee, we shall table amendments to cover the new provisions on laundering, but first we must decide which of the provisions on drug trafficking should be read across to terrorists' finances. That will enable us to consider the total amount that has been raised and how far the assumptions which are an important part of the drug trafficking provisions should apply. We shall table amendments that, as far as is sensible, reflect the drug trafficking money laundering provisions.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Are the provisions on confiscation and on money laundering, which I believe stem partly from an EC directive, in place in other EC countries, because what the Home Secretary is saying makes the degree of co-operation at EC level under the third pillar of Maastricht even more important? It would be helpful to know at some stage whether these provisions and those on terrorism operate in other EC countries.

Mr. Clarke: All EC countries are making the changes to their domestic law necessary to apply the directive. The United Kingdom was at the forefront of countries pressing for a directive, because measures against drug trafficking and terrorism are not effective unless they apply throughout the European Community. Without notice, I am not sure how many countries have completed the legislative steps. I believe that the United Kingdom is ahead of others, but we are all slightly beyond the date by which we are meant to have implemented the directive. My hon. Friend the Minister of State may be able to give a more specific reply, but I am sure that there is no hesitation within the Community and that all 12 countries will fall in line with the highly desirable directive.

Part IV is, strictly speaking, the Treasury part of the Bill, which is why my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is on the Bench. It amends and restates the law on insider dealing and in so doing implements the EC directive on the subject. Hon. Members will, I hope, agree that insider dealing is crime. Securities markets play a vital role in financing companies, on which our prosperity ultimately depends. Markets also hold a large proportion of people's savings invested directly or on their behalf by institutions.

If those markets are to operate smoothly, they must inspire the confidence of investors, and an essential element of confidence is fairness. Insider dealing, if unchecked, destroys that confidence, which is why the Government made insider dealing illegal in 1980.

We believe in the benefits of having an EC directive on insider dealing, and Britain again played a leading role in negotiating the directive. With effective legislation in place across the Community, investors will be able to invest more confidently across Europe and to take advantage of the opportunities provided by the single market. The directive's detailed provisions will greatly assist in the pursuit of insiders who seek to cover their tracks by dealing across borders.

Mr. Ashby: My right hon. and learned Friend rightly says insider dealing is effectively theft on a grand scale from a number of poor investors. Is part IV covered by part I, and if not why not?

Mr. Clarke: Off the cuff, subject to correction by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in his reply, it must be. Part I will cover a range of international crime and if insider trading is being conducted across borders, the same rules as set out in part I will apply. If my off-the-cuff response is incorrect I shall ensure that a correction——

Mr. Donald Anderson: It is not a category A offence.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman points out that it is not a category A offence. He has had an opportunity to look it up, but he may be wrong. A more considered reply will be given later. The Economic Secretary is also taking the opportunity to look at this part of the legislation, for which he is directly responsible.

Nevertheless, the desirability of moving on insider trading is accepted by all of us and the Bill extends our legislation on insider trading to areas of conduct covered by the directive that are not currently illegal but are generally accepted as being wrong. I want to make quite clear to the House the Government's determination to ensure that legitimate business practices will not be jeopardised. I know that some fears have been expressed in the City and elsewhere, but nothing in the Bill will prevent the sort of contact between companies and investors that properly takes place today. The Bill will not require changes to the legitimate practices of investment analysis or mean modifying underwriting arrangements.

Indeed, much of the new legislation is similar to existing law. It will continue to be an offence for an insider who possesses inside information or someone who has obtained inside information from an insider—in deference to views expressed in another place I will, as far as possible, avoid describing that someone as a "tippee", which is a particularly poisonous addition to the English language —to take advantage of the information by dealing in securities to make a profit or avoid a loss. It will continue to be an offence for an insider or tippee to encourage someone else to undertake such dealing and for them to disclose inside information.

The definition of inside information is little changed from our present legislation. It includes information that relates to particular securities or to a particular issuer or issuers of securities, but not to securities generally or issuers of securities generally. The information must also be specific or precise, not have been made public, and be such that, if made public, it would have a significant effect on the price of securities. But unlike existing legislation, which applies only to companies securities, the new legislation will apply to all listed securities. It will apply to gilts and local authority stock and all securities traded on exchanges throughout the Community rather than just those that operate in this country.

Under the Bill, any individual with direct access to inside information will be an insider; they will no longer have to be connected with a company, as the present law requires. The Government believe that this change, which reflects the directive, is desirable because it is possible for someone to have direct access to price-sensitive information without being connected with a company.

The range of circumstances in which insider trading is prohibited will be widened. The Bill's prohibitions apply to all transactions which involve a professional intermediary, whether on or off market. The move from the trading floor to screen-based trading has made the market much more difficult to define than when legislation was passed in 1980. The new legislation seeks to treat the market in terms of those transactions that are likely to contribute to the price formation process for a security. As a result, the new legislation will apply to dealings in Eurobonds, which are generally listed within the Community but traded off market.

There are two further ancillary offences in addition to dealing—disclosing inside information to someone else and encouraging someone else to deal.

However, I should make it clear that innocent activity will not be penalised. Conduct will not amount to a criminal offence unless a person knows that the information he possesses is inside information and that he has the information as an insider or directly or indirectly from an insider. For example, someone who deals while in possession of information that he believes to be in the public domain will not fall within the ambit of the legislation even if his or her belief turns out to be misplaced. There will be no offence where someone did not intend to use inside information to make a profit or to avoid a loss because he would not be "taking advantage" of the information. There are various exemptions and limitations to ensure that the legislation does not impact

As for penalties, the Government made it clear in 1980 in their response to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry's report on company investigations that we proposed to retain the criminal law as the primary means for punishing insider dealers. Accordingly, the Bill carries forward the penalties that apply under our existing law, which are up to seven years' imprisonment with a fine.

The Bill's insider dealing provisions are the result of considerable discussion between the Treasury, practitioners in the City and representatives of industry in general. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) complained, but there has been consultation on the broad principles of the legislation and on an initial draft of the clauses in the summer, and consultation has continued since the Bill was introduced in another place.

As I have already said, the Government are aware that there is still a wish for greater certainty about the effect of the legislation. We have listened to the representations made and will continue to do so, and we shall make further amendments where we are convinced of the case for so doing.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Why has the existing legislation on insider dealing been so ineffective? During the past five years, there have been 30 prosecutions but only 13 convictions.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that those figures are wholly accurate. They are in the right ball park but they are not spot on. There have been convictions. The total number of convictions is not the only measure by which to judge the effectiveness of such a provision. I am sure that the provision has a considerable deterrent effect on what would otherwise be trading of below acceptable standards in securities, which is treated as a serious criminal offence in this country.

We have played a part in introducing the fresh directive, which is giving rise to the need to strengthen and extend the law. It is extremely important for London's reputation as a financial centre that our standards are as high as any others. We must make it clear that those who make improper use of insider information will be treated as criminals, brought before the courts and prosecuted. If the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) believes that the existing legislation is not sufficiently effective, I am sure that he will welcome the Bill, which seeks to make the law more effective and extend its scope.

Mr. Maclennan: What the Home Secretary says about the deterrent effect of the legislation may be true; it is hard to prove. However, he will be aware that there is widespread and genuine concern, expressed most notably by Lord Alexander of Weedon on Second Reading in another place, that many cases of alleged insider dealing, which have been brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry by the stock exchange, among other authorities, have not led to effective prosecution. There are serious questions about enforcement in cases where there is significant evidence.

In preparing this legislation, has the Home Secretary considered whether there is a need for parallel self-regulatory measures for the City or other institutions in order to provide a civil remedy to back up the effectiveness of the criminal remedy?

Mr. Clarke: Concern has been expressed in both directions. Some people in the City are worried about the ordinary, legitimate practices of investment analysts and others being threatened. We can reassure those who have such fears and will continue to do so during the consultation process. Others are worried that we do not always enforce the law as strictly as we might, enforcement being in the hands of the Director of Public Prosecutions or, more often in practice, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. However, cases are brought.

Sadly, it is the case that we must first get the drafting right so that the law can be enforced effectively. That is why we shall continue to consult Lord Alexander and anyone else who wishes to give his views. Secondly, there must be some self-regulatory provisions. There is a role for the stock exchange and the City generally to ensure that the criminal law is paralleled by proper self-regulation by those responsible for the markets. People such as Lord Alexander and other leading lights in the City will be anxious to ensure that self-regulatory activity also exists.

Finally, part V of the Bill contains various minor measures. I do not need to trouble the House with them except to mention clause 43. It extends the jurisdiction of United Kingdom courts where a fraudster takes part in or organises here fraud against the European Community budget in other Community countries. It will ensure that the United Kingdom is and is seen to be taking positive action against Community fraud, and will help to allay the legitimate fears expressed in both Houses.

The Bill deals with a number of serious mischiefs which I hope that all hon. Members will condemn. It makes a number of changes that will not harm legitimate business or threaten the law-abiding, but it will greatly improve our ability to investigate and prosecute a wide range of financial crimes. I know from earlier interventions that hon. Members are concerned about various criminal justice issues. They may be disappointed about the scope of the Bill which started life in another place last October. They may feel that it does not go wide enough to tackle all their concerns, but there will be other opportunities—I hope before too long, if I have my way—for us to consider many of them.

Although there are some pressing problems outside the scope of the Bill, that would in no way detract from its importance. We are dealing with very serious crime. The Bill will significantly strengthen the ability of the enforcement authorities and the courts to deal effectively with white collar crime and will do so in ways that I hope all hon. Members will be able to support. I commend the Bill to the House.

6.6 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): As the Home Secretary said, the Bill spans a disparate set of issues, but they have in common a concern for the growing internationalisation of crime. The impact of modern communications, travel, computer technology and cross-frontier trading has given renewed scope to organised criminal activity. It is essential that the law keeps pace and that old common law rules —or, indeed, old statute—which are right for one era do not continue unamended or unchanged when plainly wrong or inadequate for another.

There is no disagreement about the general purpose of the Bill, although there is some disquiet about the drafting of some parts and the content of specific provisions. They may be archetypal matters for the Committee stage and for those who will have the pleasure of participating in that stage, but they are also important matters to be raised on Second Reading. I begin with the issue of drugs and drug trafficking, which I believe will be of paramount concern to hon. Members and the public.

There is no doubt that drugs are a dangerous menace to our society. There is increasing evidence of a rise in the number of drug addicts, of a link between drugs and crime, the prevalence of drug trafficking and, perhaps most alarming of all, the number of young people even of school age who are being drawn into early experimentation with and use of drugs.

I do not think that anyone, whether working with drug abusers or in drug enforcement, believes that the problem is diminishing. It is not. It is growing, and the greatest danger of all is complacency in the face of the threat that drug abuse poses to our country. The figures for the latest year for which they are available show, for example, that the number of addicts notified to the Home Office rose by some 17 per cent. and that that followed a 20 per cent. increase the previous year. The number of new addicts has risen by a similar number. Although the numbers of seizures of course reflect success by our drug enforcement agencies, in 10 years they have risen more than threefold, and seizures of heroin have increased by more than 200 per cent. Even making allowances for changes in procedures and greater success by the drug agencies, those figures should cause concern.

The number of persons found guilty of drug offences has risen almost threefold in 10 years. Again, the most worrying feature is the rise in the number of young drug offenders. The number of offenders under the age of 17 has risen tenfold in as many years, and the number of those between 17 and 21 has risen fourfold over a decade. Offenders under 21 represent 40 per cent. of offenders but 80 per cent. of the latest yearly increase in offending.

Anybody who knows the King's Cross area in London, as do hon. Members who pass through it on their way to their constituencies, will know of the appalling drug problems that have recently been highlighted by the Independent on Sunday and other newspapers. There have been about seven deaths from drug-related causes in the space of nine days. The police in those areas and in many other parts of our inner cities do their best in extremely difficult circumstances. My hon. Friends the Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) have campaigned long and hard on the problems of King's Cross, and have raised the issue specifically with the Home Secretary. I hope that he will respond positively.

The drugs problem is increasing, yet Government policy in other areas, not only in the Home Office sphere, is withdrawing some of the most vital support needed in the fight against drug abuse. For example, until the end of last month, the Department for Education had 100 drug advisory posts, but it has now ceased to fund them and says that it is up to local authorities to do so. The plain fact is that in present circumstances local authorities will not have the resources to fill the gap. That means that those posts, which perform a great role in educating our young people about the dangers of drugs, will no longer exist. It cannot be sensible to pass legislation that, rightly, bears down on those trafficking in drugs, yet at the same time to allow other Government Departments to make decisions in other areas that run entirely counter to the fight against drugs.

Exactly the same could be said about cuts in the youth service. Three quarters of those involved in that service expect to make cuts this year, and the urban programme faces similar problems. There are cuts in residential provision for drug addicts and abusers.

A pamphlet recently published by the trade unions representing people working in Customs and Excise estimated that, as a result of changes in funding, about 400 Customs officers engaged in the war against drugs would be lost. I do not know whether that estimate is correct; I hope that the Minister who replies will deal with the question. Again, it would be bizarre if we attempted to deal with people who had been caught committing drugs offences and had been convicted if in other areas we were taking steps that undermined the fight that we should all support.

Although the number of drug trafficking offenders has declined in proportion to the number of drug offences overall, there is no doubt that drug trafficking into the United Kingdom is increasing. The value of drugs seized by the Customs and Excise has multiplied by a factor of about 20 over the past few years. The United States estimates that drug seizures account for about 10 per cent. of the drugs destined for the United States market. If we apply the same criterion to our seizures, we find that drugs with a street value of as much as £2,000 million enter the United Kingdom every year.

The report on "Drug Trafficking and Related Serious Crime" published by the Home Affairs Select Committee a few years ago said:

> "The National Drugs Intelligence Co-ordinator ... estimated that there is at least £1,800 million derived from drug trafficking in the United Kingdom. In its written memorandum, the NDIU noted that such vast amounts of money circulating within the legitimate banking system may have a destabilising effect on smaller financial institutions. The NDIC also indicated that, despite the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, the United Kingdom continued to be a major centre for money laundering. Indeed, he said that the United Kingdom was regarded by the United States, Canada and some others as an offshore banking system"

On the basis of that report and of the evidence that we have accumulated, there is no doubt that we must fight the drugs problem at both a national and an international level.

I was interested to hear the Home Secretary make a point arising from his visit to South America. Reading the many detailed background papers, I came across the bilateral confiscation agreements made between our country and other countries whereby we can confiscate the proceeds of drug trafficking via arrangements made with other countries to facilitate that process. Clearly that is most important in helping to crack down on people engaged in drug trafficking. I noticed that absent from the list of countries with which we have such agreements were the names of countries such as Colombia, Thailand, Afghanistan and Peru. When the Minister winds up, perhaps he will tell us whether any progress has been made towards concluding agreements with those countries. It seems important that some of the main drug trafficking centres should have reciprocal arrangements such as those that have worked well in other areas.

At this stage I raise the problem caused by drug traffickers' use of Nigerians, especially Nigerian women, as drug couriers to enter this country. Apparently, large numbers of poor Nigerians, especially women, receive long gaol sentences here. I understand that a recent survey revealed that all the children taken into care by the London borough of Hillingdon, in which Heathrow lies, are Nigerian. That is an immense problem, to which the right hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), as chairman of the all-party penal affairs group, drew attention last year.

I should be obliged if the right hon. Gentleman would comment on the concern that, although, for obvious reasons, the sentences are long, they are not having any deterrent effect. Can he tell us what arrangements are being made to bring home to people in Nigeria the consequences of undertaking such actions, and the need to clamp down on that drug trafficking route?

Like the Home Secretary, I feel that, whether we like it or not, it is correct to deal with the detailed provisions of the Bill. We supported the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, and we support the basic thrust of the Bill. Some of the changes that it makes are welcome, but some raise serious issues of principle that it is right at least to canvass on Second Reading. As has been said by hon. Members on both sides of the House, that is especially right in view of the problems that have arisen as a result of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. We should take special care to ensure that the Bill is well drafted.

[Mr. Tony Blair]

The 1986 Act allowed the police to obtain information about a suspect's affairs and to restrain the removal of his assets before trial—that is rather like a criminal form of a Mareva injunction. The court was given the power to make an order after conviction confiscating the entire proceeds of drug trafficking from the offence for which the person has been convicted and also from other drug trafficking. The court was also given the power to assume that the assets of an offender, certainly for up to six years before the proceedings, were the proceeds of trafficking unless the defendant proved otherwise.

Those powers in the 1986 Act have been described as draconian. Clearly they are draconian; they were meant to be. Draconian powers are fully justified because of the appalling evil that they are designed to counter. It is clear that confiscation orders have been of considerable use. Perhaps the Minister will give us the precise figures when he winds up, but I believe that about 1,000 such orders have been used in the past year. None the less, because of the nature of those powers, it is important to consider them carefully and ensure that they are drafted and used properly.

The debate in another place has been of great benefit in preparing for this debate. The discussions were of high quality and went into great detail, and they raised a number of points which deserve investigation.

The Bill makes some significant changes to the 1986 Act. At present, confiscation proceedings are mandatory; they will now be permissive if the prosecution wants them to be so. If the prosecution declines, the court has the power to order them. Under clause 8, as the Home Secretary said, the court can determine sentence before confiscation, rather than, as now, having to complete confiscation before sentence.

The clause introduces two further changes which have aroused some controversy and at which it is worth our while to look for a moment. First, the clause changes the standard of proof for the confiscation of property from drug traffickers from the criminal to the civil standard—in other words, from "beyond reasonable doubt" to "on the balance of probabilities". Secondly, it obliges the court, rather than simply permitting it, to make statutory assumptions about the defendant's assets. Whatever assets a defendant has, the assumption is that they are the proceeds of drug trafficking.

There are now, therefore, a number of fairly unusual features in the procedure for confiscation. That was the point of my intervention in the Home Secretary's speech and I may return to the matter in a moment. We should examine the justification for those features.

First, the proceeds that can be confiscated under the 1986 Act and under the Bill are not just those that are the product of the particular offence for which the person is being tried, but all proceeds from drug trafficking, whether a criminal trial has taken place or not. Secondly, to prove that such assets are the proceeds of drug trafficking requires only a civil standard of proof. Thirdly, the court is obliged to assume that those assets are the proceeds of trafficking unless the defendant shows otherwise.

As I read the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Redbourne, the effect of the assumptions not being disproved is that they stand as facts. In other words, the confiscation applies to all drug trafficking irrespective of the particular offence, and the court is entitled—indeed obliged—to assume, unless it is proved otherwise, that all the property of the defendant is the proceeds of drug trafficking.

That point caused some concern in the other place. If the issue of the standard of proof is taken in isolation, it could be argued that the recovery of proceeds from drug trafficking going wider than the particular offence is almost akin to a civil suit for fraud, for example, and that, therefore, a civil standard of proof is not unreasonable. However, the accumulation of a lower standard of proof plus the assumptions that go a long way towards establishing proof and their mandatory nature somewhat restrict the ability of the court to take into account all the factors that it wishes to take into account.

Whatever people think about the Criminal Justice Act 1991, the real problem with it is that it imposes far too much of a straitjacket on the court in relation to sentencing. We should at least be careful, especially in relation to the mandatory nature of the assumptions, in deciding whether it is necessary to go that far. There is no evidence of which I am aware that courts have been hesitant about assuming that the assets of a defendant are the proceeds of drug trafficking. In the absence of any concern that courts have been reluctant to apply the provisions, that point is at least worth looking at.

I am not sure whether the Home Secretary dealt with this point. The proceeds of other offences, such as armed robbery or organised crime other than drug trafficking, carry no such assumptions and only the proceeds of a specified crime can be confiscated. Drug trafficking is treated differently from armed robbery and from other organised crime. I am not sure whether the Home Secretary wants terrorist offences to fit into the category of drug trafficking or of armed robbery. In any event, there is a clear disparity in the way in which such offences are treated. No doubt the Minister of State will tell us the reason for that. It may be that experience shows, for example, that the life styles of drug dealers are so bound up with drugs that it is reasonable to apply different procedures. If we are making that distinction, it is right that we should justify it properly.

Clause 18 deals with money laundering. Under the clause, a person is now to be guilty of an offence if "he knows, or suspects" that another is money laundering, and if he learns that fact in the course of his work and then fails to disclose it. I assume that that is an attempt to comply with article 7 of the European directive of June 1991, because the directive uses the words "know or suspect" in relation to money laundering.

It has been said in the other place that to make someone guilty of a criminal offence merely because he suspects that somebody is guilty of money laundering rather than because he believes it or knows it places too low a burden on the prosecution. I should like the Minister to deal with two points on that. First, will he confirm that a subjective test will be applied under the legislation? In other words, will the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused suspected that money laundering had taken place and not merely that it was reasonable for him to do so or that he had grounds for doing so? Will the prosecution have to prove that he possessed that subjective state of mind at the time?

Secondly, and perhaps more importantly than anything else, the provision will make a great deal of difference to the way in which banks and other financial institutions operate. It will impose a fairly high degree of awareness on bank officials and others about the nature of the money with which they are dealing, and about its possible sources and the uses to which it will be put. It is right that we do that, but we should understand that there will have to be great changes in the ways in which those financial institutions operate. If there are not, quite lowly officials within the banking system may find themselves responsible in circumstances in which the real failure is the failure of higher management to give them proper training, to instruct them on the right things to look for and to ensure that they are able properly to keep track of the money with which they are dealing.

A report that repays reading if one can afford it—fortunately, I did not have to afford it—is the Touche Ross report on money laundering and risk which contains the results of a recent survey. The facts revealed are fairly shocking. First, it is estimated that the total sales—this is a truly staggering figure—of cannabis, heroin and cocaine in the United States and in Europe in 1989—more than three years ago—were more than $120 billion, of which $85 billion was laundered. If the Home Affairs Select Committee is right in believing that much of the laundering takes place in this country, that is reason enough for strong legislation.

The report then says that there were low levels of awareness and that fewer than 50 per cent. of stockbrokers or life insurance companies had educated staff on the prevention of money laundering or introduced specific controls. The report says that there is a clear need for financial institutions to establish proper practical guidance so that money laundering is spotted at an early stage.

It has come to my attention that the number of disclosures of money laundering following this legislation is estimated to triple from about 5,000 a year to as many as 15,000. I hope that the Minister will deal with the issue of resources, because such disclosures will require much more investigation and possibly more tricky investigation, as even a suspicion will have to be reported. It is clear that anyone in a halfway responsible position in a financial institution will make it absolutely clear that at the first opportunity he will draw to the attention of his superiors his suspicion that such activities may be taking place.

The Home Secretary dealt with the problems of the jurisdiction of the courts. I make one particular point about that. It is obvious at the moment that, if the last act necessary for the completion of an offence takes place in this country, the courts have jurisdiction. If it does not, they do not. The central change is that under the Bill, if any relevant act—that is, any act necessary to prove a conviction—takes place here, the courts will have jurisdiction. That follows in part from the recommendations of the Law Commission in April 1989.

We live at a time when large sums of money are controlled by international fraudsters and it is surely right, and in accordance with the principles of comity of nations, that, if any part of the action takes place here, there is jurisdiction. I gather that the Bill was substantially amended in the House of Lords, and I pay tribute to the work of Baroness Mallalieu in ensuring that the provisions were considerably tightened up.

Finally, let me deal with the issue of insider dealing. Let us be clear that everyone wants to root out insider dealing: it destroys the integrity of the market and undermines confidence in share transactions. There is no doubt that the present law—or, perhaps more accurately, the present system—of investigating and prosecuting insider dealing leaves much to be desired. I understand that, over the past five years, the stock exchange has drawn the Department's attention to more than 100 cases of suspected insider dealing. There have been some 33 prosecutions—the Minister will no doubt tell us the exact figure—only about 16 of which have been successful.

In the other place, Lord Alexander suggested that there should be a City regulatory authority to exercise a parallel jurisdiction—to force, for example, the disgorging of profits or a penalty or redress—running alongside the criminal law. I hope that the Minister will comment on that. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), who speaks for the Opposition on such matters, thinks that that is worth investigating. As he has rightly said, the overall regulatory system may be so inadequate at present that any attempt to run a parallel system alongside the criminal law may fail. Once again, however, the objectives are in danger of being damaged by inadequate drafting.

The Home Secretary said that this part of the Bill made few changes to the law. I think that the changes that it makes are quite significant, and they have certainly given rise to concern. In place of the present 1985 Act definition of insider information as information not generally known to people dealing in the relevant securities, there is a new definition of insider information, which includes information which "has not been made public".

That is a much broader definition. That may be right and, again, it follows the wording of article 1 of the 1989 European Council directive. But what is public and what is not will be pretty difficult to define.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I refer the hon. Gentleman to section 10 of the Company Securities (Insider Dealing) Act 1985, which is broadly similar to what is included in the Bill. It starts from a different place in working up compliance with the directive, but broadly the effect is the same—so it should be business as usual.

Mr. Blair: With great respect, I am not entirely sure that that deals with the point. The critical definition concerns the nature of the information itself. At the moment, insider information is defined as information that is not generally known by those who deal in the relevant securities. Under the new definition, insider information is simply information that "has not been made public".

That immediately gives rise to the question of what "making public" means. In other words, what constitutes publication will determine what are the necessary elements of an offence.

I am not sure that section 10 of the 1985 Act deals with that point, although that can no doubt be considered in Committee. Concern has been expressed among analysts, fund managers and others that the provision could inhibit entirely proper dealing. A brief has been prepared by Clifford Chance, among other leading solicitors' firms which operate in the field. It is worth taking such concern seriously, and I hope that the Minister will do precisely that.

The definition of dealing is to be broadened so as to include those who do not receive information direct from an insider. This is a somewhat technical point, but the defence under section 3(2) of the 1985 Act allows the use of market information about a given transaction when that information is being used for the purposes of completing a transaction. That is most obvious in takeover activity. Under the Bill, however, market information can be used, but only when it is "reasonable . . . to deal" in that information. Concern has been expressed that the term "reasonable to deal" is so broad that it could give rise to uncertainty as to whether a criminal offence was being committed. I understand that the Treasury has said that it will issue guidelines on that point. The Confederation of British Industry and others have said that the guidelines should be statutory. I should have thought that, if we are constructing a criminal offence, the more that is in the statute itself rather than the guidelines, the better.

[Mr. Blair]

The provisions are technical and complex but, as the Home Secretary said, they are also important—and fundamental to the fight against drug abuse. In all these matters, a common thread emerges: crime is rising rapidly. In each area covered by the Bill, enormous problems of detection and prosecution occur. Ultimately, a criminal justice system means not just effective laws and effective enforcement but strong policies of prevention. The war against drugs and drug abuse means tackling demand as well as supply. The rooting out of insider dealing needs a culture of honesty and openness in the City as well as rules that forbid such dealing.

The Bill is one part of the fight against drug abuse and malpractice—and that fight is only one element in the fight against all types of criminal activity. The scale of crime in Britain today is a scandal. It weakens our ability to function successfully as a society and it destroys the quality of life for many innocent and law-abiding people. For the reasons that I have given, we shall not oppose the Bill on Second Reading, but we give the Government notice that, in the coming months, we shall grasp every opportunity to harry them for their failure to act against that scandalous level of crime, to bring forward coherent policies to combat it, and to treat crime as seriously as the people of the country they govern.

6.36 pm

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): First, I add my congratulations to the Home Office team—and to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, in particular—on this further effort by the Government to tackle the horrible problems of drug misuse. It is worth reminding ourselves that the Bill flows from the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, which, in establishing new crimes, giving the police and Customs and Excise substantially increased investigatory powers and establishing regional drug squads, not only represented an incredibly important step forward in this country but gave other countries a lead in the fight against drug misuse. I welcome the Bill.

My right hon. and learned Friend the referred to the way in which the Bill introduces a civil standard of proof—the balance of probability—rather than the criminal standard of "beyond all reasonable doubt". I seek an assurance that that will enable the police and prosecutors to get the top men—the big boys. So often, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said, legislation has been used to capture the carriers and the traffickers—the small people—while the big boys have seemed to get away with it. I hope that that change, and the fact that the courts will gain powers to confiscate further proceeds which may come to light after the initial confiscation order has been granted, will enhance the probability of pursuing and taking the proceeds away from the big organisers of big crime.

In particular, I welcome the new offence created for failing to report knowledge or suspicion of drug money laundering gained in the course of a trade or profession and the other elements which bear on drug money laundering. The clearing banks have taken great strides in establishing methods of policing drug money laundering within their own banks and between themselves. I should like to be reassured that those banks can incorporate into their established procedures the rules which will apply under the Bill.

Will the Minister reassure the House about how the present law is being applied by other financial institutions such as building societies, stock markets, insurance companies and accountancy companies or partnerships? If there is any doubt about whether the present law is being applied sufficiently, I hope that the Bill will give added impetus to organisations involved in financial services to do better in future.

Under the terms of the Bill, certain funds to combat drug trafficking and extradition will be placed on a statutory basis. I wonder what that means. How much funding is involved and to what will it be applied? With regard to funding and organisation, I also wonder how the operation of the new law might be affected detrimentally by changes in the organisation, funding or operation of police forces in this country. That may be a slight tangent, but it is so pertinent to the application of the Bill that it would be good to have some reassurance from Home Office Ministers that nothing which might conceivably affect the organisation of our police forces will affect the efficacy of this good legislation.

Sir John Wheeler: My hon. Friend has raised an important issue which was covered in previous reports by the Select Committee on Home Affairs. Will he take into account the fact that this month marks the anniversary of the establishment of the national criminal intelligence service, which was designed to meet my hon. Friend's point? It was designed to provide for better investigation of serious and organised crimes—80 per cent. of its work now relates to drug-related crime—and, through that service, the regional crime squads and the drugs wings of those squads co-ordinate the work of local police forces. My hon. Friend may feel that that meets the concern that he has expressed.

Mr. Rathbone: My right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) has gone into greater detail in relation to the point that I was making. I hope that none of what he referred to will be jeopardised. Similarly, I hope that the European extension of that into Europol, which was a British Government initiative, will not be jeopardised and will lead to the application of the same methods of intelligence-gathering on a continent-wide basis that we have applied on a national basis in this country.

What plans do the Government have to establish even closer liaison in future with other European countries and, on a bilateral basis with countries elsewhere in the world, to persuade them to adopt legislation similar to this Bill, which falls so well within United Nations conventions, within the Vienna convention and, in European terms, within European Community directives? Until other countries apply the same kind of laws that we have been developing in this country to control drug misuse and drug trafficking, much of our activity will unfortunately come to naught. I pay tribute to the Government's international initiatives in that sphere over the years. The British Government can, with justification, hold their head high with regard to the control of drug misuse.

However, the Bill has missed the opportunity to require confiscated moneys to be applied in order further to tackle drug misuse problems in this country. Moneys seized abroad through international co-operation can be used in this country for further funding of drug seizure and policing methods when foreign Governments pay that money to this country. Those moneys amount to a sizeable sum of £3 million or £4 million.

It is an anomaly, however that, at the end of 1991, the most recent year for which figures are available, some £35 million was available entirely within our own control, but the Treasury got its hands on that money—I am glad that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is on the Front Bench to hear this—and it was not used specifically to further the efforts of the police and their hard work in terms of containing this hideous problem.

My final point was touched on by the hon. Member for Sedgefield, and I believe that it should also be stressed from the Conservative Benches. The Bill is admirable and should be welcomed. Sadly, however, other parts of the Government are not marching to the same tune. In that regard, I mention specifically the Department of Health, which has unfortunately removed the ring fencing of funding for drug and alcohol treatment centres. They are in jeopardy, no matter what my colleagues or Ministers might say.

In addition, the Department for Education has done away with health education co-ordinators. They are perhaps the most important element of Government activity in tackling drug misuse because it is at that level —in schools and talking to young people—that we reduce the demand which fuels all the other problems of trafficking, money laundering and criminality associated with that which the Bill is designed to tackle. I commend my colleagues for introducing the Bill.

6.47 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I commend the work of the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) in this country and in various international forums in heightening the awareness of the House and of the public about drug abuse. I echo what he said about the very important point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), that we must see drug enforcement and other matters within the context of overall Government policy.

If we are to be concerned properly about drug money laundering and drug abuse, we must also consider prevention. On a right hand and left hand basis, I hope that those in government who are concerned with the criminal law will also consider what the Department of Health and the Department for Education are doing in terms of weakening the supports that prevent young people from entering drug abuse. We cannot consider one side of the problem without the other. In this area, and in other areas, my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield has enunciated the proper principle of being tough on crime and the causes of crime. That same principle can be applied well to this matter.

I suppose that the first response of practitioners and members of the public to a Criminal Justice Bill is, "Oh, not again." There is not a lot of time for catching breath and perhaps consolidating. That is especially true in the light of experience with the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Many experienced magistrates are resigning over the question of the unit fines and a general unhappiness about the way in which prosecutions are hampered by the failure fully to take into account the antecedents of a defendant. Given the relatively small amount of parliamentary time which is at the disposal of the Home Office, it would have been ideal for the Government to use this existing vehicle. Clearly, mistakes were made in the 1991 Act. Would it not be possible, even now, for the Government to use the existing vehicle to remedy some of the deficiencies which have arisen as a result of the operation of the 1991 Act?

As a commentary on the lack of time of the Home Office, I say only in passing that the Home Secretary will be aware of the vexed question of Sunday trading, where the Government are seemingly resigned to allowing law breakers to continue their law breaking for at least another year and to do nothing about it. That is something which could equally be dealt with by the Government by adopting an existing vehicle—the Shops (Amendment) Bill which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). That is a suggestion which I proffer in good faith to a Government who, undoubtedly—especially after Maastricht—are looking for ways to cut down parliamentary time for Government legislation. My hon. Friend's Bill is a means so to do.

As the Home Secretary said, the Bill is complex and technical. It is to be welcomed in its broad thrust because it updates, closes loopholes and seeks to bring existing legislation into line with matters which have been revealed as a result of experience. The Bill is largely the result of expert discussion, whether at the European Community level, the Home Office working party level or the Law Commission level. The Bill has already been extensively covered in the other place.

Therefore, we are left with picking what is left on the bones, as it were, and drawing attention to some of the deficiencies. One of those deficiencies is the failure to amend the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 in accordance with the provisions of this Bill. I am glad that the Minister is taking that on board, albeit belatedly.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield said, we can make no reasonable points about part I, which relates to jurisdiction. The point about the danger of double jeopardy needs to be tackled by the Government. Parts II and III, which relate to the confiscation of the proceeds of crime and money laundering, are more relevant. They raise the question of civil liberties and where one must draw the balance. All hon. Members recognise the scourge of the drug trade and the way in which so many innocent lives, especially among young people, are blighted by the activities of 'godfathers' who are frequently beyond the reach of jurisdiction. In our search for justice against those godfathers and the couriers, whether they be from Nigeria or wherever, we should not lose sight of basic civil liberties, the standard of proof and suspicion—not knowing and believing, as in section 22 of the Theft Act 1968. Those matters need to be examined carefully.

[Mr. Donald Anderson]

There is a feeling of unease about certain provisions in the Bill. Some people believe that the balance—as a result of the Government's zeal, understandably, successfully to prosecute more people—may be tilted too far and that some basic civil liberties may be overridden in the process. It is not necessary for me to cover the specific points of concern. I have no problem with putting the assets of the drug dealers in jeopardy for a further six years after conviction. That is proper. It is clear that many drug dealers are able to hide their assets by sophisticated methods. It is proper that a term be placed on that, and six years seems to be reasonable. Nor am I worried about the civil standard with regard to confiscation, although I wish that this was at the top of the civil standard of proof set out by way of guideline.

I am concerned about clause 13, relating to double sentence. There is a certain sense of unfairness that, although a person has served a sentence rather than the goods having been confiscated, the possibility of confiscation still stands. That is wrong in principle. I was not convinced by the explanation given in the other place. Perhaps the Minister can tell us whether there is a precedent in criminal law for such a draconian provision in clause 13.

I have already referred to the question of knowledge or suspicion under clause 16 and it is not necessary for me to dwell on that. I understand that the Minister will refer later to part IV, which relates to insider dealing. We understand the need to comply with an EC directive, which appears to be the motive behind the inclusion of part IV in the Bill. I simply ask about the extent to which Britain had a substantial say in the drafting of the various definitions. Several practitioners are concerned that, in our attempt to implement the directive, we have made less specific some of the terms which are used in our domestic legislation. The Minister will know the terms which are included. I wonder to what extent we have diluted what we thought was the proper practice as a result of the need to compromise at the EC level.

I refer to my earlier point that, clearly, the current provisions are not working adequately. I am a veteran of the discussions which resulted in the Companies Act 1981. At that time, the Government were wary of having any insider dealing provisions. They claimed that it was better to rely on self-regulation, although manifestly self-regulation was not working. Clearly, there were problems as a result of that self-regulation in obtaining evidence.

The position for the past five years—the source of the figures is column 748 in the Official Report of 13 January 1993—is that there were 30 prosecutions and only 13 convictions. If those who embark on prosecutions adopt the normal 50 per cent. rule—is there a more than 50 per cent. chance of succeeding in a prosecution?—clearly, they are failing. They are making judgments which have not been proved adequate in practice, and they are failing when more than half of the prosecutions on which they have embarked have failed.

Is it the view of the prosecuting authorities that the difficulties in obtaining prosecutions derive from a feeling on the part of juries that insider dealing is fair game and something which perhaps should not be within the ambit of the criminal law, or are there fundamental problems in terms of definition which prevent prosecutions from being successful? Presumably there must be research into why the prosecutions are failing. After all, the motive behind part IV is to implement an EC directive and not necessarily to improve the quality of our domestic legislation.

Mr. Nelson: As the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) have talked about numbers of cases, it might be helpful if I were to try to clarify the matter. I understand that 28 prosecutions have been brought and that there have been 17 convictions. Of the 43 people who were involved, 22 were found guilty. The rate of conviction is rather higher than the figure or figures that the hon. Gentleman quoted. In such cases it is difficult always to secure the information that is necessary to mount a conviction. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was so right to point to the deterrence aspects as well as the prospects of mounting a successful prosecution.

It is entirely proper that the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who have the right to bring the cases that we are discussing, should be satisfied before, at public expense and in the light of all the other factors that are involved, such cases are mounted. The performance has been credible and along the lines of the average for fraud cases. The Bill's provisions should make the performance even more successful in future.

Mr. Anderson: If the rate of conviction is somewhat higher than that which the written answer suggests, it is still only just above the hurdle of the 50 per cent. rule. Given the expensive nature of these cases, that is something that the Government need carefully to examine.

We are talking about an amendment to our domestic law that perhaps the Government would not have wanted. It is an amendment which derives directly from our need to implement an EC directive. I say rather mischievously in passing that I hope that such provisions will be implemented fully and in a draconian way in Italy as well as in the United Kingdom.

There has been a series of Criminal Justice Bills, and the one before us is clearly to be welcomed. There are points of detail that need to be examined. We face the constant problem of catching up with modern, technical developments and others and responding to the sophistication of criminals. In so far as it goes, the Bill is welcome in that respect.

7.2 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): First, I declare an interest. I am a paid adviser of the Legal and General Group plc, which has interests in part IV of the Bill, both as a quoted company on the stock exchange and as an investment management business. I am pleased that I do not have to declare any other interest. Notably, I am not a lawyer. I rose to speak with some trepidation, however, before tangling with the able and qualified lawyers who have already involved themselves in the debate.

I shall commence by lamenting what is not in the Bill. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), who in an intervention in the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary lamented the fact that we are not dealing with the problem of sentencing by way of unit fines, which were introduced in the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

We are creating something of a nightmare for the 29,000 lay magistrates and there is a crisis of morale. In my constituency we are feeling the effects of the problem quite severely. The most offensive part of the 1991 Act has been described by Lord Justice Taylor as an "ill-fitting straitjacket" on the sentencing policies of individual courts. I shall detain the House for a short while by quoting from the leader which appeared in The Times on 23 March. Part of it reads:

"The problems which have afflicted the Criminal Justice Act in its first six months illustrate the difference between sensible guidelines and rigid prescription. It is right that courts should be firmly directed in their sentencing. But the scales of justice cannot be reduced to an algorithm. The responsibility of magistrates to import local knowledge and expertise to the judicial process must be preserved. Rigidity and obscurity are no recipe for justice."

I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has already taken those points on board.

I also lament the fact that we are not able to deal with juvenile offenders in our consideration of the Bill. I can vouch for the fact that juvenile offending is a major problem in my constituency. The local police could name the 20 or 30 juvenile offenders with whom they have to deal time and time again. It is clear that we must deal with the problem as quickly as possible. The difficulties experienced in reforming these offenders may be acute, but it is not fair on the victims of their crimes that they are allowed to roam the streets because the detention policies hitherto tried have not been successful.

Apart from those caveats, I give a broad welcome to the Bill. It is directed primarily to financial crime, which is every bit as heinous and damages the victims every bit as badly as ordinary crimes. We tend to become preoccupied, as I was when making my earlier comments, with crimes which have a direct effect on individuals in a visual or graphic way, but financial crime has its own victims and causes its own misery. I give a strong welcome to the practical alterations to the law which turn on matters of jurisdiction and the proceeds of criminal conduct. I strongly welcome the proposed improvements to the law on drug trafficking.

I wish to focus especially on part IV, which is concerned with insider dealing. My central concern is that there appears not to be a full understanding of how institutions and quoted companies seek to smooth the market, to avoid volatility in the stock market, to give confidence to the market. I wish to focus on how the market works now and the threat that the Bill might present to the way in which the market works currently.

The concerns which I intend to articulate have been raised by a wide range of people and organisations. I shall refer briefly to but a few. First, there is the Investor Relations Society. There is the Hundred Group of Finance Directors, which is a club for the finance directors of the top 100 quoted companies in the United Kingdom. The group states:

"the ambiguities implicit in the drafting of the Bill . . . are so serious that it appears to us that the legislation will hinder legitimate business activities and market practices."

The Association of British Insurers wrote to me as follows:

"We are particularly concerned, as major investing institutions, that the provisions will unduly inhibit shareholder-company communications and restrict the ability of companies to raise capital."

The CBI states that it

"believes that the current provisions of the Bill, if unamended, will seriously hinder the development of open lines of communication between companies and investors."

The Institute of Directors has also written to me. It states:

"The IOD's Law Committee, whose membership comprises a wide range of business, professional and academic expertise, was unanimous that the Bill, as drafted, was, in spite of the Treasury's clearly expressed intention to the contrary, capable of casting doubt on the legality of directors effecting normal commercial corporate transactions. It could, accordingly, create substantial difficulty, uncertainty and unfair exposure to criminal penalties for directors of industrial and commercial companies."

The British Bankers Association has also written to me, as have many other organisations which are respected by the Government, I believe, and whose opinions we should take account of when considering these matters.

A survey conducted by a firm of solicitors—Fishburn, Hedges, Boys and Williams—last September among 50 investing institutions found that 62 per cent. of fund managers believed that the new legislation would damage the quality of their service to clients by stemming the flow of information and hampering their ability to analyse companies. Furthermore, it was clear that institutions think that the Government's proposals will create more problems than they will solve. Far from cracking down on insider dealing, they will restrict the communication on which all investors rely.

The fundamental flaw in the Bill is an apparent lack of understanding of how the market operates. In common, I am sure, with virtually all right hon. and hon. Members, I am in favour of strong and clear insider dealing legislation. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, such legislation is necessary for the market to operate effectively and so that investors may have confidence that the market reflects the true value of quoted companies.

There are two sides to the operation of the market. There are the stockbrokers on the sell side, who seek to sell securities to investors, and there are institutional and individual investors on the buy side. Institutions account for the major part of the buy side, with individual investors forming a very small proportion of today's market.

There are perhaps a dozen standard forms of communication between quoted companies and the market. I shall list the six main ones. Published and half-year results are price-sensitive information. When they are made known to the market, they are made known publicly and there is no ambiguity as to their status. Other information will be given to brokers in a standard form and is counted as publicly available information.

Specific announcements might be made at press conferences. If the market is informed by brokers that profits have been forecast as X but that the company is fully aware that profits will be half X, the company may issue a profits warning, to make clear to the market what will be its likely profits, so that the market is fully informed and can effectively reflect that information in the company's share price.

The less public channels of information are more under threat from the Bill. I refer to meetings with buy-side analysts at which brokers' analysts are met on a one-to-one basis or in groups in order better to inform them of a company's nature and position. The purpose is to divulge not price-sensitive or inside information but facts which could improve the brokers' understanding of the company, which will necessarily affect their view of it.

There are also one-to-one presentations to large shareholders. This is an essential and growing practice in the City. They enable the City to gain a better understanding of British industry and vice versa—something towards which Governments have been working for years. It is an important part of the communication process between industry and the City. There is also communication with small shareholders.

[Mr. Bernard Jenkin]

The last three practices relate not to public information but to legitimate information. If, for example, a company's published results prove to be very bad, investors and intermediate institutions are entitled to know of the problem which caused the fall in profits and the action that the company is taking to put the matter right. Such information will help to inform the share price. That is about giving the company the opportunity to explain its stance on key issues.

The objective of a responsible quoted company is to optimise its share price. I do not mean by that that it should try to bolster its share price at every opportunity because that would not be conducive to an optimum share price. Companies which attempt to bolster their share price at every opportunity tend to receive a low rating in the market, because the market does not necessarily attach the same importance to everything said by such a company as it would to a company which takes more care over the way it communicates with its shareholders.

The optimum share price is the best share price in view of all germane information and the state of the company. That means giving investors confidence that the price in the market is a fair reflection of the company's real value —that the brokers' profit forecasts are not wildly out. That avoids shock movement in share prices, which provides the biggest opportunities for insider dealers to make a quick and illegal profit.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that meetings of the kind that he described and the practices that he mentioned are vital to the smooth running of the capital markets and to the provision of capital to publicly quoted companies? It is most important that shareholders and corporate management should know and understand each other and should talk to each other regularly on a basis of confidence.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the ability of companies to raise additional capital. They can do that only if there is general confidence in the value of their share price and if that information in the public domain is accurate and up to date. If brokers had information completely different from that in the public domain, the market could not operate effectively. If brokers were happy to behave in such a way, confidence in a particular stock would be seriously damaged, which ultimately would be in no one's interest. My hon. Friend highlights the important point that there is a different nut which will be caught by the sledgehammer nature of the Bill's wider definitions.

The process of conveying information, maintaining investors' confidence and ensuring a realistic share price must be safeguarded. The potential for damage could lead to more volatile prices, which would be bad for the confidence of investors and would lead to more surprises entering the public domain more frequently. That would increase the likelihood of sharp share price movements, which would be to the advantage only of those who dip in and out of the market for short-term gain. It would not be to the advantage of long-term investors seeking to secure the funds of policyholders or of the companies themselves.

Mr. Nelson: It is not my intention to keep bobbing up and down throughout the debate but as this is the part of the Bill with which I am most concerned, perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to comment.

Under present legislation, unpublished price-sensitive information cannot be disclosed at such meetings—just as in the future information which has not been made public, which is specific and precise, and which is likely to have a significant effect on the share price, cannot be disclosed at such meetings. I share with my hon. Friend his view of the importance of meetings between companies and their institutional investors and of occasional meetings with analysts. Nothing in the Bill should be used to interrupt those important relations and established means of analysts going about their business—and it is certainly not the Government's intention that any of the Bill's provisions should be used in that way.

Mr. Jenkin: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for clarifying so clearly the Government's intention, which is as I have always understood it. I am sure that most investing institutions and organisations to whose representatives I have spoken also believe that to be the Government's intention.

One problem, which is more a Committee matter than a Second Reading matter, is that the Bill will make it illegal for someone with inside information to encourage another person to deal in shares even if that other person is not told the information. That means that a director could, simply by having a meeting with a broker, without passing over inside information, make the broker an insider, causing the broker to go off-market, perhaps until the next results are published. In view of my hon. Friend's assurances, I am sure that that matter can be clarified in Committee.

I was greatly encouraged by the fact that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that amendments to clarify the issue—perhaps clarification is all that is needed —will be brought forward in Committee. With that caveat, therefore, I commend the Bill to the House.

7.20 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Bill's aim—to improve the ability of the criminal justice system to tackle white collar financial crime, including fraud, money laundering and insider dealing—is something to which all hon. Members would subscribe.

The hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) has performed a valuable service in highlighting some of the concerns that have been widely expressed about whether the Bill, no doubt inadvertently, will catch desirable activities and increase uncertainties in a way that does nothing to advance its purpose of diminishing white collar crime.

It is not entirely satisfactory to leave such matters to be dealt with in Committee. That may be the conventional way in which Parliament deals with them, but we have a procedure—a pre-legislative Committee procedure— which would have been apt to take on board exactly the kind of points with which the hon. Gentleman so eloquently dealt.

The hon. Gentleman was right to list the number of institutions and groups of people who have expressed concern. Parliament would have been helped if it had had an opportunity to hear those concerns expressed in a way that could have been provided if the matter had been considered at the right time.

I say that particularly because a considerable number of complaints have been made about the consultative process in the Bill's preparation. I drew that to the attention of the Secretary of State in the course of his opening speech, so I do not wish to labour the point now. However, the consultation before the Bill was published was not as extensive as it should have been.

It would be a good idea for the Home Office to take on board the strictures of the Hansard Society for Parliamentary Government's commission on the legislative process—a body on which I served along with Mr. Michael Latham, who used to be a distinguished Member of the House, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—which drew attention to the widespread dissatisfaction with the consultative procedures, particularly on technical Bills, in order to avoid the kind of difficulties of which we have heard. That is not a party point.

However, the purpose of today's debate is not to draw attention to those concerns which will no doubt be returned to in Committee, but rather to deal with the broad principles behind the Bill. I think that the hon. Member for Colchester, North and others would agree that, whatever their concerns may be, and however abstruse and complex white collar crimes may be, such crimes are real and damaging. They are damaging to our marketing institutions and to individuals. The Maxwell pensioners and those who invested in Barlow Clowes know that they were not victimless crimes.

Many hon. Members are personally aware of the horrific expansion in drug trafficking and its appalling consequences. I shall not repeat matters on which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) touched beyond reiterating my concern, and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends, about the continuing increase in drug trafficking in Britain. Notwithstanding evidence of the increasing success of Customs and Excise in pulling in drugs—I understand that the value of drugs seized in 1980 was some £10 million and in the latest recorded year for which I have figures, 1991, the street value was £200 million—as the hon. Member for Sedgefield rightly said, we do not know what percentage of the total trade that constitutes. If, as has been alleged, it is about 10 per cent. of that trade, we still have an horrifically large problem with which to deal and so must take whatever measures we can to reduce the profitability of the venture, and that is clearly what the Bill intends.

Like the hon. Member for Colchester, North, I want to deal more with the question of the effectiveness of white collar financial crimes—the part of the Bill that covers insider dealing—and my general concern about our apparent difficulties in tackling complex fraud in Britain. We were helpfully given the precise and up-to-date figures by the Economic Secretary in an intervention and they show that, of the cases referred, a small proportion have resulted in convictions.

I made the immediate concession to the Home Secretary that the deterrent effect of our existing law on insider dealing in particular is incalculable and no doubt great. But it is a matter of concern that we find it so difficult to make charges stick. I want later to make some suggestions about how we might improve that position.

In general, my right hon. and hon. Friends welcome moves to provide the criminal justice system with the means to apprehend and convict those who commit such offences, but we have some doubts about whether the Bill will do a great deal to enhance the effectiveness of our attack on the problems.

I welcome the proposals on extra-territorial jurisdiction. By way of an anecdotal aside, I can tell the House that as long ago as 1967 I introduced a private Member's Bill, the Toyko Convention Bill, which was enacted. It was designed to give extra-territorial jurisdiction to our courts for crimes committed on board aircraft to take account of changing technolgy and the greater frequency with which crimes were being committed on aircraft over which no one had jurisdiction. That principle must obviously be extended so that, as technology and trading across screens develops, we can apply new criminal sanctions. There will be many changes, and frequent Criminal Justice Bills will inevitably be needed to take account of such developments.

I suspect that we shall not have to deal with new technology or a change in perception of the seriousness of the offence of insider dealing. As long ago as the early 1970s, the Takeover Panel outlawed insider dealing for takeovers in its non-statutory code. A number of attempts have been made since then to provide a statutory basis for the effective treatment of such offences by our courts. However, the volume of legislation on the subject is testimony to the ineffectiveness of each piece of legislation that we have introduced, not to the development of technology.

It is appropriate to draw to the Government's attention the Bar Council's thinking on the broad issue of fraud trials. I well remember a debate in the House a few years ago on the report of the Roskill commission. I think that there were 12 participants in the debate, almost all of whom—if my memory serves me right—were lawyers. Eleven of them spoke against the Government's proposal that serious fraud trials should proceed without the benefit of a jury, using instead specialist judges with specialist assessors. In the face of that overwhelming opposition to the principle of the Roskill commission's main recommendation, the Government did not proceed with the proposal, and they were right not to do so.

The proposal has been referred to from time to time and perhaps it will be considered again by the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice. Nothing that I have heard has suggested to me that the House was wrong then to recommend that we stick with jury trials in complex fraud cases. However, the Bar Council is right to advocate certain procedural changes in such cases—not least cases of alleged insider dealing covered by the Bill—that would enable the system to operate more effectively and fairly, and help juries to tackle the problems of dealing with complex fraud. The Bar Council's working group identified the central problem as the complexity of the cases relating to offences such as those covered by the Bill. The group stated that the complexity resulted from the increasingly sophisticated nature of the crimes that take place in the context of the global electronic financial marketplace.

The Bill does not deal with such problems, which is a pity, as it provided an opportunity to do so. The Minister of State, Lord Ferrers, dealt with some of the anxieties mentioned earlier, but he did not make any proposals to deal with the procedural difficulties. There are no easy or quick solutions, but there are ways to assist juries in cases such as the Blue Arrow trial. In that trial, the jury members were expected to wade through a mass of minutiae in pursuit of important information. The Court of Appeal ultimately ruled that the case had become unmanageable, and consequently none of the convictions could be said to be safe.

[Mr. Robert Maclennan]

One way of helping the jury to stay on top of the case would be to introduce special court procedures to clarify the issues and identify the relevant information before, and perhaps even during, a trial. Those procedures would be in addition to, but not instead of, normal trial procedures. There is no need to create a professional or semi-professional tribunal without a jury, only a need to find ways of managing the information more efficiently.

It would be interesting to hear the Government's view on what Lord Alexander of Weedon advocated in his speech on Second Reading, to which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred. It seems that some of the cases that the stock exchange drew to the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry might have been susceptible to examination, and proceedings might have been initiated that would have resulted in the disgorging of illegally obtained profits. Some compensation and redress might have been given to some of the victims of improper white collar crimes if the proposals advocated by Lord Alexander were adopted. Therefore, it would be of interest to know the Government's thoughts. I cannot imagine that it is a matter on which one would have a doctrinal view.

There is scope for extending the role of the judge in requiring coherent and relevant case statements from the defence, and for encouraging more extensive agreement in complex fraud cases between the defence and prosecution over the facts by means of a timetable procedure. That would enable the separate issues of the case to be dealt with in a rational and efficient manner. It would be much less confusing for the jury and would consume less court time. The jury could be presented with the relevant documents and summaries as each stage of the trial occurred rather than at the beginning of the trial in accordance with the timetable that had been drawn up. The presentation and summing up of the cases for the prosecution and defence should also be accompanied by written summaries to be used by the jury.

I make those suggestions tentatively, and they are not intended as a panacea for the ills of our criminal justice system in relation to white collar crime. However, they are intended to address a problem that the Bill touches on but to which it does not adequately face up. They would provide a valuable step towards giving courts the means by which to try such cases effectively, fairly and efficiently. That is necessary if we are to deter transgressions by those who could bring our markets into disrepute and cause great damage to our commerce and to the profits that the City brings to our country.

Without such a step, I fear that the Bill may be no more effective than some of its predecessors in eliminating the profitability of large-scale white collar crime. I hope that we shall not need yet another Bill in a few years to tackle these matters. Amendments to the criminal law procedure along the lines that I have suggested would give existing law a better chance to work.

7.40 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): This is the third time in the past year that I have had the pleasure of following the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). As on those occasions, he has made a considered contribution. It is also a pleasure to participate in a debate that has been largely uncontroversial. All hon. Members seem to support the thrust of the Bill. The Tokyo Conventions Act has been mentioned. I assure the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland that in the Market Harborough Conservative club we talk of little else.

I shall concentrate on part II of the Bill and especially on the clauses dealing with the burden of proof and related matters. Clause 7(1) amends section 1(1) of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. The amendment will be such that the requirement of the court to determine whether a convicted person has benefited from drug trafficking is no longer mandatory. That will allow the determination to be made at the request of the prosecutor or at the behest of the court on the court's motion.

That provision will dispense with courts wasting time and the money of the police and prosecution service making determinations in cases where the amount of the benefit is so small as to be not worth the investigation. A better use of police and court resources is to be commended, not least at a time when the Government's resources are limited and when we are concerned about the amount being spent on legal aid.

Clause 7(2) inserts a new subsection in the 1986 Act, subsection (7A), which states:

> "The standard of proof required to determine . . .
> (a) whether a person has benefited from drug trafficking, or > (b) the amount to be recovered . . .
> shall be that applicable in civil proceedings."

From now on it is clear that the trial judge making the determination will work on the balance of probabilities at that stage of the proceedings. He will have to be satisfied that an allegation or fact is more likely than not.

I understand that a judge is currently entitled to make assumptions under section 2(2) and (3) of the 1986 Act when arriving at a decision. No standard of proof arises when the judge is deciding whether the assumption should be made. When the assumption is made, the burden falls on the defendant to rebut it on the civil standard. I understand that that follows from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Crown v. Redbourne to which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred.

Hand in hand with those amendments under clause 7 is clause 9 which requires the court to make the assumptions about property and expenditure which are set out in the Drug Trafficking Offences Act unless they are shown to be incorrect in the defendant's case or the court is satisfied that there would be a serious risk of injustice if they were made. If the court decides not to make the assumptions, it must state its reasons. It is an admirable advance that a court should be required by statute to give reasons for reaching a conclusion.

Clause 9 amends section 2 of the 1986 Act. Section 2(2) of that Act states what the court "may" do to determine whether a defendant has benefited from drug trafficking. The word "may" is replaced by "shall". Clause 9 inserts at the end of subsection (2):

> "The court shall not make any required assumption if—> (a) that assumption is shown to be incorrect in the defendant's case . . .".

The required assumptions are set out in subsection (3) of the 1986 Act, but I shall not rehearse them. Despite the concerns of those who spoke against the 1986 Act that these were draconian measures, it now seems that the hon. Member for Sedgefield has recognised their value. I am sure that criminal practitioners, of whom I am not one, will also recognise the value of the Bill's amendments to the 1986 Act.

Clause 8 adds to section 1 of the 1986 Act a provision allowing the determining court to postpone its investigation for up to six months until relevant information has been obtained. That application can be made by the prosecution or by the defence or by the court on its own motion. It deals with the problem which can arise under section 1 of the 1986 Act when no confiscation order is made at the original determination on the mistaken assumption that the defendant had no realisable assets but when some are subsequently discovered. I understand that previously a court had only 28 days to vary its decision. Now it has a considerably longer time in which to right that injustice.

Clause 12 allows the court to vary an order to take account of increased values of assets. That is an especially welcome addition to the criminal law. It would be manifestly unjust if someone convicted of drug trafficking were able to benefit from the increase in house prices, land values or the value of any other proceeds that he had acquired as a result of drug trafficking but which were not available to be seized by the court at the time of the determination. I welcome that aspect of the Bill.

Clause 16 continues the fight against drug trafficking and those who benefit from it by making it an offence knowingly to acquire, possess or use another's proceeds from drug trafficking. It is easy to build up an empire and pass it on to one's friends and relations who will benefit from the proceeds of illegal acts. Anyone who knowingly benefits from such a gift or who acquires, possesses or uses another's proceeds will be liable on indictment to a sentence of 14 years' imprisonment. That also underlines the determination of the House and the Government to get to the root of drug trafficking—to hit the drug barons and their friends in their pockets.

I also commend clause 10, which tightens the pleading procedure on determination. The court will be enabled to inform the prosecutor that he must set out his statement of case. The defendant must respond to it within a given time. That procedure will save time, eliminate unnecessary controversy and save money, which is particularly short at this time.

The Bill is a further arrow in our armoury in the war against drugs. We already have the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987, which contains similar confiscatory powers in regard to Scotland, and the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990, which contains measures designed to facilitate the task of detecting drug traffickers and confiscating proceeds. It creates the offence of manufacturing or supplying substances while knowing or suspecting that they are to be used in the unlawful production of controlled drugs. The Bill, which I hope will shortly become an Act, adds to that armoury.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) says, we have the valuable work of the drug liaison officers abroad, with their intelligence, which is vital if all this is to work.

Given the lateness of the hour and the number of hon. Members who wish to speak, I will conclude my remarks. I invite the House to pass the Bill as soon as possible, not only because it is an earnest of our desire to stamp out the blight of drug dealing in our society, but because it is what the people of this country require us to do as swiftly as possible.

7.50 pm

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): The doubling of crime since 1979 and the increased pressure on the police and the courts mean that the criminal law needs to be strengthened. Therefore, in broad terms, the Bill is welcome.

Drug use is obviously a major cause of crime. Those who traffic in drugs and create a demand for the product are as responsible for the muggings, burglaries and deaths caused by drug users seeking money for their next fix, as the drug users themselves. Many criminals would not offend, but for the need to pay the pusher and the trafficker who supply the drugs. It is necessary to have tough and effective laws on drug trafficking and on the laundering of the proceeds of crime. The Bill goes some way towards that. The greater powers that it gives the courts are, in many ways, justified because of the size of the threat confronting us.

I want to deal not particularly with drug trafficking but with insider dealing, although some of the points that I raise will be relevant to drug trafficking.

The statistics on the success or otherwise of prosecutions in insider dealing cases show how difficult it is to secure a conviction. In the peak year of 1989-90, 10 cases were taken to the courts, involving the prosecution of 14 defendants, four convictions and nine acquittals. I assume that the Fisher case, the Coren and Greenwood case and the Guinness case account for some of those, although not all.

The statistics were disputed by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. The statistics provided by the House of Commons Library suggest—and I note what the hon. Gentleman said—that until 13 January 1993, of the 104 cases reported by the stock exchange to the DTI, 21 were prosecuted, involving a total of 33 individuals and resulting in 16 convictions. That suggests that the complexity of the law, coupled with the complexity of the issues involved, makes it very difficult for those accused of insider dealing to be convicted.

In the late 1980s, I was involved in an insider dealing case as a defence lawyer. In that case two acquittals were secured. I noted the complexity and amount of information with which we had to deal. The evidence took over a year to assemble, and weeks to read and analyse. Meetings with counsels were complex and virtually interminable.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): And expensive.

Mr. O'Brien: Yes, they were certainly expensive.

In that case, the defence succeeded on a legal submission at the start of the trial. We had a whole series of legal points in the case which highlighted what we felt to be the inadequate way in which the legislation was drafted and its lack of clarity. I am sure that the defendants would have been aquitted in any event, but the Act was clearly lacking.

[Mr. O'Brien]

The Bill makes a number of welcome changes, but I fear that it does not take sufficient account of the need to clarify insider dealing legislation, and that we may need to revisit this area again in the near future.

The need to clarify both the way in which evidence is presented to juries and the legislation itself is very important. Unfortunately, I do not think that the Bill will do the trick.

One of the criticisms of the Bill, both in another place and by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), was that the legislation shifts the burden of proof in particular areas. It is an important criticism, and it is right that burdens should not be unnecessarily placed upon defendants. However, it is also important that cases are decided fairly, and the requirement for a fair and just trial means that a jury should understand the process of the trial and the relevant factors involved in making a finding of guilt or innocence. My concern is that cases of insider dealing are too complex and, where they are linked to factual and documentary material which is also complex, the job of a jury in such cases is extremely difficult.

There is a proposal from some sources of replacing trial by jury with trial by a judge and assessors for particularly complex cases involving dishonest dealings. I am reluctant to go down that route because it is a slippery slope and undermines the right of an individual to trial by jury in criminal cases; but, if we are successfully to try cases by jury, it is essential to simplify the number of issues involved, which requires the use of legal presumptions such as those in the Bill.

Although such presumptions may shift the burden of proof towards the defendant, they can have merit in these particular types of case. For example, under clause 37 the defendant must show that he did not expect the receiver of the information to deal. This replaces the previous and inadequate legislation which required proof of knowledge of the intention to deal, which was sometimes difficult to prove. Although in the Bill there appears to be some element of "guilty until proved innocent"—or at least proved innocent on the balance of the argument—these provisions will in many cases lead, because of the simplification of the trial process for the jury, to a fairer and more just verdict. They simplify the process and, by and large, do not place unnecessary burdens upon defendants.

One area that the Bill does not cover is the removal of the right of silence in insider dealing cases. That was part of earlier legislation. Having sat through two days of interviews conducted under those rules, and looking at the convictions resulting from the interviews, I would say that hopes suggested by the police and by some Conservative Members that removing the right to silence in other types of case might improve the rate of conviction may not be justified, particularly in complex cases such as insider dealing.

I have grave doubts that the interviews take place in a proper manner. Certainly, my experience was that documents of very considerable complexity, which were extremely difficult to follow, were presented to a defendant who was asked to deal with questions relating to share dealings which had taken place two years before. He had had no opportunity to go through those documents. If we are to deny the right of silence to defendants in complex cases, advance notice of areas of questioning and documentation should always be given. I hope that the Minister will look at that issue when the Bill is considered in Committee and that those who seek to undermine the right to silence will weigh in the balance the view that the proposal may not achieve its aim and could lead to additional injustice.

My main regret relates to what the Bill does not do rather than to what it does do. It provided the chance to undo the damage done by the Criminal Justice Act 1991. It is clear that insider dealing and cases involving drug trafficking will be affected by the sentencing restrictions imposed by sections 1(2)(a) and 29. They are cases which typically may have multiple count indictments or sample count indictments. It seems to me that the legislation that needs to be dealt with today is the Criminal Justice Act 1991. In its failure to do that, the Bill is massively inadequate.

When the 1991 Act was passed, the Government made it clear that the purpose of that measure was to reduce the number of people in prison. Its effect, however, is that persistent offenders with lots of previous convictions find that the court is restricted in its ability to take their record into account when sentencing. Some persistent offenders therefore get away with offences for which they should go to prison. It is frustrating for police officers and the public to see criminals arrested and brought before the courts and then to find that the courts are forced by the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to let them off.

Due to the enactment of that legislation the Government's law and order policy has lost all credibility; crime has doubled during their period of office and the 1991 Act is among the most ludicrous pieces of legislation ever to hit the statute book. By means of that Act, the Conservatives have added to their long list of citizens charters the citizens charter for criminals. The Act gives criminals more rights than they have ever had before and makes their lives easier than they have ever been before.

I welcome to some extent what the Home Secretary said about looking again at the 1991 Act, but that will take time, during which criminals who deserve to go to prison will not be sent to prison. While the Home Secretary consults, debates and prevaricates, other victims will suffer. There needs to be a sense of urgency about dealing with the Criminal Justice Act 1991. I hope shortly to put before the House of Commons a ten-minute Bill on the issue, which I trust that the Home Secretary and the Conservative party will be able to support.

I welcome, in broad terms, what the Bill does. As the Home Secretary said, it is right that it should be considered in detail in Committee so that the problems caused by its predecessor can be avoided. I am sure that we shall all be most vociferous in tabling the amendments that we think are necessary.

8.2 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): It is true that the Bill is unlikely to make headline news in the popular press. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary made that clear in his opening remarks. None the less, it is a most important Bill, for it provides a variety of additional safeguards against white collar crime. There is no qualitative difference between this type of crime and any other. It is absolutely right that we should be assiduous in tracking down and punishing criminals who may wear white collars and sit in offices but who are, none the less, common criminals. Therefore, I particularly welcome the provisions of the Bill which make life significantly tougher for those who engage in serious international fraud, money laundering and its attendant terrorist associations and, of course, the evil practice of drug trafficking.

In common with other hon. Members, I intend to focus on part IV, which deals with insider dealing. I ought immediately to declare an interest. I began my professional career as an investment analyst in the City. Subsequently, I moved into corporate finance with S. G. Warburg Group plc, for which I act as a paid consultant. I am also a non-executive director of a public company.

Insider dealing has been famously described as a victimless crime, but in my view it is nothing of the kind. Insider dealing, put simply, is a form of cheating. One set of victims, therefore, consists of those who are cheated upon. By implication, these are other shareholders and other market professionals; it is widely accepted that larger and more active City institutions—for example, those handling large pension portfolios—are likely to suffer the most. But the other principal victim of insider dealing is the City itself. If cheating were to become widespread, the market would quickly fall into disrepute, and confidence in London, as one of the world's major financial centres, would suffer.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is in no doubt about the importance that the City as a whole attaches to his efforts to make insider dealing legislation more effective. I am sure that he has the support of the City and the House in those efforts. But for legislation to be effective, it must first be absolutely clear. As the workings of the existing laws regulating the financial markets have from time to time in practice suggested, we are dealing with an extremely complex set of issues that do not readily lend themselves to legislation. There is a need to proceed with very great caution if the ability of the City to continue with its proper function of transmitting important information to investors and the public is not to be impaired.

Reference has already been made in the debate to the fact that during the Second Reading debate of the Bill in another place considerable concern was expressed that no final decision should be taken as to the detailed contents of the Bill without the fullest possible consultation with the City institutions and investment banks, upon whose daily business it impinges. It is a source of great encouragement that such consultation has now taken place. Here I differ from the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

I know that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has given full consideration to the large number of detailed points that have arisen from the consultation that has taken place since last autumn and from the consultation that continues to take place. I echo the view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that one of the major improvements that has taken place since last autumn is that the word "tippee" has not found a permanent place in the text of the Bill. I only hope that it was removed in time for it not to have found a permanent place in the English language. Perhaps I should not have mentioned it.

As the Bill stands today, a number of outstanding concerns remain. I do not intend, the House will be relieved to hear, to list all of them this evening. The proper place for their consideration will be in Committee when I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will consider carefully ways in which the present wording of the legislation can be clarified. Only this afternoon my right hon. and learned Friend made it clear that he is ready to look carefully at suitable amendments that may be tabled to deal with these concerns. I was also glad to hear him say that he himself intended to table some amendments. He may be assured that the progress of such amendments will be studied with the greatest of care and attention by those who carry on legitimate securities business in the City.

Repeated assurances have been given that there is no intention, by means of the Bill, to make illegal business practices that currently are legitimate. My right hon. and learned Friend reiterated that point clearly today, as did my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. I very much welcome what they said. I do not for a minute doubt that they mean what they say, but the trouble is that those reassurances are not yet reflected in the Bill. As it is drafted, there is a distinct risk that some of the provisions in part IV will have precisely the effect of creating uncertainty over the legitimacy of currently accepted practices. That is perhaps mainly because a lack of clarity will make it too risky for present practices to continue.

Hon. Members have referred to the deterrent effect of the present insider dealing legislation. This, I believe, is very real. Reputable City institutions and financial service organisations are understandably most anxious to avoid any breach of the law, and their concern to be in no doubt about how the law will work, stems, perhaps, from that very anxiety.

I should like to highlight three key areas in which there appear to be particular problems. The first relates to stock market investment analysts—a subject that is very close to my heart. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that it is the role of analysts to obtain through research information about companies and sectors that can be used, usually in in-house publications, to provide fund managers with a basis for taking investment decisions. The key point it issue, which has been referred to in the debate, is that, to avoid prejudice to the role of analysts, it would be most helpful if my hon. Friend the Minister reconsidered the words "made public" in clause 33, which are somewhat unclear.

The issue has been widely discussed, but it is worth noting that the recital to the European Community directive, which the Bill implements, uses the words "publicly available", which is rather clearer and which seems to offer a preferable alternative with less risk of misinterpretation. It is an alternative favoured by the City, by the many organisations that were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), by the British Merchant Banking and Securities Houses Association and, perhaps most important, by the finance directors of public companies, who liaise with investment analysts.

Fund managers are not always required to pay close attention to all analysts—indeed, in my experience, the views of a number of analysts are regarded as a counter-indicator of what is likely to occur—but the reputation of a few analysts in certain sectors is such that their views are capable of moving the market in relevant shares. It is necessary, therefore, for the Bill to make it absolutely clear that an influential analyst does not become an insider by virtue of the fact that he or she has reached a conclusion about the merits of a share.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

Under the Bill, it appears that, if an analyst is fortunate enough to have such a high reputation that the disclosure of his or her views on a share might move the market, because those views are price-sensitive and have not been made public the analyst would not be allowed to express those views to a client, if to do so would encourage the client to deal in a share. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary would not want such a situation to develop.

There is a real danger that the well-intentioned measures in part IV could so impede the flow of reasonable information between companies, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North spoke so eloquently, that they could reverse the trend to corporate glasnost, which has been a feature of recent years and which has led to a freeing up of information on which to base investment decisions. We surely do not wish to encourage a return to the corporate secrecy of the bad old days, when one had to be a member of the chairman's club or golf club to know anything meaningful about what was going on in a company.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reconsider the way in which the Bill might apply to vendor placings and secondary share underwritings. This is technical stuff, but it is important to the smooth functioning of the City and the capital markets. It is unclear whether normal, perfectly legitimate practices associated with secondary underwritings and vendor placings will continue to be permitted under the Bill. Vendor placings are a frequently used method of financing acquisitions, and a good example of a secondary underwriting that might be close to my hon. Friend's heart is the forthcoming disposal by the Government of a further tranche of shares in British Telecom. It would be most unfortunate, to say the least, if there were any uncertainty about the legitimacy of the means by which this disposal or any other secondary underwriting might logically and appropriately take place.

I understand that it has been suggested during the consultations that vendor and secondary placings would be protected by the defence in clause 32(2) that persons taking part would not be intending to secure a profit by reason of the fact that the securities are price-affected, but as such people are inevitably engaged in business with a view to securing a profit, and as the nature of many of the transactions in question will be likely to affect the price, this does not seem to be a particularly robust defence. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to introduce a more precise and dependable protection for those who carry out a role that is integral to the raising of corporate capital.

Mr. Nelson: I assure my hon. Friend that I shall consider most carefully the thoughtful points that he has made, which is the advantage of the Committee stage. I draw his attention to part II of schedule 2, which provides exemptions for market makers, market information and price stabilisation, all of which are important aspects of what the professionals do in the market and should offer an exemption that measures up to many of the demands that were made in the consultation period. I shall carefully consider how much further the Government can go to provide further reassurances that do not drive a coach and horses through the intentions of the directive or the Bill, but I hope that my hon. Friend will acknowledge that we have tried to go some way to meeting the points he has made.

Mr. Ainsworth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. I am aware of the exemptions to which he refers. I know that all involved are grateful that it has been possible to incorporate them in the Bill and I welcome him saying that he will carefully consider the points that I have been making.

My third and final point concerns the way in which the Bill extends the definition of inside information beyond individual companies to cover groups of companies engaged in similar or competing activities. I understand the problem that the Bill is intended to tackle, but I was not wholly convinced by an example that was provided last September by a Treasury spokesman, who said:

> "If someone discovered that a company had closed down and then sold the shares of that company's competitor that would be insider dealing."

Insider dealing it might be, but it is possible to argue that it would be an extremely bad investment decision as well.

Perhaps I might venture, for future reference, an alternative example of the problem. If somebody learned that a company was shortly to be bid for and on the basis of that inside information immediately bought shares in another company whose shares were likely to rise as a result of the bid, he would be guilty of insider dealing. It seems perfectly reasonable to try to stop such activity, but the present drafting of the Bill is so broad that it could impede the operation of transactions where it is necessary formally to make certain interested parties insiders. It would be extremely difficult for any fund manager to allow himself to be made an insider on a particular share for the purposes of effecting a specific transaction if the effect of so doing were to preclude him from dealing in any other shares in that sector.

As I have said, these are complex matters which do not lend themselves easily to legislation. However, if we are to legislate, it is important to get it absolutely right. As my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will know, substantial time and money is already spent in the square mile to ensure compliance with existing complex statutory regulations. I sometimes fear that this is better news for lawyers than for shareholders.

My hon. Friend said that several of the outstanding concerns will be covered by guidance. I have no doubt that it will be a great help, but I am sure he will agree that it would be preferable if they could be dealt with in the legislation itself. Uncertainty is a great enemy of confidence, and confidence is vital to the efficient working of any market. My hon. Friend, whose efforts to stamp out insider dealing deserve wholehearted support, has said in that context that he is a great believer in fear. I am certain that he meant fear of the law, not fear of the unknown. I have every confidence that the immense amount of work that he and his officials in the Treasury have put into getting the legislation right will bear fruit as the Bill, which is very welcome in many respects, passes through Committee.

8.20 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): Many hon. Members have referred to the Criminal Justice Act 1991 and have especially criticised its provisions dealing with unit fines and related matters. I entirely endorse their criticism and I hope that, as well as conducting a review of the 1991 Act, the Home Secretary will get in touch with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who in the past few weeks published proposals to introduce into Northern Ireland legislation identical to the 1991 Act, the manifest failings of which are becoming daily more appparent.

The second preparatory comment relates to the speech by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party, and to that of the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), who complained about the lack of consultation. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland in particular referred to the Hansard Committee report and said that its recommendation of the use of Special Standing Committees and pre-legislative Committee stages would be appropriate. Such procedure featured strongly in the recent Scottish White Paper as being appropriate for legislation which was not controversial in party political terms. That is precisely what this is. I should have thought that such procedure should be adopted for measures of this nature.

In dealing with part I of the Bill, which deals with extra-territorial jurisdiction and certain offences, the Home Secretary referred in passing to Scotland and Northern Ireland. He said that part I would not apply to them because the two territories have their own legal systems. That is inconsistent because certain provisions in the Bill—three clauses in part V and all of the clauses in part IV—will extend to Northern Ireland. Furthermore, the Bill authorises the making of a negative resolution Order in Council equivalent to most of the provisions in part III and some in part II.

Against that background it is strange that the Home Secretary does not consider it necessary to have an equivalent provision with regard to part I or even to say whether there is any intention to introduce legislation in Scotland or Northern Ireland equivalent to part I. Many of the provisions of parts II, III and IV apply to Scotland anyway. It makes the Bill look rather like a dog's dinner.

As usually happens in these cases, I wish to draw attention to the inadvisability of legislating for Northern Ireland by way of negative resolution Orders in Council which the Bill authorises. As hon. Members will know, the negative resolution Order in Council will not be debated anywhere in the House. By passing the Bill, we are authorising legislation by decree and not providing for discussion of it. There is clearly no intention to discuss the Northern Ireland provisions now being authorised because there is no representative of the Northern Ireland Office on the Government Front Bench, so there is no one to comment on the possible application in Northern Ireland of the provisions authorised to be made by negative resolution Order in Council.

In any event, proceeding by negative resolution Order in Council is inherently inefficient. Such orders will be made only after the legislation has completed its stages because the legislative draftsman in Northern Ireland takes the view that he cannot draft his Order in Council until the Bill is complete and all its provisions are known —in other words, until it has received a Third Reading. That builds in a significant delay before the Order in Council is made.

The provisions authorised by negative resolution Order in Council relate to money laundering and the movement of proceeds of drug trafficking and other criminal offences. Of course, there may be movements from one jurisdiction to another and, in certain cases, there will be movement between Northern Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom and vice versa. It therefore seems inappropriate that legislation is not coming into effect at the same time in all jurisdictions.

It is particularly inappropriate because the Bill makes provision for Scotland; for example, in clauses 17 and 19, which replicate for Scotland the provisions in clauses 16 and 18. It is the equivalent of clauses 16 and 18 which are to be made by negative resolution Order in Council. It does not make sense. There is an incoherence in the drafting of the Bill, which is inappropriate.

The provisions covering the proceeds of criminal conduct and the laundering of the proceeds of drug trafficking in particular are good ideas, and I was glad that the Home Secretary said that new clauses will be introduced in Committee to extend the provisions into anti-terrorism legislation. There will be provision in anti-terrorism legislation for the inhibition of money laundering and the confiscation of terrorist proceeds as well as criminal and drug proceeds.

That is especially appropriate as terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland to a significant extent now finance their activity through drug dealing. It is therefore not sensible to draw a distinction between laundering the proceeds of drug trafficking and laundering money used to finance terrorist activities. In any event, the laundering of money related to criminal activity is the same whether the criminal activity is defrauding people, trafficking in drugs or promoting terrorism.

The Home Secretary said that the intention was to provide a read-across from this legislation to anti-terrorism legislation. I assume that he was referring to the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Some of the Bill's provisions reproduce some of those introduced in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991. The read-across is from the EPA into the Bill and through to the PTA. I see that the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) is nodding, so I have got the direction roughly correct.

It is good that the issue is being tackled. Some provisions dealing with the financing of terrorism were introduced into the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, nearly four years ago. I understand that they have been wholly ineffective, that no money has been recovered and that no proceedings have taken place. In reports on the PTA, Lord Colville described its powers as "unworkable", so I am glad that they are now being dealt with.

Provisions introduced into the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991 are being borrowed in this Bill. I understand that, as yet, nothing has been done under the EPA and that there has still been no successful recovery. That is not a good precedent. I understand from various sources that it is expected that some proceedings will shortly take place under the EPA. I hope that they will be successful, but it is not a good augury for the provisions before us that the EPA provisions have been on the statute book for two years without having produced results yet.

[Mr. David Trimble]

I hope that when the new clauses are introduced in Committee the opportunity will be taken to examine some inconsistencies that seem to me to exist between the clauses of the Bill and the provisions in the EPA from which I understand that they are derived. For example, the Secretary of State said that, in amending the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, the Bill would make it clear that the civil rather than the criminal standard of proof applied, and would give the court discretion whether to make confiscation orders. However, unless I am mistaken, the EPA equivalent provision—section 47(1)—seems to imply a criminal standard, because it uses language such as:

"the court shall . . . if it is satisfied".

That does not appear to give the court discretion whether to make confiscation orders, so there is an inconsistency.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who spoke for the Labour party, said that he was worried about the assumptions on which the Bill required the court to proceed when determining whether assets were the proceeds of drug trafficking. But the Bill qualifies those assumptions in two respects. Clause 9(3) says that the assumption can be rebutted if it would be unjust to make it.

"that assumption is shown to be incorrect in the defendant's case, or"

Of those two qualifications only one—the first assumption, as to whether it would be incorrect to make the assumption on the facts—applies in section 51(1), the equivalent provision in the EPA. The second—whether making the assumption would lead to an injustice—does not apply. That inconsistency needs to be ironed out.

None the less, the Bill provides a good opportunity to introduce a single coherent code that would apply throughout the United Kingdom. That is necessary. At present we have an unsatisfactory state of affairs, with different codes in the Prevention of Terrorism Act, in the emergency provisions legislation and in the legislation on drug trafficking. The activity of money laundering is essentially the same, regardless of the nature of the crime, so we should have a single code.

We should also ensure that that code is as effective as possible in geographical terms. That partly reflects a desire that it should be effective throughout the British Isles, but it relates to other aspects too. How effective will the legislation be concerning applications relating to money laundered through, say, Gibraltar, the Cayman islands or other such places? That, too is a relevant consideration. I am not sure that our legislation is effective with regard to those territories at present. There is an option to transfer the provision to such places as the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, but I am not sure whether it has been exercised. What about areas further afield which act as offshore banking centres for the United Kingdom, and through which money is laundered? We must make sure that we deal with them.

The Home Secretary dismissed certain matters in part V as minor, and mentioned only one clause in that part of the Bill. I shall refer to another clause in part V, which the Home Secretary did not mention—clause 44, headed, "Backing of warrants: safeguards." That brief phrase in the list of clauses conceals the fact that it deals with the thorny problem of extradition to and from the Republic of Ireland, specifically for terrorist offences.

That is a matter of considerable importance to us, and it should be important not only to those of us who represent Northern Ireland constituencies, but to all of us in the United Kingdom, especially in view of the terrorist campaign directed towards England and towards this capital, and directed from the Republic of Ireland and carried out by persons largely recruited there. That important matter is in the public eye because of events in the Republic of Ireland over the past few days—the arrests made there and the questions that have arisen concerning them and concerning extradition. Against that background it is slightly surprising that the Home Secretary saw fit completely to ignore clause 44.

Clause 44 makes provision for introducing into the present procedures—strictly speaking, those concern not extradition but the backing of warrants—what in extradition terms is called the speciality rule, the effect of which is to ensure that, if a person is transferred from the Republic of Ireland to the United Kingdom on certain warrants, he can be proceeded against in the courts here only for the offences in the original warrants.

At present, no speciality rule applies between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom. That is because we operate a backing of warrants procedure rather than an extradition procedure. In extradition procedures it is normal to have a speciality rule.

The matter became controversial in 1991 with the Desmond Ellis case. Mr. Ellis was accused of being involved in conspiring to cause explosions in the United Kingdom, and was extradited from the Republic of Ireland to the United Kingdom for certain offences. The magistrates in England then proceeded to substitute different offences for the offences for which Mr. Ellis was originally transferred. That course of action was perfectly lawful and open to them in that case, but it provoked an outcry in the Irish Republic, whose Government behaved as if they thought that a speciality rule existed, or ought to exist. The upshot was that the Crown substituted the original offences. As hon. Members will know, Mr. Ellis was subsequently acquitted and transferred back to the Republic of Ireland.

The important point about that case was that it revealed that the Government of the Irish Republic considered that there was, or ought to be, a speciality rule governing the transfer of fugitive offenders from the Republic to the United Kingdom. They behaved as if assurances had been given by the United Kingdom Government that a speciality rule would be applied. Those assurances were not followed through by the magistrates in the Ellis case because, of course, magistrates and the courts are independent. But now we find legislation surfacing in the Bill to give legal effect to the assumption on which the Government of the Republic of Ireland proceeded. Clause 44 appears to have its origins in the protests made by the Government of the Irish Republic arising from the Ellis case in 1991. I should be interested to hear whether the Minister will comment on that assumption.

That raises the question: why have the Government decided to accede to what I presume to be the requests or demands of the Government of the Irish Republic to limit the range of offences for which fugitive offenders returned under the backing of warrants can be charged? Is there some particular reason? Have they come to some agreement with the Government of the Irish Republic? Has there been a deal?

When he considers that question, the Minister may like to reflect on a question that my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) asked the Prime Minister on 21 November 1991 if he would "assure the House that there will be no further concessions to the Irish Republic in order to obtain the extradition of terrorist suspects to stand trial in the United Kingdom?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"we do not bargain . . . we do not do deals."—[Official Report, 21 November 1991; Vol. 199, c. 418-419.]

Thus, the Prime Minister appeared to give the assurance in November 1991 that no further concessions would be made to the Government of the Republic of Ireland in order to obtain the return of fugitive offenders. Yet what is clause 44 if it is not a further concession to the Government of the Irish Republic in that connection? We must therefore ask what has happened between November 1991, when the Prime Minister assured us that no further concessions would be made, and today when we see the concessions in the Bill. Why have the Government done a U-turn? Has the Prime Minister done a U-turn, and if so, why?

My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, East asked whether there would be further deals. Perhaps there is no deal. Perhaps the Government are just making the concession without there being any undertaking in return. Perhaps the concession has been made in the fond hope that the Irish Republic will respond by facilitating the return of fugitive offenders. It reminds me of other agreements that have been made with the Government of the Irish Republic in the fond hope that they would do something in return for concessions. Those other agreements have proved barren of the product that was promised or expected. We wonder what will happen here.

It might have been better for the Government to have done a deal. Perhaps they should, as a result of this concession, have pressed the Irish Government to get rid of the Extradition Amendment Act 1987 which the Irish Government introduced to try to limit the effect of the European convention on the suppression of terrorism. Perhaps the Government should have made efforts to improve the European convention on the suppression of terrorism because it has been clearly demonstrated since 1987 that article 1 of that convention is not effective and draws invidious distinctions about matters such as whether a terrorist is using an automatic weapon or a bolt-action rifle. That can be crucial in deciding whether they can be returned under the convention.

Perhaps something could have been done to curtail the readiness with which district judges in the Irish Republic grant bail to fugitive offenders. Cases have been reported in the press in recent weeks which have drawn attention to that practice. Measures were introduced in the United Kingdom, especially in Northern Ireland, to ensure that magistrates cannot grant bail in cases of terrorist offences. Perhaps we should have put pressure on the Government of the Irish Republic to introduce equivalent legislation to curtail the propensity of their district judges, who are the equivalent of magistrates, to grant bail in such cases.

If we are taking the path of introducing a speciality rule into the backing of warrants, it might have been better to consider the procedure as a whole. A speciality rule is incompatible with the whole concept of backing warrants. The backing of warrants procedure was introduced in the middle of the 19th century to deal with transfers between one of Her Majesty's jurisdictions and another, especially transfers of fugitive offenders from the colonies to England and vice versa. There was no need for extradition and there was no need to question the grounds on which a person was arraigned before the court, because all the courts were Her Majesty's courts. The backing of warrants procedure is an historical survival with regard to the Republic of Ireland, dating from the time when the Republic of Ireland was part of Her Majesty's dominions.

It might be better to have a proper extradition treaty. That would, of course, mean accepting not just the speciality rule, but the prima facie case rule. That would surely result in the Irish having to drop their Extradition Amendment Act 1987 which gives the opportunity for them to refuse to return fugitive terrorist offenders in certain circumstances. In any event, the primary question remains, of what lies behind the decision to introduce clause 44 and thus to negate the Prime Minister's assurance of November 1991.

8.42 pm

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): My heart goes out to the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and to his hon. Friends in Northern Ireland as they await with trepidation the introduction of the equivalent of a Criminal Justice Act 1992. At least he cannot complain that on this occasion Northern Ireland is being used as a guinea pig for this country, although if that legislation is imminent, Northern Ireland may be a guinea pig for the changes that we envisage as likely to occur. Like the hon. Gentleman, I welcome the fact that the money-laundering legislation is to be extended by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and his team to the anti-terrorist legislation in Northern Ireland.

When I began practising at the criminal Bar more than 30 years ago, almost all big crime was armed robbery. Now the big crime is commercial—fraud and drugs-related crime. That has happened since the advent of the computer, of cheaper, more frequent and, therefore, more international travel, and of greater international commercial activity. More and more money is made from international and commercial white collar crime. More and more of our courts are preoccupied with such crime, as are the police, the Customs authorities and the lawyers. We now have the Serious Fraud Office, and a fortune is being spent on criminal legal aid in commercial and international crime.

It is vital that confidence in the City should be retained as the City faces competition from other centres. The Government are to be congratulated on promising continued action against international and commercial crime, and on introducing legislation which keeps up our national defences against a very rewarding form of lawlessness and a calculated and vile form of offending against the laws of states.

It is obvious from our debate that the legislation has a number of good features that we all welcome. It is sensible that we are filling in the gaps and correcting the anomalies which have appeared as the courts have dealt with white-collar crime. The guilty inevitably escape through such gaps either because they cannot be charged or because, once charged, they cannot be convicted. It must be sensible to extend jurisdiction to prosecute Britons who have not fulfilled the requirement for the last act in a chain of criminal offending to have been committed in Britain, even though most of the other acts in the chain were committed here. The logic of the existing law defies contemplation.

[Sir Ivan Lawrence]

I am especially pleased that we are paying regard to the work of the Law Commission. I have always thought and have often said here that although that body of fine legal brains labours in our interest, its work ends up as dusty tomes in piles which we seldom seem to implement. The more we implement its careful analysis of the defects of our legal system, the better it will be for all of us. I congratulate the Government on taking up the Law Commission's rendering of the foreign aspects of fraud and similar crimes.

The creation of new offences where the prosecuting authorities have previously found themselves powerless to prosecute on the evidence makes good sense. However, we must be a bit careful about the definitions of such offences and their defences. Under clause 18, it will be an offence not to disclose information if a person only suspects that another is engaged in drugs money laundering. The problem will not be, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) suggested, that that will lower the standard of proof. The problem is likely to be that no jury will convict on suspicion alone, so prosecutions will be a complete and utter waste of time and money. We must have regard to that aspect when we lower the hurdles to a point at which common sense is unlikely to sustain any convictions.

I am not sure that I like the defence stated in clause 16(1). It says:

"It is a defence to a charge of committing an offence under this section that the person charged acquired the property for adequate consideration."

Does that protect a barrister or a solicitor? How hard must a barrister work? How long must his speeches be? How long must he be in conference before it is considered by some objective body that his work has been adequate? I assure the House that in some cases I say nothing and I ask no questions. I make a very short speech at the end of the day. Are people to say, "That work was not adequate consideration"? Am I to be charged under clause 16?

I am unlikely—I hope—ever to be charged with any criminal offence, but my example serves to underline the fact that we are becoming somewhat lazy and slack about the way in which we define certain offences, and in that regard considerable alarm and concern has been expressed not only about that provision but about the provisions dealing with insider trading. There is still time to look at those provisions again and see whether we cannot improve them so that absurd situations cannot even be contemplated.

There is good sense in giving the courts powers to confiscate assets where the trafficker has died or absconded. Why should his successor enjoy ill-gotten gains? There is sense in giving the courts power to confiscate further proceeds when they come to light after the trial, within the sensible limit of six years. Why should the trafficker benefit in later years from his ill-gotten gains?

The success of the policy of confiscating the ill-gotten gains of serious criminals—which started with the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 and was extended to other serious crimes in 1988, following a pledge at the general election—has been obvious from the fact that some £35 million has been removed from offenders. That policy may even—we cannot be sure—have deterred some from committing such crimes. However, £35 million is not a very substantial sum to flow from the many cases in which such proceeds have been traced. It is estimated that, in the United Kingdom alone, some £2·5 billion has come from drug trafficking in the past few years. Much more needs to be done to ensure that ill-gotten gains are removed from offenders. In so far as the Bill does that, it is to be welcomed.

The reduction of time waste on petty offences that has been achieved by giving the Crown prosecution service and the Serious Fraud Office the power to filter out small sums will be sensible and will liberate resources for more important work.

Once a criminal has been convicted by the prosecution discharging to a jury's satisfaction the burden of proof applicable in criminal offences, I see nothing at all wrong with the burden changing to require the convicted prisoner to show on the balance of probabilities that his assets are not the proceeds of crime. As the courts were confused by the wording of the 1986 Act—perhaps I should say, the absence of wording—it is wholly sensible to make the original intention clear.

I would go further. Too much of the expenditure on legal aid comes from the payment of very substantial sums to lawyers defending villains in enormous money-laundering and commercial fraud cases. I have often suggested—no one in authority has ever listened to me—that before legal aid is given in such cases we should ask the accused to accept that his assets will be specifically investigated on the balance of probabilities by a state investigator. We should tell him that if he wants legal aid he must declare all his interests and assets. I can assure my hon. Friends that many such persons will say, "No, thank you—I am not asking for legal aid." They will not apply, trials will be shorter, and 'not guilty' pleas will turn into 'guilty' pleas.

These days, with very long trials involving a number of defendants, there is absolutely no reason why people should not take their chance and sit in the dock for months on end while their lawyers are being paid substantial fees—in the hope that, ultimately, something may go wrong with the trial or that the jury may say, "This poor fellow has been sitting there and nothing much has happened; we want to acquit somebody, so we shall acquit him." That costs the taxpayer an immense sum of money, but we can stop it if we threaten to investigate the total assets and income of any person who applies for legal aid in respect of a serious trial of that kind. I recall that I warned the Home Secretary of the time about previous convictions when we discussed the Criminal Justice Bill in 1991. No one listened. Perhaps some day someone will.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that it is rather shocking that we should have missed the opportunity presented by the Bill to correct anomalies thrown up by the 1991 Act? Two questions—concerning sentencing matters and unit fines—have been a sharp focus of concern and should be dealt with as quickly as possible in a Criminal Justice Bill. Yet neither of them is addressed in the current Bill. Will it be possible for us to table reasoned amendments in Committee to deal with some of the problems?

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Had my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) been able to tear himself away from his many other important and urgent engagements, he would have heard that point made, and answered, many times during the debate. It is outside the scope of the long title of the present Bill to deal with that problem. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has said—and I welcome it—that primary legislation is not necessary to correct the unit fine fiasco.

As I have been rather unkind to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South—who is an assiduous attender of all debates on this subject and who no doubt had excellent reasons for his absence on this occasion—I should perhaps make the point on his side that the faults of the operation of the earlier Act were already clear when the present Bill was drafted and at the time of its Second Reading in the House of Lords in November 1992. Magistrates, solicitors and judges were already writing to us about the problem, and it is not all that difficult to suggest a solution. It is therefore a valid criticism that we did not broaden the long title of the Bill at the right time and take the opportunity to get on with what we shall undoubtedly do.

I am also pleased that we are dealing with the wholly unsatisfactory situation whereby a court cannot pass a sentence until a confiscation order has been made. Sometimes delays between the sentence and the confiscation order are very long and expensive. There will again be a saving in legal aid when leading counsel, junior counsel, solicitors, old uncle Tom Cobbleigh and all do not have to appear months later to deal with the second part of the trial.

In the other place, the Opposition got worked up about the fact that a prison sentence in default of a confiscation order will no longer wipe out the debt. They seemed to think it monstrous that someone should be punished twice. I do not understand that anger. Crime is not a game. The rules must be fair to protect the innocent and prevent excessive sentences, but there is no reason why money that is ill gotten should ever be held on to—even if a person is serving a prison sentence. I am pleased that good sense has taken hold of the Opposition—particularly the hon. Member for Sedgefield—on that point.

The changes in the law on insider dealing are also sensible and welcome. There is no logical reason why insider dealing with company securities should be illegal while insider dealing with debt securities, such as gilts and local authority stock, should be perfectly legal. I have already commented on the need for improvements in definition in that respect. There is also no logical reason why insider dealing on the stock exchange as an on-market activity should be illegal while transactions conducted elsewhere on a computer are legal. The world has changed and the stock exchange is no longer the only place where such transactions are exclusively made. It is obviously sensible that we should wake up to that.

There is every reason why we should bring our law into line with that of our colleagues in the European Community, so long as they do what they undertake to do and so long as we operate on a level playing field in dealing with our commercial criminals. We shall have to watch that one, too, because there are signs that from time to time our colleagues in the European Community do not do what they undertake to do and leave us looking rather Charlie-like as the only side rigorously fulfilling its obligations.

There is every reason why insider dealers who operate across international borders should not be protected, and provisions in that respect are welcome. The need to maintain international respect for the City of London is very important, because there is so much more competition and because the string of unfortunate experiences over the past few years may have dented that respect. One hopes, therefore, that the anti-fraud measures and the adoption of the banking directives, upon which I shall resist the temptation to address the House, will be very good for the reputation of the City. Those provisions are also very welcome.

Apart from the one or two measures upon which I have commented, I have only two criticisms of the Bill. I dealt with one of those when I responded to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South. He tells me that he was not present in the Chamber because he, like so many of his and our constituents, was burgled. It is important that my hon. Friend the Minister should bear that in mind as we debate a Criminal Justice Bill.

My second criticism relates to clause 1 subsections (4) and (5). I hope that those provisions are never called into effect and that they are never repeated in other statutes. If we give Ministers powers to invent criminal offences without recourse to Parliament, simply through orders, we are going down a very dangerous road.

On balance, the Bill is very useful. I am pleased that the Government are keeping up the relentless campaign against lawlessness, and particularly against the appalling, sickening, drug-related lawlessness. The British people would expect no less. I am also pleased that the measures attract the support of Opposition Members, because the fight against crime should never be a party political matter. I am sorry only that the hon. Member for Sedgefield said, when he began his speech, that there would be no Division at 10 pm as that precipitated a dash to the doors and too few hon. Members have been present in the Chamber to listen to what I think has been a most interesting debate.

9.2 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): After the Home Secretary courteously gave way to me when I asked him about South America and in particular about Colombia and Peru, he gave a very convincing answer about his work and that of his Home Office officials in Colombia. I thoroughly support that. May I perhaps have a letter from him about Peru? I do not blame him for not answering that, but it is a very important subject.

I wish to refer simply to clause 17 and the issues that arise from it. It is one of the Scottish clauses. In particular, I refer to a letter to the Leader of the House from David Johnston on 5 February 1993 in which he states:

> "I understand you are considering problems associated with the Parliamentary device of introducing a report which to all intents and purposes can't be challenged (Hansard 28 January 1993: column 1160)."

A criminal inquiry is one thing; what purports to be a criminal inquiry in substance is another. I was one of two people who declined to go before the Nimmo-Smith/Friel committee because I did not understand what a criminal inquiry in substance was. Either a proceeding is a criminal inquiry, or it is not. If it is not, there are different rules.

My instinct was thoroughly justified, as things turned out, in not submitting myself and necessarily confidential information to Mr. Nimmo-Smith and Mr. Friel in the light of subsequent events and the fiasco which surrounded an interview that purported to be from The Daily Telegraph. How people conducting what are supposed to be, in substance, criminal inquiries can as a regular habit talk to journalists while they are undertaking those inquiries is absolutely mind boggling.

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

The letter says:

"As Leader of the House, I think you ought to know I have challenged a particular aspect of the Report of the Lord Advocate's Inquiry into allegations of a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. Doubtless others may wish to challenge areas where they have first hand knowledge."

In areas of the Nimmo-Smith inquiry where I have first-hand knowledge, it is very wide of the mark. I must report that there are police in my area who are seething with indignation that they are in the position of not being able to answer something which was put to the House by the unopposed return procedure in circumstances which were an abuse of that procedure.

For the sake of time, I refer to a letter dated 4 February from David Johnston to the Lord Advocate:

"At 17.12 of last week's report of the Lord Advocate's Inquiry it is claimed that I misheard John Simpson in Snatchers Bar.

The implication was my professional incompetence led to a Member of Parliament being misled and, in turn, causing him to mislead the Lord President.

I told Mr. Nimmo-Smith and Mr. Friel that I was so surprised by what Simpson told me in Snatchers that I suggested to Alan Muir at The Sun that it would be worth his while phoning Simpson in the bar and speaking to him."

To cut a long story short, that happened. It also happened that—as I understand is its custom—The Sun tape recorded a conversation. That tape recording absolutely destroys paragraphs 17.12 and 17.13 of the Nimmo-Smith report:

"Simpson: Well maybe. I don't think he will be now but . . .

Muir: No?"—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he seems to be going wide of the Bill which is under consideration. He may make a passing reference to that matter, but he seems to be dwelling on it in some detail.

Mr. Dalyell: Other hon. Members have gone very wide: I have sat through the whole debate. I shall simply limit my comments to one matter:

"Muir: No? Right. Well, thank you very much Mr. Simpson.

Simpson: Well, remember that if you mention my name, I'll sue you.

Muir: . . . there is no problem . . .

Simpson: But there's . . . you know you're on the right track . . .

Muir: Yeh.

Simpson: There's a lot of things about this one that stink to high heaven.

Muir: Mmm.

Simpson: I mean, I am a totally, utterly straightforward person . . .

Muir: Mm

Simpson: . . . and always have been and there's a lot of things about this case that stink to high heaven."

Of course, I am obedient to the Chair. I put down a formal question to the effect that this whole correspondence should be put in the Library of the House of Commons. That was refused by the Scottish Office Minister who was operating for the Lord Advocate. I wish to register the fact that that is a profoundly unsatisfactory procedure.

On 10 February, a letter came from the Crown Office. As the House will be aware, in carrying out their inquiry and making their report, Mr. Nimmo-Smith and Mr. Friel——

Sir Ivan Lawrence: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. There are hon. Members who wish to participate in this debate on the Bill. Time is short, and the hon. Gentleman must know that he can raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. and learned Gentleman has had his turn; he has already spoken for 20 minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have told the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that he is going wide of this Second Reading. I now ask him to deal with the Bill as it stands rather than dwell on specific points which he has made in some detail.

Mr. Dalyell: There are few hon. Members as unsuccinct and verbose as the QC, the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence). Apparently, as QCs become more senior, they think that they can become more verbose. He took up time.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I kept to the subject.

Mr. Dalyell: This is the lawyers getting at it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not a matter of what another hon. Member thinks. I am saying from the Chair that I have given the hon. Member for Linlithgow sufficient scope. He has made his point and I cannot allow him to dwell on it. He must return to the main factors that are set out in the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: Against the background of clause 17, I believe that what happened in Scotland—what is generally called Fettesgate—is a shame-making event in our legal history. I speak on behalf of police officers who have been unable to defend themselves given what the Scottish Crown Office has done.

As I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall, of course, obey you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall leave it at that at 9.10 pm.

9.10 pm

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): This is a technical Bill; for the most part it makes and amends lawyers' law. Much can and will, no doubt, be said in Committee about the details of it and the way in which it might operate. That being so, I shall not enter upon that discussion this evening.

It is no doubt important to clarify the issue of jurisdiction over offences having a foreign element, to deal with technical issues concerning confiscation orders and to tighten the rules applying to dealing on the stock market. I am sorry, however, that the limited parliamentary time that is available to the Home Office will not be spent on dealing with the more pressing concerns of all our constituents in the field of law and order; for example, the problem of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which has turned our policemen into clerks when they should be out on the beat protecting the public.

Also, as has been said many times in the debate, it is important to tackle the already notorious section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which together with section 1 effectively prevents the courts from having regard to the criminal record of a convicted person. I well understand that a convicted person can be said to have paid the penalty for the offences of which he was convicted, but society is entitled to say to him, "That may be so, but if you do it again you will be punished more severely."

We should be dealing also with the scandals caused by what I regard as the ill-conceived system of unit fines. I hope that we shall also soon spend time constructing a legal framework for the excellent proposals of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to provide secure education for persistent juvenile offenders. Perhaps we might also find some legislative time to get on with my own private Member's Bill which would reform the law on bail so as to protect our constituents against persistent offenders who commit offences while on bail.

Part I of the Bill before us today would give the courts of England and Wales jurisdiction to try cases of fraud and related offences where there is a foreign element that prevents a prosecution under the law as it stands. I join other hon. Members in congratulating the Law Commission on its excellent work in this area. There are indeed absurdities, as highlighted by the case of Rex v. Harden.

I shall give a hypothetical example. If two Londoners happened to be in France for a short time and one persuaded the other to part with property by deception in France, that offence could not be tried in the United Kingdom. It is right that that anomaly should be rectified. On the other hand, if two Frenchmen happened to be in England for a short time and the same circumstances arose, the English courts would have jurisdiction. I believe that the English courts should have the power to decline jurisdiction in such a case. The prosecution of crime is an expensive business, and I see no reason why the English courts should try cases that have no real or substantial connection with this country.

The English courts should also have power to decline jurisdiction where there would be any question of double jeopardy for someone who has already suffered criminal process in another country for the same offence. No doubt the law and practice of extradition in this country will be carefully examined to ensure that that does not happen.

Part III deals with the confiscation of the proceeds of criminal activity. I welcome the fact that confiscation will apply to the proceeds not only of drug trafficking but of other serious crimes. I have no difficulty with the civil standard of proof when applied to confiscation. It is right that the criminal standard—proof beyond reasonable doubt—should apply to the question whether or not the accused person is guilty of the offence with which he has been charged. The Bill makes no attempt to shift or to change that burden of proof in any way.

Having secured a conviction, we proceed to the question whether assets derived from criminal activity should be confiscated. I have no difficulty with the civil standard in that process. Anyone who does not like that standard has a simple remedy—do not commit crime.

There are many causes of crime. One is profit. It is much easier to engage in some forms of criminal activity than to work for a living, as we and our constituents have to do. We must take every opportunity to take the profit out of crime. One particular form of criminal activity—not mentioned in the Bill but of the same genre is pornography—a multi-million pound business about which I spoke at some length in the House on 10 July last year.

The problem there is securing a conviction under the Obscene Publications Act 1959. If a conviction cannot be secured, the Bill's provisions will not apply. The case concerning the book "Juliet" by the Marquis de Sade gives a clear indication that the 1959 Act is wholly defective, because if a conviction cannot be secured on the basis of that book, one cannot be secured in respect of any publication that is alleged to be obscene. We must therefore change the definition of obscenity under the 1959 Act. Meanwhile, we must confiscate the pornographic material—not the proceeds of crime as under this Bill—under section 3 of the 1959 Act, and the civil standard would also apply there. It is right that the civil standard of proof should apply where the confiscation of pornographic material is in question.

We should not be afraid either to take the action which we have in other areas of criminal law—to employ private contractors to seek out offending material, bring it before magistrates, and secure confiscation orders—with the costs to be paid by the pornographers under an award of costs by the court.

Clause 26 gives me cause for some concern, which is shared by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) and the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). It is wrong that a person should be convicted of a criminal offence simply on the basis that he suspects that someone might have been engaged in crime. The very least that the prosecutor should be prepared to prove is that the defendant believed that another person had been engaged in crime.

Clause 27 and other clauses provide maximum penalties. Clause 27 provides a penalty of 14 years' imprisonment, but why do we bother to specify maximum penalties in Acts of Parliament when it is clear from the cases that the courts do not come near to imposing them fully? The House must make it clear that, when it specifies 14 years' imprisonment as the maximum penalty for an offence, that is the sentence that the House expects to be imposed for the most serious examples of the crime in question.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend understand the difference between a mandatory sentence and a maximum sentence?

Mr. Stephen: Of course I do. What I am saying is that the penalty imposed for serious examples of a particular offence often comes nowhere near the maximum penalty that Parliament laid down for it.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my hon. Friend think that the matter is assisted somewhat by the fact that the prosecution can now appeal against too lenient a sentence? It has certainly helped in some rape cases.

Mr. Stephen: I do. I wrote an article which was published in 1986 which, together with the efforts of a great many other people, resulted in section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 which gave the Court of Appeal that power.

One issue of serious concern to our constituents in the case of offences with which the Bill is concerned and other offences generally is the right of silence, to which reference was made earlier.

[Mr. Stephen]

Under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987, a person suspected of serious fraud can be required by the Serious Fraud Office to answer questions. Failure to do so may result in criminal penalties.

A person suspected of evading income tax has no right of silence. He must prove that he does not owe the tax that he is alleged to owe. A person suspected of drinking and driving does not have a right of silence. He must give a specimen or pay the full penalty. But a person accused of armed robbery, rape, burglary or murder has the right simply to sit back, arms folded, and say, "Prove it if you can." We must therefore change the law so that the jury can take fully into account a failure to speak in circumstances where an honest man should have spoken.

I have some concerns with part IV which seeks to regulate dealings in stocks and shares. White collar crime is just as reprehensible as blue collar crime and must be punished accordingly. I have no personal interest in the City, but it grew to pre-eminence and contributed vast sums of money to our national revenues from invisible earnings, as it still does, without the burden of the complex regulations that Parliament has visited upon it in recent years.

It is easy to point to consumer benefits. We must, when we consider legislation of this kind, have regard to consumer costs, because the costs of compliance in the City are high. It may well be that our limited resources for fighting crime might be better employed elsewhere.

This is a useful technical Bill which is of great interest to lawyers and accountants, but of marginal concern to our constituents. It needs some discussion in Committee, but I hope that it will pass quickly through the House without taking much more parliamentary time, so that we can concentrate on criminal law matters which are of much greater concern to all the British people.

9.23 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I agree with the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) that the Bill is of limited and marginal interest. It deserves half a cheer. It has been welcomed for what it tries to do but hon. Members have reflected its inadequacy and lack of precision and the Government's failure to demonstrate a real interest in putting right the criminal justice system.

Hon. Members have put forward the complaints of their constituents and the police about the Government's failure to deal adequately with the criminal justice system and have complained about the enormous problems that result. Like the dog that did not bark, the main problem with the Bill is what it fails to do.

One criticism of the Bill is that it has proceeded so slowly to this stage. At the beginning of the debate the Home Secretary said that we should not move too quickly. I think that his comments were based on his experience of how things went wrong with the previous Criminal Justice Bill. He has certainly fulfilled that requirement as it has taken four months for the Bill to reach Second Reading. We are owed an explanation from the Minister of why the Bill has taken so long to reach this stage. Another criticism of the Bill is that it is too narrowly drawn. A third criticism is that it has not been adequately thought through.

When dealing with the problem of drugs and trafficking in drugs, we are confronting one of the major issues of our society today. That point was rightly reflected in the introductory remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). We certainly need to underline the fact that the Government are presently taking appalling risks, one of which is their failure to deal properly with drug misuse, because of the background of the HIV virus and the danger that that poses to many people in our society. Prevention must be properly addressed, but that is not happening. The problen of drugs in our society is one that needs a strategic and comprehensive approach. While the measures in the Bill are to be welcomed, they are a fragment of the provisions that the Government should be introducing.

Given the fact that everyone has referred to the Bill as comparatively narrow, it is ironic that the Home Secretary referred to it in his introductory remarks as a sort of first draft. The Committee that will consider the Bill has an important and onerous job in scrutinising and improving it. However, the Bill should reach Committee with some certainty and as a precise instrument that has been given careful and detailed consideration by Ministers as well as civil servants, following extensive consultation and expert advice. It should not be cast into Committee by the Home Secretary as his first thoughts on the subject. He should not pass major responsibility to his Minister of State to sort out the Bill in the aftermath of the Second Reading debate.

One of the Bill's major omissions, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) referred, as did hon. Members from both sides of the House, is its failure to deal with the Criminal Justice Act 1991 and its shortcomings. My hon. Friend's remarks were cutting and well justified, and I commend his initiative in giving the House the opportunity to put matters right in this Session with thoughtful amendment to the Bill. I look forward to the House being given the opportunity to consider the measure further.

The Home Secretary failed to heed the warnings of my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield last October. The provisions could have been included in the Bill. Although the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) and others rightly reflected that the Bill as it now stands, and its title, preclude such an amendment, it could have been allowed for initially. This is the second Criminal Justice Bill that has been too tightly drawn and has prevented the House from doing what it should, and making constructive amendments.

During the passage of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, I sought to introduce amendments to help with the prevention of crime and the diversion of young people into criminal activity. As the aim of the 1991 Act, as expressed by the Government, was to reduce the numbers in prison and in custody, one would have thought that measures to improve prevention would have been welcomed. But the Clerks had to advise that that Bill was so narrowly drawn —I think that they referred to it as having an extremely curious geography—that we were unable to make some of the constructive contributions that were and are needed by society. To our great regret, we shall have the same experience with this Bill because it is so narrowly drawn that only the two major issues that it addresses will be open to consideration and improvement in Committee.

I very much regret the inability to see the wood for the trees. It is becoming a tradition among Conservative Members to fail to consult, listen and understand their own legislation. I hope that a lesson has been learned. This is the third Bill this Session that the Home Secretary has not read in advance of the debate. However, he had the grace to say that he was giving his junior Minister the task of sorting out the Bill in Committee. I suppose that that is at least a welcome step.

Two aspects of the 1991 Act should have been dealt with. One relates to the problems caused by Ministers seeking to interfere in matters that they do not understand. The first of those relates to the figures that the units apply and which have fettered the courts in reaching decisions. Secondly, they have removed discretion from magistrates who have traditionally exercised common sense. I have had experience in the previous system of recommendations for the local bench on motoring fines. The magistrates looked at the outcome of applying the bench's unit strategy and said, "Does this make sense?"

Common sense should be applied in the courts and the 1991 Act was mistaken in not respecting that. I hope that in considering the details of this legislation in Committee and more generally the Home Secretary and his colleagues will accept that courts should have the ability to exercise common sense in dispensing justice.

Another aspect is the ability to consider previous offences. It is important for courts to be able to deal with such offences without imposing a sentence that is totally out of proportion to the offence that is being considered. That is especially relevant to drug offences. A person who continually steals Mars bars is guilty of stealing only those, but the repetition of crimes involving drugs or violence is extremely serious and the court dealing with them needs to recognise the background to the offences.

The Home Secretary said that the intention in Committee is to deal with one omission: to amend the Bill to deal with terrorism. We certainly welcome that but such provisions should have been in the Bill in the first place. We are also worried that the issue has not been thought through. I hope that in his winding-up speech the Minister will deal with that. In dealing with crimes related to drugs, a court is also dealing with the proceeds from those crimes whereas in terrorist cases the proceeds from other offences are used to finance terrorism. That may involve drug trafficking, in which case it would be dealt with by the legislation.

How will the laundering of money to support terrorism be dealt with by the Bill when the offence that creates the relevant funds is highly unlikely to arise from a terrorist offence itself? It may arise from fraud, burglary or armed robbery. Will those offences give rise to the Bill's powers of seizure in relation to drugs? I hardly think so. Is the burden of proof in relation to such offences to be dealt with? Surely not, and in that case how do we tie the offence and the intention to use the proceeds for terrorism to court procedures that are clearly related to drug-related offences but are not clear in relation to the possible application of money for terrorist activities?

The Home Secretary spoke about the success of law enforcement agencies. In response to a question, he said that the quality of drug liaison officers was more important than pouring in staff and money to undertake routine tasks. That is a curious comment in view of the fact that the Bill creates a massive need for money and staff to undertake routine tasks.

I give the simple example of disclosure. Without resources, the provision to force more disclosures of suspect transactions that are referred to in clauses 18 and 26 will be counter-productive. We heard earlier that there are currently about 5,000 disclosures and that in the Metropolitan police area they are dealt with by 21 officers. That has been found to be inadequate in terms of the pressure that is required to deal properly with the amount of information that becomes available.

The Bill will at least triple that amount of disclosure, by a fairly conservative estimate. It is clear that some of the information that will become available will be of lower quality, because it will have been triggered by suspicion rather than belief. We see and welcome the purpose behind the legislation, but there is also a need to boost morale in the police and other agencies by demonstrating that those bodies will have the resources to use it.

The complaint has been made that seized assets do not assist the fight against drug-related crime. Morale would certainly be helped if such assets were directed towards that fight, either through drug enforcement agencies—which, in America, are self-financing—or by preventing the market in drugs, which leads to the trafficking that the Bill aims to prevent.

Surely, Ministers should show not only that they will deal with drug trafficking, but that they intend—as Opposition Members have put it—to be tough on the causes of drug trafficking and drug misuse. It is difficult to see how that can happen, and how disclosure can assist the police materially, given the freeze in police numbers. The Home Secretary referred to the likelihood that the police will have greater freedom to deal with their own resources; one chief constable spoke to me, in a rather jaundiced way, of the freedom to work flexibly within resources that would undoubtedly become increasingly inadequate. That is the experience of recent years. The fact is that we need both the bravery and initiatives of officers in the front line, and the painstaking back-room work that needs time, staff and money—a need that the Bill will increase.

The Home Secretary and his colleagues must realise that the failure to recognise how all parts of the police service need to fit together and complement each other causes immense anger and frustration among police officers, and all who work with them and value their work. The privatisation of security services, with prisoners escaping or allowed to go free—today, a private security vehicle ran into a police car—would be laughable were it not so serious. The privatisation of parts of the police service, which the Home Secretary wants to bring about, would be an even more dangerous and mistaken step. Thank God it is not within the remit of the Bill; otherwise, the right hon. and learned Gentleman might be tempted to introduce it.

There is a need not only for the matter to be tidied up—we shall try to do that in Committee—but for the Government to recognise the strategic importance of providing the police with the resources, as well as the legal means, to deal with the serious problems that we face.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) for his work as chairman of the all-party group on drug misuse. He has referred to many of the problems, and a number of hon. Members have mentioned the undermining of residential facilities for drug misusers. Again, prevention is necessary. Although the Bill and its intention are welcome, they must be part of a range of measures to deal with drugs and similar difficulties.

I was interested to learn that the hon. and learned Member for Burton is not listened to by Ministers either, despite his willingness to provide advice on insider dealing from within the legal profession. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have made it clear that the police and the community want the Government to take crime seriously—especially youth crime—and regret the failure of this narrow Bill to deal adequately with such issues.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield spoke eloquently of the development of drug use and addiction, and called for deterrents and the proper use of funds. I hope that the Minister will respond to that call. Let me remind him of the need to deal with couriers from Nigeria, thus saving the cost of imprisonment, child care and future personal and social services.

The hon. Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) said that he felt that there was no qualitative difference between white collar crime and other forms of crime. We need to be careful about suggesting that there are no distinctions to be drawn. Offences need to be pursued with the enthusiasm that is appropriate to the seriousness of the crime and its impact on society. In relation, however, to the financial aspects of the Bill, I point to the grave reservations that have been expressed by a number of bodies—in particular by the Hundred Group of Finance Directors on behalf of the largest quoted companies in the United Kingdom which have expressed major concerns over the proposed legislation on insider dealing. They have referred to ambiguities implicit in the drafting of the Bill which they believe are so serious as to result in the legislation hindering legitimate business activities and market practices.

I seek from the Minister now the granting of their request for the guidelines to be issued in time before the Bill is considered in Committee. I hope that the Minister will grant their request. Guidelines would have a serious bearing on the need for amendments to the Bill in its current form. When we dealt with the immigration measure that went through Parliament in 1988, the Home Office continually refused to recognise that draft orders were available but, curiously enough, those orders were published the day after the Bill had been considered by Parliament.

I ask the Minister to give the House an undertaking tonight that draft guidelines will be available before the Committee sits so that members of the Committee can be properly informed and can properly deal with the issues that have been raised in the debate by hon. Members on both sides when drawing attention to the shortcomings of the legislation.

Guidance notes are not enough for many aspects. Some cases have led to desperate difficulties. A finding of guilt can lead to heavy penalties and the loss of reputation. The ruining of a reputation can be extremely damaging. If someone transgresses seriously, it is right that that person should be punished, as the Bill intends should happen. It is also right that individuals should be protected by the legislation. It is important, therefore, in relation both to insider dealing and to disclosure, that there should be proper guidelines so that no individual is in any doubt about what he or she is required to do under the legislation.

It is also important that City and financial institutions should be in no doubt about what they are required to do and that there should be a proper framework for their employees. There should be proper recording of the reporting of suspicion so that there is no danger that, by error, individuals put themselves in jeopardy under the law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North made a thoughtful speech, based upon his experience. I hope that his direct courtroom experience, and also his experience when investigating a major case of insider dealing, will be taken into account by the Minister in Committee. We need to make use of that experience and expertise.

The Committee will need to consider changes to tighten up the Bill. We need clear guidelines for the training of staff. Staff working in the City must be protected. To be effective, the legislation needs to be clear.

The Bill has many failings, but the issues with which it deals are important. Therefore we shall seek to improve the Bill in Committee. We shall endeavour to assist the Minister who has been instructed by the Home Secretary to sort it out in Committee. If the Minister is willing to accept the help and advice that we offer, I am certain that the Bill will be a stronger and better measure when it returns to the House on Report.

9.44 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): This has been an interesting and wide-ranging debate. I congratulate all right hon. and hon. Members on their contributions. I was struck by the low-key appreciation for this measure from the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) compared with the much greater appreciation of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). Perhaps a difference of opinion is opening up on the Opposition Front Bench.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth made particular reference to the provisions on insider dealing and asked whether we could make guidelines available before the Committee stage. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has assured me that, when the clauses are considered in Committee, some of the clarification that the hon. Gentleman seeks will be provided.

I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth chose to make a few cheap comments about the proper attempts of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to ensure that the police carry out their duties in the most effective manner and that they are doing the duties that they should be doing. There will be more time to debate that, but I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman had a go at those proper activities.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth asked about Nigerians who have been convicted of importing drugs into Britain. The length of sentence for such offences is a matter for the courts, but it does send out a deterrent signal. The hon. Member for Sedgefield asked whether we had done anything to transmit that information to Nigeria. We ran a poster campaign in west Africa and the Indian sub-continent, making clear the penalties for importing drugs illegally into Britain. That campaign will be renewed in the forthcoming year. The Nigerians display warnings at their airports. We have helped the Nigerian authorities by, for example, training their law enforcement officers, and we have offered assistance to deal with Nigeria's internal drug problems. It is a matter that we take seriously. I hope that those comments help the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield set the tone for the debate by welcoming the Bill on behalf of the Opposition. That has been a common feature of all the speeches. There have been words of regret that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said, the Bill was not so drafted as to address the problems that many hon. Members have mentioned with the Criminal Justice Act 1991. My right hon. and learned Friend made our position clear: we have listened, we know what the problems are and, if necessary, changes will be made. I wanted to emphasise that.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield and other hon. Members rightly drew our attention to the size and scale of the drug problem. The Government spend some £500 million per year on the campaign against drugs and their preventive strategy, which shows how seriously we take the problem. The hon. Member for Sedgefield criticised the work of other Government Departments, such as by the Department of Education, but the national curriculum deals with substance misuse. Although specialist staff may not be available in all schools—it is up to each authority to decide whether to maintain that service—such information is available to children under the national curriculum. The Department of Health, too, in the way in which it conducted European drug prevention week, showed how it is contributing to the fight against drugs.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield rightly mentioned the work of the police in drug prevention. He mentioned King's Cross but, sadly, did not also mention the 250 arrests that were made in that operation. The activities of each force, the regional crime squads and the national criminal intelligence service show how all our law enforcement agencies are working together to combat the threat of drugs. Their efforts will be underpinned by the Bill. It is important to recognise that fact.

One of the issues raised in our debate was the Bill's impact on our financial institutions and how financial institutions outside the banks were reacting to the requirements. I draw the House's attention to the guidance notes for banks and building societies issued in December 1990 by the Bank of England. The notes make clear what the financial institutions should be doing not only to prepare themselves for this legislation but to make the working of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 effective.

The fact that about 11,000 reports of information arising from existing legislation have already reached the national criminal intelligence service shows that the financial institutions in this country are already responding to the challenge of the 1986 Act and will not have to change their procedures substantially to incorporate the requirements of the EC directive because it was anticipated in the guidance notes. There is no doubt that the point raised by the hon. Member for Sedgefield is well met by the notes, which I commend to the House.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield and others asked how we were dealing with south American countries in terms of bilateral arrangements to improve, for example, confiscation procedures. Work has been concluded on bilateral agreements with Argentina, Ecuador, Guyana, Mexico, Panama and Uruguay, and work continues with a range of other south American countries to reinforce our procedures in that respect. Much of the work was pioneered by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary on his trip to that part of the world—[Interruption.] I have to justify why he went. In addition, through our work with the United Nations against drugs, we have given further material assistance especially to countries such as Colombia. We take seriously the attempt to extend the fight against drugs on an international basis.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield also spoke of the problems which he believed were connected with the use of assumptions in the Bill. The nature of money laundering, and of drug trafficking in particular, is a life style offence. It perhaps goes beyond the range of other types of criminal offence, which is why the assumptions—the use of which we make mandatory, as the Bill outlines—are a real and proper requirement, recognising the nature of drug trafficking itself. I think that the House generally agreed with that.

The hon. Member also questioned the effectiveness of existing confiscation arrangements. I should point out that by the end of 1991 3,420 confiscation orders had been made under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. That proves that the legislation is working, as does the fact that the amount of money which has now been confiscated, or which is the subject of confiscation orders, has risen to about £50 million.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield and others also mentioned clause 18 and the nature of the proof required when an offence may be connected with knowing of or suspecting money laundering. Although I understand the concerns expressed, I should point out that the criminal level of proof is still required to sustain such an accusation. Equally, we should bear in mind the fact that at that level the process could well include a large number of people in financial institutions. That means that the prosecution in such cases must be entirely sure of the facts in bringing such a charge. That shows a balance in the way the legislation is framed.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: The jury will be told that suspicion is never enough for a criminal offence, so for the jury to be told that they must be satisfied that they are sure that there was a suspicion will be so confusing as to make the provisions impractical nonsense.

Mr. Jack: I know what my hon. and learned Friend says on the subject, but that is a matter for the prosecutors in terms of sustaining the prosecution. Clearly they will know what the evidence is, and on what basis they are bringing the charges. As I have said, a high level of proof is required of the prosecution if the subjective offences are to be sustained. They were indeed the subject of considerable debate in another place.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and others discussed the way in which the proposals will relate to Northern Ireland. Indeed, the powers to confiscate the proceeds acquired by people involved in terrorist-related activities are at present available only to the courts in Northern Ireland. We want to ensure that the money laundering and confiscatory arrangements are kept parallel—I nodded rather vigorously at the hon. Gentleman when he said as much. There must be a basis which extends throughout Great Britain for proposals on money laundering. Equally, as the hon. Gentleman said, both the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Powers) Act will require modification to incorporate those arrangements. I hope that what I have said helps the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned clause 44, which effectively brings into our law what is already happening between the Republic of Ireland and this country. The intention is entirely correct in terms of trying to ensure that the extradition arrangements work as effectively and smoothly as possible. I know that there are sensitivities on that matter and I have taken careful note of the hon. Gentleman's words.

[Mr. Jack]

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the differences between the effects of the Bill, especially part I, on the various parts of the United Kingdom. Those differences are the result of the different legal codes in Scotland, in Northern Ireland and in England and Wales. I gather that the Northern Ireland Office is considering the hon. Gentleman's second question—I want to assure him on that matter.

Many other hon. Members spoke about other matters, especially the insider dealing provisions. I shall try to deal generally with the questions raised, and in doing so I put on record a quotation from "Investor Relations: a guide for directors", produced by the stock exchange. That quotation puts in context some of the fears and concerns that have been expressed in all parts of the House, and illustrates how the existing advice already goes beyond the part of the Bill which relates to insider dealing:

"It is vital that no group of investors of market commentators be given privileged access to price-sensitive information. However, it can often be helpful to provide background information to brokers' analysts who play a key role in analysing published information given to the market, and to major investors or potential investors in the company. This might include both a restatement and elaboration of information already released and material on the company's products and processes which, while not price-sensitive, assists analysts or fund managers in their understanding of the nature of a company's business."

That quotation underlines what my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said about that part of the Bill representing "business as usual". My hon. Friend has been present throughout the debate and listened to hon. Members' comments, and I know that he will take them into account in the continuing work on the consultations that he, his officials and others are having with members of the financial community, in order to take on board and reflect some of the concerns that hon. Members have expressed in the debate.

Time prevents me from going into many of the other points raised. In the Government's view, this is a wholly benevolent Bill. It will strengthen the fight against drugs so as to ensure that we have the most effective regime to counter those who have sought to profit from money laundering and from drug trafficking. It will ensure that we deal with those people on equal terms with other members of the European Community and that we take our part in the international fight against drugs. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Criminal Justice Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament—

(a) of compensation for loss suffered as a result of the making of confiscation orders which are varied or cancelled; and

(b) of grants to such persons as the Secretary of State considers appropriate in connection with measures intended—

(i) to combat or deal with drug trafficking or the misuse of drugs; or

(ii) to deal with consequences of the misuse of drugs.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

Cane Sugar

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4439/93, relating to guaranteed prices applicable in the 1992-93 delivery period to cane sugar originating in the African, Caribbean and Pacific states; supports the Government's objective of ensuring that prices paid to the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries are both in accordance with the terms of the Lome-Sugar Protocol and a level which enables the viability of cane sugar refineries in the Community to be maintained; and supports the Government's intention to press for a radical review of the European Community sugar regime which will produce some deregulatory benefits for the Community's sugar consumers, while accepting a continuation of that regime until 30th June 1994.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

Developing Countries

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 9910/92, relating to demography, family planning and co-operation with developing countries; and welcomes the Resolution adopted at the Development Council on 18th November 1992, which takes full account of United Kingdom interests in this field.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Question agreed to.

RIGHT TO KNOW BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Right to Know Bill it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(i) any expenses incurred by a Minister of the Crown in consequence of the Act;

(ii) any increases attributable to the Act in the sums so payable out of money so provided under any other enactment;

(b) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of—

(i) any salary payable in accordance with the Act to the Information Commissioner appointed under the Act; and

(ii) any pension so payable to or in respect of the Commissioner.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

CARDIFF BAY BARRAGE BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [2 April],

That the Amendment to the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill set out in the Lords Message of 18th March be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Question again proposed.

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

PETITION

Rail Privatisation

10 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I present a petition that expresses the grave concern of many of my constituents in the city of York and in many other places about the horrendous threat to jobs posed by rail privatisation. The petition reads as follows:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The Humble Petition of residents of the City of York and other parts of the United Kingdom, showeth That they wish to protest against the Government's plan to privatise the railways. Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House calls for all possible steps to be taken to protect the jobs of those connected with the rail industry in York. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

The petition is signed by David Flintham, the editor of my local paper, the Yorkshire Evening Press, by Robert Beaumont, the chief features writer, and by more than 12,000 other of my constituents and people of neighbouring areas.

To lie upon the Table.

Arachnoiditis

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

10.2 pm

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): I thank you, Madam Speaker, for granting me this Adjournment debate this evening. You appear to be in rude health. Clearly, the Easter recess has done you good.

This is the first occasion since my arrival in the House on which I have had an Adjournment debate on a national issue. Hitherto, all my Adjournment debates have been exclusive to my constituency. I have two admissions to make. First, I had never heard of arachnoiditis until it was raised in my constituency by the chairman of the Arachnoiditis Self Help Group. I believe that I was in good company, because none of the journalists on the local television, radio or newspapers had heard of it, either.

I understand that arachnoiditis is the inflammation of the delicate membranes surrounding the spine and nerve routes. They become inflamed, thicken and adhere to other tissues, such as nerves. The condition has been associated with spinal infection or injuries, including spinal surgery, the most common of which is for slipped discs. It is allegedly caused by injections to the spine in connection with procedures such as myelography. It was the fact that the Isle of Wight consultant who is responsible for myelographies told our local newspaper that, because of the risks involved, he would not dream of having one himself, that drew the matter to my attention and to that of a number of others.

The second admission that I have to make is that, until I put my back out—fortunately only on one occasion—I did not realise the sheer unspeakable agony of a back complaint. There is no respite from it, whether one stands up or tries lying on a bed or even on a hard surface such as a floor.

I see that the Minister, who also appears to be in his customary rude health, is in his place. I do not know whether he has ever suffered from a back complaint. I have noticed that, since his translation from the Whips Office, he has developed red box stoop but, apart from that, he has always seemed to me to be a bouncy and healthy Minister; but if he has had the unfortunate experience of putting his back out, he will know precisely why I have initiated the debate.

I pay tribute to my constituent, Mr. Ron Sheppard, who is the chairman of the Arachnoiditis Self Help Group. He has worked tirelessly for the cause, and his breakthrough came when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my noble Friend Baroness Cumberlege, wrote to me on 5 March:

"it is possible that any procedure involving puncturing the membrane around the spinal cord could lead to the introduction of harmful bacteria and hence cause inflammation such as arachnoiditis."

I thank my noble Friend Baroness Cumberlege, through my hon. Friend, for cutting through all the red tape and bureaucracy and giving the brave little band of back sufferers the answer straight down the line. That is a triumph for open government.

The first great concern is that people still feel that they are not properly counselled about the risks involved in myelography. My noble Friend continues in her letter:

"In many situations, MRI"— magnetic resonance imaging—

[Mr. Barry Field]

"will be a suitable alternative to a myelogram. Currently, clinicians have to consider for individual patients the balance between the risks of myelography and the risks of waiting for the availability of an MRI scan. The patient should be involved in this decision through informed consent."

The self-help group has a number of letters from people all over the country who say that they were never properly counselled concerning the risks involved. I have asked the chairman to select a sample to illustrate my point; I am sure that the Minister will take my word for it that I could provide the originals of those letters and many more besides. The first is from the chairman, Ron Sheppard, who says:

"I was never warned of any risk before myelography".

Mrs. Rogers of Sussex writes:

"At no time was I warned there may be side effects".

Mrs. Ince of London states:

"never at any point was I informed of the dangers of the said procedure."

Mrs. Paton of Cornwall says:

"No-one seems to tell you anything".

It has been put to me—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will be sympathetic to the point—that when one is suffering the unspeakable and excruciating agony of this back disorder, one will sign one's life away to anyone who will promise one relief from it. I hope that my hon. Friend will take that point on board and that, perhaps as a result of this Adjournment debate, we will see the introduction of a large, bold-typeface warning about the risks involved in such treatment, to be signed in duplicate by patients, with one copy to be taken away by them and the other to be placed on their file, so that in future there can be no doubt whatever that patients have been properly counselled in such circumstances.

As Baroness Cumberlege said in her letter, MRI scans have an important part to play in the alternative therapy that will be available in future. I understand that, in September 1992, the Royal College of Radiologists issued a report, which is brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for Health personally, estimating that MRI scanner needs of the United Kingdom amount to approximately 225, and that there are currently 90 in operation. I am pleased to say that one is made available regularly on the Isle of Wight, and it plays an important part in the diagnostic health care of my constituents.

When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate, he will no doubt point out that, in 1991, the Secretary of State for Health announced a three-year rolling programme for MRI scanners. However, the problem is urgent, and one reason for this debate is to call for an accelerated programme. Indeed, with fundholding, these matters are being discussed actively with consultants and general practitioners throughout the country. In my constituency, Mr. Paul Bingham of the Isle of Wight health commission published an article in the "Public Health Quarterly" to provoke discussion on the use of MRI scanners in future.

An article in today's Times states that my hon. Friend the Minister will announce next week an increase in the limit for regions and national health service trusts from £50,000 to £250,000 for leasing medical equipment and building new developments. Having spent my first Parliament campaigning against the wretched Ryrie rules, I am delighted that, in my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I have at long last found a champion for their total abolition. If the article in The Times is true, next week's announcement will hopefully be the manifestation of that abolition.

I want my hon. Friend to go further than that. The provision of pound for pound has been an area of great success in the Government. Every £1 raised locally is matched by £1 from the taxpayer's pocket. Such a scheme for MRI scanners would be welcomed by the general public. Many district health authorities already operate such schemes, but if they were encouraged by the Department of Health, that would be a very welcome initiative.

We can all decide which good causes to support, but none of us has a choice about when we are ill. That is why our national health service is so precious to us all. I hope that the Minister will pick up this baton and run with it till we have a result. Such a scheme would accelerate the introduction of this wonderful "Tomorrow's World" technology throughout the health service, and it would be just the kind of dynamic challenge that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health had in mind in involving private financing in the health service.

I have some questions for the Minister. Are there any central records of the number of myelograms being carried out? What more can be done to ensure that GPs are aware of arachnoiditis and so ensure its proper diagnosis? Are there any proposals for looking into alternative pain management to avoid spinal injections? Has the Department of Health considered the work of Professor Jayson at Manchester hospital, who has been researching the condition and is president of the self-help group? Has the Medical Research Council a part to play in considering the problem?

I understand that Ron Sheppard has written to the Select Committee on Health asking whether the whole problem can be examined. I know that the Minister will, as always, be as helpful as possible when he replies to the debate, and that he will do his best to continue that ray of hope brought into the lives of so many sufferers by the letter from Baroness Cumberlege. I hope that my small contribution tonight will encourage those who have suffered for so long, and that I may have convinced the Minister that arachnoiditis really is a pain in the back.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) on his very full and lucid account of the serious problems faced by people who suffer from arachnoiditis. I acknowledge the close interest that he has taken in the matter.

I am only too familiar with the problems facing people with arachnoiditis. I have been made aware of just how great the suffering can be by my constituents and through the Department. Perhaps it would be helpful to hon. Members if I briefly describe it.

Arachnoiditis is an uncommon condition which is characterised by chronic inflammation and thickening of the sub-arachnoid space, which covers and protects the brain and spinal cord. It may develop for several reasons. These include meningitis, suba-rachnoid haemorrhage, tumours, trauma from injury or surgery and irritants, including the contrast agents used in myelography. The condition traps nerves as they leave the spinal cord.

Arachnoiditis at the lower end of the spinal canal may cause a great deal of low back and leg pain, although there is no distinctive syndrome.

Any trauma to the spine, including surgical invasive procedures, may lead in some cases to the development of arachnoiditis. Patients with this condition may have more than one predisposing cause. For example, myelography involves trauma to the spinal cavity to introduce a needle through which a contrast medium, which is an irritant, is injected, and is not uncommonly followed by a spine operation. Epidural injections involve the introduction of a needle to the epidural space. It does not penetrate the arachnoid membrane, nor is a contrast agent injected, but arachnoiditis has been reported following epidural injections.

Myelography is a diagnostic procedure. It involves the introduction of a contrast medium into the spinal column through a needle inserted into the lower spine. Once the contrast agent has been injected, several radiographs are then taken which provide views of the spinal cavity.

Myodil was the United Kingdom trade name for the contrast medium, which was an oily contrast agent for myelograms. It was introduced in 1941. It quickly became the standard contrast medium for myelography until the general acceptance of non-ionic water soluble contrast media during the 1980s. Myodil has not been marketed since 1987, when it was withdrawn from the market by its manufacturers.

Myodil was first marketed in the 1940s and was, therefore, issued a product licence of right when the licensing of medicinal products was introduced under the Medicines Act 1968. At the time of first licensing, the product information warned of the occurrence of post-myelography arachnoiditis in some patients. At the time of the review of the product licence of right, that warning was strengthened. It is the responsibility of doctors who use a product to ensure that they are fully familiar with the benefits and risks of any procedure or treatment.

Potentially, any medicine may cause side effects which may be minor or more serious. The Committee on Safety of Medicines carefully monitors all issues of drug safety and, where necessary, provides advice to doctors, dentists and pharmacists. Prescribing information and advice about side effects is available to doctors in the data sheets of an individual product, which are issued by the manufacturer of the product, and in the British National Formulary which the Department provides to all prescribers.

The incidence of clinically significant arachnoiditis associated with Myodil myelography is difficult to assess but has been estimated to be approximately 1 per cent. However, the relative contribution of Myodil, compared to other factors also known to be associated with arachnoiditis, is less certain.

I am aware that legal proceedings are currently in progress between a substantial number of patients, who claim to have suffered damage as a result of the use of Myodil, and Glaxo, the manufacturers of this product. The Department—in this case the Medicines Control Agency—complied with a High Court Order for discovery of documents relating to Myodil in 1991 but has had no further involvement in the case. My hon. Friend will understand that, in view of the judicial proceedings, I am unable to comment further.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): In a general debate, it is interesting that all three major parties in the House are represented by their Front-Bench spokespersons. The reason for that is that we have received literally hundreds of letters from sufferers of arachnoiditis about the pain they are suffering and their inability to get adequate answers to the issues which have been raised.

On 25 March, I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health about a meeting of departmental officials, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Health, hon. Members on both sides of the House and representatives of the action group to see whether we could consider in detail some of the complaints that have been raised about the Department.

I have had no confirmation so far from the Department of an agreement in principle to the meeting. Perhaps the Minister will say before the debate concludes whether in principle the Department is agreed that the meeting should take place and, on that basis, when it is likely to take place.

Mr. Sackville: I can give the hon. Gentleman, and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne), an assurance that we shall arrange a meeting at a time of their convenience.

I shall now make some general comments about injuries sustained as a result of medical treatment. If a patient suffers injury as a result of medical treatment, he or she can go to court to claim compensation. If the claim is against the national health service, to be successful the patient must succeed in proving that there has been negligence on the part of the NHS.

Where a patient suffers an injury as a result of negligent care or treatment provided by the NHS, it is right that compensation should be paid to that patient. However, the individual who is accused of being negligent also has the right to defend his or her professional reputation. Unless the alleged negligent action is so obvious as to be beyond doubt, as in other walks of life, if the injured person wishes to pursue the case, the dispute is resolved through the courts.

In a case such as that concerning Myodil, the Government's position has always been that it is a matter to be resolved between the drug companies and individuals, if necessary through the courts.

Magnetic resonance imaging, known as MRI, is a relatively new method of imaging, which has come into clinical use over the past 10 years. It is a non-invasive technique that enables good images of spinal cavity to be obtained but differs from myelography in not using ionising radiation. In many situations, MRI will be a suitable alternative to a myelogram, but there will be some situations in which myelography is preferable. For instance, some patients are unable to tolerate the enclosed conditions which are a feature of MRI.

There are about 78 MRI units in England—the number has already grown—but these are not sufficient to take on the present myelography work load; so it would not be practical to discontinue myelography entirely. I am glad to remind my hon. Friend that the then Secretary of State for Health announced early in 1992 a three-year programme of capital funding for medical equipment, including whole body scanners. Several scanners were purchased for England in the financial year 1992-93, and we expect that rather more will be acquired in the current financial year.

Clincians associated with treatment of the spine would wish to avoid invasive procedures wherever possible, and consultants would not go along with it if there were always alternatives available. In the context of the current provision of MRI, clinicians have to consider for individual patients the balance between the risks of myelography and the risks of waiting for the availability of an MRI scan. The patient should be involved in that decision, through the process of securing informed consent.

[Mr. Sackville]

Patients are entitled to receive sufficient information in a way that they can understand about the proposed management, any possible alternatives and any substantial risks. Patients must then be allowed to decide whether they agree to the treatment. This important principle of achieving informed consent has been highlighted in the patients charter.

As part of the recent NHS reforms, hospitals are responsible for providing efficient and effective health services to meet the needs identified by Health Authorities. In this context, and against the background of the imperative to minimise doses of ionising radiation in diagnostic radiology, provider units will decide whether they will make MRI available. Conversely, health authorities as purchasers of health care will decide how best to use their resources in order to meet the needs of their population. If purchasers are not willing to purchase myelography, it is open to hospitals to provide MRI as an alternative.

It is a sad fact that people have been seriously affected by arachnoiditis—the exact causes of which may be uncertain in individual cases. There is no known cure for arachnoiditis, which can result in severe pain, and adequate pain relief should be an important part of treatment. Services specifically for the relief of pain are available in a number of hospitals.

To summarise, any invasive procedure in the spine carries a risk of causing arachnoiditis. Myelography is one such procedure, but an alternative—MRI—is becoming increasingly available. MRI can replace many invasive diagnostic procedures, including myelography, with the added advantage of avoiding ionising radiation. CT scanners were introduced about a decade before MRI and are now readily accessible; I hope that MRI will become similarly more accessible in the future.

I conclude by congratulating my hon. Friend on highlighting the problem and making more people familiar with the word. I take his point that warnings must be issued and that patients must be made aware of the degree of risk, which is uncertain but which exists.

When I started replying to letters on the subject, as a sufferer of back pain myself—although not of severe back pain—I realised how enormously distressing is the condition. It can dominate and even ruin people's lives. I hope that the programme of acquiring MRI scanners will accelerate and that—as my hon. Friend said—hospitals will take advantage of new flexibility in the way that they finance such acquisitions. I hope that the growth in the number of MRI scanners will help more people in future. Once again, I thank my hon. Friend for bringing the matter to the attention of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 15 April 1993

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

MIDLAND METRO BILL [Lords]
Read the Third time, and passed.

BRITISH WATERWAYS BILL [Lords] (By Order)

CROSSRAIL BILL (By Order)

EAST COAST MAIN LINE (SAFETY) BILL (By Order)

GREATER MANCHESTER (LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM) BILL [Lords] (By Order)

WOODGRANGE PARK CEMETERY BILL [Lords] (By Order)

RIVER HUMBER (UPPER BURCOM COOLING WORKS) BILL [Lords] (By Order)
Orders for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time on Thursday 22 April.

BRITISH RAILWAYS (NO. 4) BILL (By Order)
Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [8 February], That the Bill be now read a Second time.
Debate to be resumed on Thursday 22 April.

ELECTION EXPENSES

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, That she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the expenses of each candidate at the General Election of April 1992 in the United Kingdom as transmitted to the returning officers pursuant to the Representation of the People Act 1983, and of the number of votes polled by each candidate, the description of each candidate, the number of polling districts and stations, the number of electors, the number of postal votes and the number of rejected ballot papers.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Reform

1. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what impact he expects his proposals for police reform to have on the county of Cumbria.

5. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received to date on his proposed police reforms.

9. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on his recent proposals for the reform of police authorities.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): My proposals would improve the effectiveness and performance of the police forces in Cumbria and elsewhere and thereby improve the value for money that we get from them. I have so far received a few representations from hon. Members, members of the police service and others. I propose to issue a White Paper setting out the details of my proposals before the summer. I will continue to listen to the views of all those concerned with improving the performance of the police service.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why should meddling Conservative appointees appointed by the Secretary of State be appointed to the Cumbria police authority when they surely serve only to undermine the authority and the excellent work being done by our chief constable? Has the Home Secretary no faith in local institutions which can make adequate appointments and carry out the responsibilities that the public expect of them?

Mr. Clarke: I do not make appointments to public bodies for which I am responsible on a purely party political basis. The hon. Gentleman's question is indicative of the attitude of many Labour Members. When police authorities are mentioned, all that they can think about is whether they are of their own political persuasion. I have every confidence in the local delivery of police forces. That is why I intend to create stronger local authorities, whose presence will be more visible to the inhabitants of Cumbria. I will also give them more autonomy in handling resources from central Government. I will lift from the shoulders of the Cumbria police authority and others many of the detailed restraints currently imposed upon them by me and by the Home Office.

Mr. Evennett: I warmly welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's determination to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the police. However, I urge him to look again at the issue of London. Does he agree that London is different from the rest of the country in many ways and should, therefore, be treated differently in his reforms?

Mr. Clarke: There is a question about London further down the Order Paper which I shall answer. The answer to my hon. Friend's question is emphatically yes. He and many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have already made their views known to me informally about my first proposals. I accept that the Metropolitan police, who cover the capital city and parts of the surrounding counties, are quite different from the rest of the country. I will carefully consider representations about the nature of the new police authority which I propose to establish for the Metropolitan police.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there are a great many people who could be appointed to police authorities could bring a vast range of experience for whom serving as councillors or magistrates is not an option? Will he make it clear when he publishes his White Paper that he is looking not just for people with business experience but for people with experience in running police liaison panels, victim support schemes and crime prevention schemes?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In considering people to serve on a police authority, one must bear in mind that not every man or woman able to make a contribution in that way can also spare the time to be elected to the local county council or to sit in a local magistrates court. People who might want to sit on a police authority should not be judged, as the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) would judge them, on whether they are the right party political colour. [Interruption.] The Labour party's defence of local authority membership of police authorities is because, all too often, it sees local authority appointments to committees of this kind as a means of party patronage. We are concerned with strengthening the police authorities and improving the effectiveness of the police service. I hope that the Labour party will eventually take a more enlightened view of the undoubted need to strengthen the effectiveness of the police service.

Mr. Martlew: Earlier this year, the Cumbria police force axed four senior police posts and asked the Secretary of State if it could spend the money thus saved on seven constables, but he refused. Will he change his mind today and allow us to have extra police in Cumbria to fight the rising tide of crime?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. He has described the existing situation, and I regard that feature of it as positively daft. That is why, in my recent statement to the House, I announced my intention to change that situation so as to give far more discretion to the local police force to determine how it spends its resources and what balance it strikes between men and resources. We need stronger police authorities with unfettered discretion to handle money in that way and I propose to set them up. It is the normal instinct of the Labour party to be against any reform or change of any kind to any public service. I hope that at least this small detail of my reforms will get the hon. Gentleman's support.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the effectiveness of police reforms in ensuring that the police can combat crime better will be a matter not merely of organisation but of police operational priorities? Is he aware of the Audit Commission report which points out that 20 per cent. of police time was spent on administration and 25 per cent. on non-crime priorities such as traffic management? Should that not be investigated when the reform proposals are being considered so as to ensure that the police are more actively concerned in beating crime?

Mr. Clarke: It is important that we do, and the police service does, exactly what my hon. Friend proposes. We need to be clearer about what the priorities of the police service are, and what the local public expect of it. We then need to reflect those priorities in the disposition of manpower and resources in the locality and to measure performance in meeting the first priorities of the police service. For that reason, in addition to the White Paper that I am producing, I have other studies under way into exactly how we should prioritise the different duties imposed by the public on the police service. The service also needs to be better organised so that it can react to those priorities, dispose of its resources accordingly and then account to the local public and the general public for its performance.

Mr. Blair: Is not one part of an effective police service the provision of an efficient police and prison escort service to and from the courts? In relation to Group 4 Total Security Ltd., which has taken over certain police and prison functions, will the Secretary of State confirm that, in the past few days, not merely have four prisoners gone missing, but at Leicester prison Group 4 turned up with the wrong van and the wrong documentation and then could not get through to headquarters because the line was engaged? Is he aware that in Derby, court hearings have been delayed because prisoners have turned up late, in Nottingham, court hearings have been postponed because Group 4 vans have got lost in the city's one-way system and that yesterday, a Group 4 van carrying prisoners crashed into a police car outside a police station? Is it not about time the Secretary of State took a grip on his Department and the prison escort service and started to run a service with some regard to public safety rather than one that is like something out of an Ealing comedy?

Mr. Clarke: Escorts between prison and the courts are frequently an occasion for escapes. In the contract area of Group 4 alone, last year more than 50 prisoners escaped during escort—an average of more than one a week—but the Labour party took no interest whatever in that. It could not care less so long as prisoners are escaping from public sector workers. Suddenly, when a contract is taken out by Group 4, it pays attention to every crash of every vehicle, every escape of every prisoner and every slip on the paperwork. If we have aroused the Labour party's interest in the quality of the service provided when escorting between prison and court, we shall have made at least one modest advance. The fact is that the Labour party is obsessed simply with whether a driver belongs to the right trade union. Until it can lift its thoughts about the criminal justice system above that pathetic local Labour party executive committee level, it will have nothing to contribute on this front.

2. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to encourage devolved management within the police service.

6. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on his intentions to allow chief constables to manage their own budgets.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said in his statement on 23 March, he intends to give police authorities and police forces greater freedom to decide for themselves how best to spend their money.

Mr. Lidington: Is my hon. Friend aware that local management of police forces has been broadly welcomed in the Thames valley area by the police service and by the general public? Will he and his colleagues press on from that position and ensure that the performance indicators that he and the Home Secretary are now planning can be applied at local area level so that the public know that not just chief constables but area commanders are making proper and efficient use of resources committed to their stewardship?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We want to give more freedom to chief constables and police authorities to deploy the resources at their disposal, and that means devolving responsibility within police forces from headquarters to local units. National standards and objectives will be translated into local objectives which mean something to the local community and by which those local units can be measured.

Mrs. Gorman: My hon. Friend will not be surprised that in Billericay, where we are well known for our dedication to private enterprise and personal responsibility, the chief superintendent welcomes the moves announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, but will my chief superintendent be freer of paperwork imposed on him by the Home Office so that, instead of pushing paper, he can be out catching crooks? In addition, will he be able to subcontract out more of his detective work to the Maigrets and Miss Marples of this world?

Mr. Wardle: There will be greater freedom for chief officers to manage—that is the important thing—with much of that delegated to local level. We want to put the nearly £6,000 million a year spent on the police to the best possible use with as little red tape as possible. Where minor functions can be subcontracted, they will be, leaving the basic policing to the police.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister agree that the first principle of a proper arrangement for delegation is to recognise that it is the chief superintendent on the ground who has the best knowledge of the resources required to ensure effective policing locally? If so, will the Minister please stop sending hon. Members such as myself misleading replies about the actual reduction in police officers that has occurred in Greenwich? Will he ensure that the real representations made by local police and representatives of the community are met by a positive response to build up numbers to tackle crime effectively in Greenwich and elsewhere in south-east London?

Mr. Wardle: From what the hon. Gentleman says, I take it that he is in favour of the reform proposals, as it will then be up to the chief police officers themselves in the police authorities to decide precisely what the strength of their force should be within their cash-limited resources.

Mr. Battle: Will the Minister explain why, when chief officers have decided that resources should go local and have set up special urban crime schemes, such as those in my constituency in Armley and Bramley, when they have proved to be successful after a year of operation the Government withdraw the funding?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman will already have heard, if he has followed the proposals, that it will be up to the chief police officers to decide precisely how funding will be deployed. If there is a particular scheme on which a chief police officer wishes to place emphasis in any local area, he can so do. It will be up to the chief police officer and the police authority to determine priorities.

European Parliamentary Constituencies

3. Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the arrangements he intends to make for the additional European parliamentary constituencies.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): My right hon. and learned Friend is currently consulting colleagues on this matter. Once proposals are formulated, we will consult formally the Opposition parties.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the parliamentary boundary commissioners rightly enjoy an enviable reputation for impartiality? Will he ensure that a similar system is established to create the new constituencies, and give an assurance that twixt the initial announcement and implementation there will be ample time for representations to be made?

Mr. Lloyd: I can assure my hon. Friend on both points. We shall not necessarily use the boundary commissioners to propose the new boundaries, because they are very much occupied with the parliamentary boundaries, but we will want to have similarly independent recommendations for the new Euro-constituencies. We are determined that there will be an opportunity for public consultation, although it will be constrained by a comparatively tight timetable.

Mr. Trimble: The Minister will have seen press speculation that the additional seats will be available on a proportional representation basis in order to secure the votes of the Liberal Democrats for the Maastricht treaty. May we take it that there will be no question of adopting the single transferable vote system, or will the Minister follow the logic of that and tell his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that he should follow it, too?

Mr. Lloyd: I am always sceptical about reports in the newspapers. We will not announce our final proposals until they have been formulated. We will then discuss them with leaders of the Opposition parties.

Mr. Hicks: Does my hon. Friend agree that where areas are distinctive historic entities, such as Cornwall, there is a case for making them Euro-constituencies in their own right rather than the present situation of unholy alliances?

Mr. Lloyd: I think that the basis on which we want to make the new Euro-constituencies is a traditional one. We want Euro-seats of comparatively the same size in terms of population, but taking into account geography and other local connections. No doubt the body making recommendations will bear those thoughts in mind.

Mr. Allen: The Government are clearly afraid that their own Back Benchers will do to the European boundaries Bill what they are trying to do to the Maastricht Bill. Will the Minister take the opportunity to allay the suspicions of the House that the European constituencies will be redrawn not by the independent and much-respected boundary commissions, but by a hand-picked group of Home Office officials, with all the potential for gerrymandering that that allows? With the next European election so close, the House has a right to know when the Bill will be brought before it.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman obviously prepared his question before he came into the Chamber because I have already dealt with it. I said that the new Euro-constituency boundaries would be recommended by an independent body. I also said that we would be discussing the way forward and the timetable with the Opposition parties.

Criminal Justice Act 1991

4. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had from magistrates about the workings of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): The representations I have received from magistrates about the Act have covered concerns about the unit fines scheme and matters relating to sentencing under section 29.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that many magistrates in my constituency will be delighted by the assurances given in the House yesterday by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that he is prepared to look at the workings and non-workings of the Criminal Justice Act 1991—particularly in relation to unit fining, which appears to be fine in principle but in practice is working more as a punishment for wealth than one for crime?

Some courts are not able to look at the whole career of a particular criminal before passing sentence. It seems that the system is working to protect the very people we are trying to clobber—the persistent offenders. Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that he will look urgently at the possibility of removing the magistrates from the handcuffs that they are currently wearing, so that we can put the handcuffs on the people who deserve to have them put on —the persistent offenders?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend articulates the feeling of many of our hon. Friends about the Criminal Justice Act 1991. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary made it clear at the Dispatch Box yesterday that he intends—and he has my full support—to look hard at some of the problems with unit fines and also at section 29. However, may I say to my hon. Friend, with the same vigour as he put his point to me, that I hope that he will ask magistrates to look carefully at the flexibility that already exists under the unit fines scheme, which enables magistrates to meet their criticisms of the present system.

Mr. Canavan: Have there been any complaints about the criminal justice system breaking down after the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr Blair) about the failure of the privatised prisoner escort service? After the fiasco of the so-called Group 4 security system, will the Minister admit that the privatisation experiment has been a failure, or does he intend to tell us that it is all part of the Government's plan to reduce the prison population?

Mr. Jack: Hearing questions like that is like watching the dinosaurs come back to life. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. As my right hon. and learned Friend said, the fact that prisoners escape is not a new phenomenon, but the dialogue of the deaf opposite did not listen to that salient point. Only now, when a new company running a new and complex service takes over those responsibilities, for which there is a very good reason, do the Opposition take any interest. I ask the hon. Gentleman to watch developments.

Sir Anthony Grant: Does my hon. Friend agree, however, that we got the principle of unit fines and previous convictions fundamentally and absolutely wrong? Is it possible that we got it wrong because at that time hon. Members on both sides of the House were obsessed with the change of Prime Minister?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend brings his own particular analysis to bear on how we got ourselves into this particular situation. The Criminal Justice Act had a long run-in, during which people could have contributed to the debate. There was a consultation document in 1988, a White Paper and a long parliamentary debate. Eventually, the House agreed the measure which came before it. It is important now to concentrate on the positive side and on our assurance that we are looking both at section 29 and at unit fines and that, if necessary, changes will be made.

Juvenile Crime

7. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps he will take to counter juvenile crime.

Mr. Jack: The Government's measures to deal with juvenile crime will be further extended by the contents of my right hon. and learned Friend's statement to the House on 2 March, which commits us to developing new policies to deal with persistent juvenile offenders.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that the problem is not so much the growth in the number of juvenile offenders as in the number of persistent offenders? In Leicestershire, for example, 28 persistent offenders have committed 2,057 offences—73 offences each—in the past 18 months. It is obvious, therefore, that the courts do not have the power to deal with juvenile crime as they should and that there is no way in which the Government are helping parents, governors of schools, teachers and others to cope with persistent juvenile offenders.

Mr. Jack: The hon. and learned Gentleman's enthusiasm to put his point to us is a ringing endorsement of the contents of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's statement. That is the whole thrust of what the secure training order is all about. It deals with matters connected with education, offending behaviour and training for the outside world. Juvenile crime in the hon. and learned Gentleman's part of Leicestershire is also being combated by our safer cities initiative and by many of the diversion projects, such as the north Braunston motor project. That is helping to alleviate some of the problems caused by young people and to deal positively with their potential entry into criminality.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are surplus places for juvenile delinquents in special residential schools? Will he amend the secure accommodation regulations and tell magistrates, town halls and parents to send more juvenile delinquents to those special schools?

Mr. Jack: With his usual astuteness, my hon. Friend has been studying the contents of my right hon. and learned Friend's statement. He will have seen reference in it to making various orders with a requirement for secure accommodation to be used. That is certainly something which we shall be considering.

Mr. Michael: Why does the Minister rely on the Home Secretary's statement which looks to the distant future when we need to speed up justice and to intervene earlier with young offenders in particular now if we are to be tough on crime and the causes of crime? As the Home Secretary has admitted that there is a relationship between unemployment and crime, will he persuade his Cabinet colleagues to restore hope to young people and to recognise the impact of other Government policies on them? Will they recognise especially that the way in which the Government are forcing cuts on the youth service will increase the number of idle hands for which the devil will find employment?

Mr. Jack: The reason I rely on the statement is because it is a darn good statement. It was made by my right hon. and learned Friend and I feel that it is important to rely on it. I wholly rebut the hon. Gentleman's allegation that my right hon. and learned Friend made the connection that his question begged. I recommend that the hon. Gentleman reads again the Home Office research by Simon Field in which he will not find a proven connection between individual wrongdoing and the level of economic activity. There is no split between us. I also point out that the hon. Gentleman's question did not acknowledge the work being undertaken by the Department for Education to deal with the relationship between crime, truancy and exclusion.

Mr. Hawksley: Has my hon. Friend had time today to read about the case of the 17-year-old who was before the courts yesterday in Birmingham and found guilty of attending the stealing of a car with a young girl who was killed? Does he realise that that youngster was already on bail for the offences of rape and kidnap? What are we going to do to ensure that such people are not allowed out to endanger lives in future?

Mr. Jack: We very much understand the strong feelings on the subject of bail. A great deal of work is being undertaken to reconsider not only our policies in that connection but the effectiveness of the working of the bail system. It is very important that, for example, our bail study information groups come up with recommendations to improve the quality of the bail decision-making process. I very much understand my hon. Friend's point.

Security Services

8. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the Home Affairs Committee's first report of Session 1992-93 on accountability of the security services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government will publish their response shortly.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Home Secretary aware that we hope that he will accept the recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee that the security service should be subject to proper parliamentary scrutiny? If other countries, no less democratic than our own, have decided over a period of time to have such scrutiny, why should this country be an exception? Is it not the case that the sooner the security services are subject to proper scrutiny, the better it will be?

Mr. Clarke: I gave my views to the Home Affairs Select Committee and they have not changed from those in the evidence that I then gave. The important issue of parliamentary accountability will be dealt with again by the House when we debate the Bill relating to the secret intelligence service and GCHQ, which the Government have announced they intend to introduce in due course. We shall then have a proper and serious debate about how the security service can be subject to some accountability without damaging its operational effectiveness.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that we already have a commissioner for the security service for which I am responsible and he has just produced a report for this year. There is also a commissioner who regulates our use of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. I commend both commissioners' reports to the hon. Gentleman because they, like me, are satisfied that the security service is acting only for the purposes for which it is intended to act and within the strict legal constraints that legislation places on it.

Crime (London)

10. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next expects to meet the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to discuss the level of crime in the capital.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to meet the Commissioner.

Sir Michael Neubert: Can my hon. Friend confirm that he is aware of the concern of my constituents and many like them about the relatively small number of criminals who are caught and charged and, of those who are apprehended, the less than satisfactory number who are convicted and adequately sentenced? Can he give my constituents some reassurance that the challenge of crime will continue to be tackled with the vigour and rigour that it demands?

Mr. Wardle: I understand the concern that my hon. Friend expresses; no doubt he will be pleased to hear that Operation Bumblebee—[HON. MEMBERS: "Bunglebee"]. Operation Bumblebee, which is a very successful operation, has recently been launched in the Romford area. My hon. Friend will also be aware that sector policing is proving successful in the Romford area, and no doubt he will welcome the fact that there is a dedicated anti-burglary squad there, too, whose clear-up rate is better than the metropolitan average. No doubt he will also welcome the fact that 6,000 uniformed posts have been added to the Metropolitan police since 1979.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister appreciate that he has already devised a new name for Group 4? Leaving that aside, does he agree that the best form of crime prevention in London is that devised by local authorities working in co-operation with the police, which will take place only if we have a proper accountable police force in London under local authority control, such as exists in all other local democracies? Why are the Government the only people now holding out against that proposal?

Mr. Wardle: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the answer is more local authority control he should realise that that would simply lead to a whole lot of political posturing. He ought to await eagerly my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals for a new police authority for London which will genuinely increase accountability and support the work being done by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Sir John Wheeler: Will my hon. Friend confirm that when the Home Secretary meets the new Commissioner of the Metropolitan police he will ask him to ensure that there is a clearly stated policy within the Metropolitan police area for the control of burglary and auto crime, and that the small minority of offenders who persistently commit large numbers of such offences is targeted?

Mr. Wardle: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend will discuss that priority with the Commissioner. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) will also appreciate that the new Commissioner has set out plans to release 700 officers from headquarters unit out into local units within Greater London in order to tackle precisely the problems that my right hon. Friend describes.

Police Authority (London)

11. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the proposed police authority for London; and if he will make a statement.

14. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future political control of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have already received representations about that subject from a large number of hon. Members. As I announced on 23 March, I propose to establish new police authority arrangements for the Metropolitan police. I will develop my proposals in more detail over the next few months and set out more details when I publish my White Paper.

Mr. Carrington: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the size and complexity of London means that the Metropolitan police have to be controlled differently from the way in which other police forces are controlled? Does he accept that, however unsatisfactory it may be for the Metropolitan police to be controlled by the Home Office, the establishment in London of a police authority along the lines of police authorities elsewhere is not the solution?

Mr. Clarke: I think that London needs a police authority and that the arrangement whereby the Home Secretary is in theory the police authority for London is not adequate if we are to hold the Metropolitan police to account, as happens with other police authorities, and if, as I have said in answer to previous questions, we are to assist them by giving clearer guidelines on priorities and so on. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is no good regarding the Metropolitan police force as if it were just another provincial police force. It is much bigger and has many special duties connected with being in the capital. It certainly should not simply be handed over to local government as the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) suggests. Considerable thought about the sort of police authority that London needs is necessary.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many of us feel that there was far too little consultation on the matter before he announced his proposal? We feel that greater London has special problems—it is the seat of government and has a huge diplomatic community—and special arrangements should be made for it, but we remain to be convinced of the need for the new proposals.

Mr. Clarke: With respect to my hon. Friend, the purpose of making the statement was to have a consultation process and to listen to the views of my hon. Friend and of many other people who have an interest in the Metropolitan police service. In modern times, the Government spend their entire time consulting on proposals, which is a good thing; I have no doubt that in the end it tends to improve the quality of decision taking. We are getting so used to leaks, guesses and misreporting in the newspapers that it is thought quite improper if the Minister ever says anything by way of announcement of intentions without having talks with the world and his wife about it first. I have now put out my proposals for consultation and I will set them out in more detail in the light of what my hon. Friend and others have already said to me when, in the summer, I produce a White Paper that will pave the way for further discussions.

Mr. Tony Banks: Many of us welcome the proposals by the Secretary of State for a new police authority for London, although we would clearly wish to go that much further than he. Nevertheless, it is a welcome step. Can he tell the House his thoughts so far about the basis on which elected councillors will go on to the police authority? Since he did not answer the question when he made his original statement, what thoughts does he have about the future of the City of London police force within the compass of the new London authority?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman and I are agreed that London needs a police authority and that it is time to change the arrangements whereby the Home Secretary is the police authority. Remembering the hon. Gentleman's record on the Greater London council and the many things that he has said about police over the years, I very much doubt that it will turn out that we agree on anything else at all on this subject. I am now considering the membership of the police authority and listening to all views from all sides, and I will announce my proposals in more detail when I produce the White Paper. I have no proposals to make at the moment about the City of London police.

Mr. Maclennan: Recognising that the Home Secretary's authority has not always covered itself in glory in protecting members of the diplomatic community and the royal family in the past, can he assure us that further contracting-out groups such as have been active earlier this week in safeguarding prisoners will not be given responsibility for either the diplomatic community or the royal family?

Mr. Clarke: I am happy to have the opportunity to assure the hon. Gentleman that I have no intention whatever of contracting out or placing in private hands fundamental police duties that require the powers of a constable. Reports to that effect in the newspapers are completely wrong. I do not believe that it is a proper use of a trained police officer to sit in a taxi handcuffed to a harmless prisoner who is being conducted from prison to a court, which is what most court escorting services amount to.

At the moment, under the old arrangements, large numbers of prisoners appear to escape, and the present rate of escape is not out of the ordinary. I hope that we shall make the service more effective by concentrating on its provision by a specialist service. I also trust that we shall release police and prison service manpower for more important duties—tackling crime and looking after prisoners.

It is absurd for the Liberals to join the Labour party in its obsession with saying that the most trivial tasks of a policeman or a prison officer must continue to be done by a public sector employee because that is what the public sector trade unions keep demanding.

Unit Fines

12. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the workings of the unit fine system; and if he will consider proposals for change.

Mr. Jack: We are monitoring the operation of the unit fine scheme carefully. We are taking very seriously concerns expressed about the working of the system in certain cases, and are considering how these concerns can best be met.

Mr. Steen: I wonder whether the Minister has heard the story of the little 83-year-old lady who lives on her own in south Devon and who inadvertently forgot to renew her television licence. She was fined £800 and eight units, because she had a disposable income of more than £5,000 a year. In the same court, a younger woman who committed exactly the same offence and who had a disposable income of under £5,000 a year was fined eight units and only £32. While Conservative Members are entirely for change for the better, we are opposed to change for change's sake. Can the Minister tell the House today that he will make some improvement that is more equitable, which Conservative Members will support entirely?

Mr. Jack: I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution to the debate on how we might study and improve the operation of the unifying scheme. He was kind enough to bring to the Home Office some of his local magistrates who made a singular and helpful contribution to our discussions. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), magistrates make the decision in assessing the value of units; it is a judicial decision. If there is information that they wish to question, they have the right so to do.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Why does not the Minister recognise the depth of feeling among magistrates about the unit system? It is undermining the discretion of local justices and leading to absurd fines. Recently in Gwent, a young unemployed youth was fined more than £1,000 for dropping a crisp packet. Although we may condemn litter louts, that seems a bit out of proportion and brings the whole system into disrepute.

Mr. Jack: On 4 May, we shall meet the Magistrates Association which will give it an opportunity to join in our work. The case that the hon. Gentleman mentioned resulted from somebody not filling in the means inquiry form. In those circumstances, an individual, under present arrangements, can go back to the court and ask for the matter to be reconsidered.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Cousins: Does the Prime Minister agree first, that the supply of weapons to the states of the former Yugoslavia should be choked off and not increased and secondly, that arms and equipment dealers who may wish to dabble there, and their friends, no matter how well connected, will not find a safe haven in Great Britain?

The Prime Minister: The whole House views with dismay and despair the slaughter in the whole of Bosnia which we see daily on our television screens. For that reason, we have sought over the past few months, not least at the London conference and in a variety of other ways, to play our part in the international community in trying to bring an end to that particular conflict. I share the hon. Gentleman's view about the need to damp down and not to increase the supply of arms.

Q2. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Arnold: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Staff for calling a strike for tomorrow and on other days which will be damaging to passengers, especially my constituents, and which could put in danger other people's jobs? What would my right hon. Friend do if his transport spokesman backed the strike? Would he back him or sack him?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the latest strike by the RMT will cause further hardship to the travelling public and that it will damage British Rail's finances. That does not safeguard jobs in rail or elsewhere; it actually puts jobs in rail and elsewhere at risk. It is an utterly pointless strike. It is a throwback to the 1960s and it deserves the support of no one. It certainly does not have my support and it does not have the support of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I regret that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) supports the strike. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition does not and I hope that he will take appropriate action.

Mr. John Smith: The right hon. Gentleman will recollect that just before Easter, he assured me during Prime Minister's Question Time that the Government were prepared to widen and to intensify sanctions against Serbia. In view of the appalling slaughter at Srebrenica, will the Prime Minister tell us what action the Government have taken since then?

The Prime Minister: I certainly stand by the remark I made to the House before Easter. We are keen both to widen and to deepen the sanctions against Serbia. To do that we need the complete support of our allies in the Security Council and elsewhere. I expect that a suitable resolution will be passed in the United Nations this month, but I cannot guarantee in advance of that the support of all other members, which is necessary to ensure that we have that resolution. The British position is clear. We wish to have that resolution as speedily as possible. We should have welcomed it today.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister recognise that even the existing sanctions are not being enforced adequately so that there is no real let or hindrance put upon the Serbs and their present barbarous behaviour? Instead of the Security Council resolution being delayed until towards the end of the month, ought not the British Government be urging that it be brought forward so that the international community can take effective action?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated delicately to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that is the position of the British Government, but we would not get it through the Security Council at this moment for reasons that the right hon. and learned Gentleman can well understand. One of the permanent members would not be likely to support it now, but will be later this month. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows who and why.

Mr. John Smith: Does not the Prime Minister understand that there is really deep anger and concern in Britain about the fact that the slaughter at Srebrenica is a daily affair? Ought there not to be more urgency than this leisurely diplomatic pace?

The Prime Minister: Let me say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that neither he nor anyone else has a monopoly of concern or conscience about the matter. His concern is shared throughout the House and the country. No one doubts that. The question at issue is what we can do, how best we can do it and what options will most successfully help to bring an end to the slaughter. In achieving that, we need the support of the other members of the Security Council and the international community. We have been seeking to obtain it for a variety of measures and we shall continue to do so. In the meantime, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will need no reminding of the leading role that Britain has taken in providing humanitarian aid and in the search for a diplomatic settlement. We were the first nation to put a substantial number of troops into Bosnia and to help people facing great difficulties through the winter.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, contrary to the advice of the armchair generals and pseudo-defence experts, all suggestions of substantial military action in the Bosnian region should be totally resisted as in that terrain it would lead to guerrilla warfare and substantial loss of life among British service men and women and those of other countries, and would make no contribution whatsoever towards an early resumption of peace talks and a settlement of the problem?

The Prime Minister: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes and agree with him. We are seeking a diplomatic means of ending the fighting. That is the only credible way forward for the international community. Other issues have been considered and discussed, but they involve substantial disadvantages. Many of them were cogently set out to the House yesterday by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Ashdown: The key question is whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to see Srebrenica fall into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has shared for a long time the concern that everyone in the House feels about the issue. What he has never done is suggest a way—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]—I will answer the question in my own way. The right hon. Gentleman has never suggested a way in which we could physically prevent military action. If the right hon. Gentleman is saying that we should put British troops on the ground in Bosnia, will he please say so directly or stop implying it?

Mr. Roger Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the respect of the public and parents for the teaching profession was not enhanced by the conduct of certain people at the National Union of Teachers conference last week, and that the proper way to restore public confidence in the education system and testing is the Government's review and not a campaign of sabotage?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend about that. The concern that we have in education policy is to improve the quality of education and the success of all our children as they go through their schooling. I believe that the remark of the president of the NUT that the union's aim was "to annihilate the tests" was a disgrace. I hope that no right hon. or hon. Member in the House will give any houseroom to that sort of attitude.

Q3. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Is the Prime Minister aware of the increasing concern among the lower paid and many other people about the proposed increase in domestic fuel prices from April 1994? If so, what advice would he offer to those people who face massive bill increases in the winters of 1994 and 1995? Would he advise them to leave the heat on, turn it down or switch it off?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have made it clear on a number of occasions that we will provide substantial extra help for people in particular need; we will announce the details of that in good time and the increases will take effect before any increases in the fuel charges. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman might give me a straight answer at some stage as to whether he agrees with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) when he called for an increase in value added tax.

Q4. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Oppenheim: Bearing in mind the importance attributed to manufacturing by many, if not all, people, does my right hon. Friend recollect that manufacturing output fell under the last Labour Government, whereas, during the 1980s, Britain enjoyed the fastest growth in manufacturing output of any major European country and that manufacturing productivity in Britain during the 1980s rose faster than in any other major industrial country in the world? Do recent figures show that conditions are now in place to resume and build on that progress in the 1990s?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend clearly knows, the figures released yesterday show manufacturing output sharply up. They underline the fact that our manufacturers are taking advantage of the present opportunities. I very much welcome that. We need a strong and successful manufacturing industry. What we need to see is an industrial renaissance, not the propping up of lame ducks. The fact that we now have the lowest interest rates in the Community, very low inflation and a competitive exchange rate gives our industries and our exporters in particular every opportunity of growing, investing, expanding, and seeking and achieving success in the 1990s.

Mr. Hardy: The Prime Minister mentioned tests. Does he accept that the testing of English proposed for this year is so outrageously flawed that not only the test should be withdrawn but the present direction of the Department for Education should be withdrawn as well?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the principle behind the hon. Gentleman's question. I think that there is no doubt that the tests are the key to raising standards, as our main competitors around the world have shown. It is a straightforward matter of common sense. Without tests, teachers cannot identify pupils' weaknesses and cannot tackle them, parents cannot hold schools to account for their children's progress and the Government would not know what was happening in the schools. [Interruption.] I am sorry that Opposition Members do not find the importance of education and tests a matter for seriousness.

The National Institute for Economic and Social Research found that, at middle and lower ability, pupils in England learnt less than their contemporaries in France, Germany and Japan. That cannot be satisfactory to us and it cannot be satisfactory to teachers. It is vital that we have those tests so that we can identify those weaknesses, find out what the children have not understood and have not learnt and then take action to put it right. Hiding those tests and the results of them is no way to help our children in schools.

Q5. Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jones: Against the background of the scandals surrounding the European bank for reconstruction and development, and persistent reports of fraud involving the common agricultural policy and other European funds, is it not a matter for congratulation that the British Government, at any rate, have made a high priority of proper discussion of, and attention to, the reports of the European Court of Auditors? Will my right hon. Friend read up on his efforts in that direction? In particular, when he has a chance to have a word with Chancellor Kohl will he ask him why the Germans are not so keen as we are on discussing this sort of fraud?

The Prime Minister: There is no doubt that the United Kingdom has taken the lead in action against fraud both in the agreements that we reached at Maastricht and on other occasions when European leaders have met. We have done that in the past and we will continue to do that in future.

Q6. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hoyle: Despite the Prime Minister's boasting about the engineering industry, has he not seen the Engineering Employers Federation report published today which suggests that engineering imports will rise twice as fast as exports? How will that balance of payments crisis help the country? Does it not once more show how far engineering manufacturing industry has declined due to the mismanagement of the economy by his Government?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is right about that. He needs to concentrate, as we are concentrating, on the opportunity that we have to expand and improve the industrial and manufacturing base as a result of the policies that we put in place, which are now clearly becoming successful. I regret that Opposition Members do not like that success, but it is becoming more evident week after week.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 19 APRIL—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 21st day.

TUESDAY 20 APRIL—Opposition day (11th allotted day). There will be a debate described as "Bringing stability to the nation's schools" on an Opposition motion.

Proceedings on the Charities Bill [Lords], the Clean Air Bill [Lords] and the Radioactive Substances Bill [Lords], all of which are consolidation measures.

Motion on the Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland) Order.

WEDNESDAY 21 APRIL—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 22nd day.

THURSDAY 22 APRIL—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 23rd day.

FRIDAY 23 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 26 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

Mrs. Beckett: I thank the Leader of the House for that statement. Does he recall that on several occasions lately we have pressed him for the defence estimates debate—a debate which has not been held for two years? He will recall that just before the recess the issue was raised with him at business questions. That was most unfortunately followed speedily by the Ministry of Defence publishing a written answer in which some redundancies from the Navy were announced. The conjunction of a request for a Navy day debate and the defence estimates debate with such an announcement was most marked and will cause great anger on both sides of the House, so may I remind the Leader of the House of the need for both debates?

May I also remind the Leader of the House that we still have no undertaking from him or his colleagues about the debate on public expenditure. The issue to which my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) has just drawn attention—the forecast of the emergence of a twin deficit, with growing deterioration of the trade gap—highlights the implications of public expenditure and makes the need for that debate all the more urgent.

May I further press the Leader of the House for a full foreign affairs debate, in the light not only of the situation in Bosnia, apart from the military implications, but of the deteriorating situation in South Africa? May I remind him also that we seek a debate in Government time on the stocktaking in Scotland.

Mr. Newton: Hon. Members have become familiar recently with that type of long shopping list from the right hon. Lady. She did not add the only one that I have been able to meet this week, which is the demand for an Opposition Supply day. Given that I have again proved my desire to be helpful by putting that in the programme for next week, I hope the right hon. Lady accepts that I remain anxious to be as helpful as I can on as many as possible of the subjects that she raised. But I cannot hold out the immediate prospect of providing everything she wants.

I note particularly the point the right hon. Lady made about the defence estimates, although I assure her that there was nothing sinister in the coincidence of the different statements to which she referred.

On the subject of public expenditure, I reiterate the point that I have made several times, that, as I announced today, we are about to embark on debating the Finance Bill. I imagine that some of the issues that she has in mind will, subject to the decision of the Chair, be in order in the course of those debates.

Sir John Hannam (Exeter): Will my right hon. Friend find time soon for a further debate on the social chapter so as to expose the sham of the position of the Labour party and those who claim that the social chapter would be good for British business?

Mr. Newton: The House will be aware that the Chairman of Ways and Means has provisionally selected new clause 75 to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, which provides for just such a debate as my hon. Friend is seeking on the social chapter, following the passage of the Bill. In view of what my hon. Friend said, it may be sensible for me to announce that the Government think that a debate of that kind would be a sensible proposition. It may be helpful for me to say that, if that debate takes place, as may happen next week, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will indicate the Government's willingness to accept that new clause.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Despite the desire of the House occasionally for masochism, if, as seems possible, next week's debate in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill finishes before the end of Thursday, will the Leader of the House consider providing time to debate whether we should support or oppose the European Community proposal for a carbon tax, given that Energy and Environment Ministers will meet on Friday of next week?

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's request. I cannot promise to accede to it should the contingency arise, but I look forward to his help, which I took was implied in his question, in making sure that rapid progress is made on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): In view of the fact that the most serious of all European events at present is taking place in the Balkans and that we have never had a full day's debate in Government time devoted exclusively—I choose my words carefully—to the war in the Balkans, may I ask my right hon. Friend to think again and provide a day next week, or at least firmly promise a day the week after?

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot give that specific promise, though it is fair for me to remind my hon. Friend, whose concern in these matters is well known, that I have on at least one occasion that he will remember well—perhaps that is why he was choosing his words carefully—gone out of my way to provide him with a substantial opportunity to take part in a debate on those matters. Also, I readily arranged yesterday with the Secretary of State for Defence for a full statement on Bosnia, which again gave my hon. Friend an opportunity to give some of the important views that he holds on the subject.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Will the Leader of the House find time for the House to discuss the powers of the DSS, especially to provide children with grants for school uniforms? I ask that in the light of the position in Wolverhampton, where the right hon. Gentleman's Conservative colleagues running the council have found in necessary, despite spending at the cap, to withdraw grants from children in need. Requests referred to the DSS have been refused because the DSS says that it does not have power to make such grants. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that state of affairs ill becomes the Conservative party's view of Britain being at ease with itself? It smacks more of words than actions.

Mr. Newton: The Secretary of State for Social Security will be answering questions within the span of the statement to which I referred—on Monday 26 April—and I shall draw his attention to the fact that the hon. Gentleman may have a point to raise with him.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the appropriate Minister to make a statement to the House about tendering procedures in the national health service? Is he aware that, in Macclesfield, Mediguard Services Ltd. has lost its contract to Pall Mall Services Group Ltd. and that as a result, due apparently to some EC regulation, the employees of Mediguard are being denied their rightful redundancy pay, and some have been taken on by the new contractor at lower rates of pay? Is that the caring face of Conservatism in which we on this side of the House believe?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not expect me to comment off the cuff on the circumstances that he described, but I will bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): If the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill is completed before the commencement of business next Thursday, will the Leader of the House give an assurance that the Report proceedings will not commence without a proper interval after the completion of the Committee stage?

Mr. Newton: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's question interrelates with that asked earlier by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). If the European Communities (Amendment) Bill completes its Committee stage on Wednesday, it is rather unlikely that I would expect it to proceed to Report on Thursday.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on remedies available to the courts for the treatment of violent young offenders? My right hon. Friend will no doubt have seen national publicity about an elderly pensioner, a constituent of mine, who will be 100 years of age on Sunday and who was savagely beaten up by a young thug earlier this week. Does he agree that remedies presently available to the courts are unsatisfactory and urgently need reviewing? Is he aware that my constituents and many people throughout the country believe that corporal punishment ought to be available to the courts to use in appropriate circumstances, but that they are prevented from imposing it by the European Convention on Human Rights so enthusiastically signed by the Labour party?

Mr. Newton: Unhappily, I was unable to be present at Home Office questions earlier, but I would be surprised if similar issues were not raised then. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is well aware of national concern, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) will know that my right hon. and learned Friend is working on new proposals for dealing with juvenile offenders, and I am sure that he will take note of my hon. Friend's points. I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members will want to express their horror at that appalling crime against a very elderly lady.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I note that a Northern Ireland order is to be considered next week. Can a statement be made on the delay in forthcoming Northern Ireland legislation? I have been a member of the House for 11 years and have been waiting for something in the nature of a children order all that time. A roads order is coming, and we have been pressing since 1983 for a residential parking order, which we are told cannot be introduced.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a statement, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is due to answer questions in the House today week.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): My right hon. Friend will not be surprised if I ask why no time has been made available next week for the Report stage and Third Reading of the National Lottery etc. Bill. Surely the House is overindulging itself with the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. The Committee stage of the lottery Bill was completed six weeks ago today, and my right hon. Friend may be aware that the Government are advertising the appointment of an adviser to the Department of National Heritage. Surely it is time to put the rest of the bricks in place.

Mr. Newton: I am aware of my hon. Friend's concern, which he has assiduously expressed on several occasions during recent business questions. I do not accept that the business that I have announced could be described as over-indulgent, for I am sure that the House wants to make progress with the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. I seriously note my hon. Friend's concern, and perhaps I may more light-heartedly take his as a further suggestion for business that could be considered on Thursday, were time to become available.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): This autumn the Chancellor will introduce a so-called integrated Budget. That decision has never been debated in the House and the proposal is less progressive than it looks. Surely the House should have an opportunity to discuss such an important change in our financial control arrangements.

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Gentleman may be wrong in saying that that has not been debated in the House, but it would certainly have been before my time as Leader of the House. As I told his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), I would have thought that it might be possible for the hon. Gentleman, subject to your discretion, Madam Speaker, to make observations on that matter during the debate on the Finance Bill.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): It will be clear to my right hon. Friend from questions today and yesterday that an increasing number of hon. Members are dissatisfied at the stance of the western powers on Bosnia. May I again press my right hon. Friend for an early debate on the apparent ineffectiveness of sanctions and diplomacy in dealing with evil murderers and systematic rapists?

[Mr. David Nicholson]

Mr. Newton: I well understand the concern in all parts of the House about what is happening. That is why I arranged for a statement yesterday and no doubt why many of today's exchanges with the Prime Minister also focused on the issue. I do not in any way dismiss the concern of my hon. Friend and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who raised the matter earlier. However, I cannot add to what I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South about further debate.

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): In view of the growing concern throughout England and Wales about the potential threat to public health from the growing number of disconnections by the privatised water companies, would the Leader of the House find time for a debate on debt and disconnection in the water industry before Scotland suffers the same disastrous consequences of privatisation that we are experiencing in this country?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to provide time for such a debate, nor do I see how it could be in order on the Finance Bill—on which I have fallen back once or twice in the course of questions. I shall make sure that the hon. Lady's point is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friends to whom it should be directed.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Can my right hon. Friend find an early opportunity to discuss the defence estimates and the Royal Navy? He may be surprised to know that three quarters of my constituents are affected by moves away or redundancy which will cost the Exchequer an additional £800 million that will not be repaid this century by any sort of savings. The House needs to look at the defence estimates, which seem to be going up, despite the number of people who are being made redundant.

Mr. Newton: I note that my hon. Friend has come in behind, as it were, the right hon. Member for Derby South (Mrs. Beckett) on a matter that is undoubtedly important. I shall certainly seek to find time for it when I can make an opportunity available. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the extremely vigorous and energetic way in which he has represented the interests of his constituents in these matters for a long time.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On the subject of the Finance Bill, and given the importance of the oil tax changes that were proposed in the Budget, with up to 10,000 jobs at stake according to the Government but up to 30,000 at stake according to the industry, may I ask the Leader of the House whether he accepts that it would be appropriate to debate the Finance Bill in a Committee of the whole House? That would enable the maximum number of hon. Members, many of whom perhaps did not appreciate the importance of the measures in the Budget debate, to vote against these damaging Treasury proposals.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the arrangements for determining which parts of the Finance Bill are used to be taken in a Committee of the whole House are normally discussed through the usual channels. I am sure that those important elements of the usual channels who are present will have taken note of the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): Will the Leader of the House bring the appropriate Minister here so that we can have a debate on the proposed robbery of the British Coal superannuation scheme, as that proposal is so important to the people who will be affected by it?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to accept for one moment his description, but I draw his attention to the fact that the President of the Board of Trade will be here next Wednesday to answer questions.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we have an early debate on the circulation of racist and anti-semitic literature through the post? In particular, has the attention of the Leader of the House been drawn to a document, which is a peculiarly offensive and filthy forgery, that is circulating by the thousand in London? It purports to come from a synagogue and contains invented quotations from the Talmud, attacking the Christian religion. As it is equal in its cunning to "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion", and as intelligent people are believing its content and attacking the Jewish communities for having produced it when it is a fascist forgery, may we at least have a statement from the Home Secretary denouncing it as the forgery that it most certainly is?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to warn me that he would seek to raise the matter. I need hardly say that that is always helpful, if only because it enables me to be more constructive in my answers than I might otherwise be.

This seems to me to be an offensive anti-semitic document, which the House will deplore. The law on incitement to racial hatred is contained, as the hon. and learned Gentleman will well know, in part III of the Public Order Act 1986. Prosecutions under it can be made in England and Wales only by, or with the consent of, the Attorney-General. However, responsibility for the investigation of complaints about material likely to incite racial hatred rests with the police as part of their general duties in the enforcement of criminal law. In view of the responsibilities of the Crown prosecution service in advising on prosecutions, I should make it clear that I would be happy to arrange to send a copy of the material to the Director of Public Prosecutions. I hope that that answer is helpful to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware of the tragic incident that occurred at the last meeting of the Cambridgeshire hunt 10 days or two weeks ago. Many of my constituents were present when young Thomas Woreby was killed at the hunt. Given that, while ever there are hunts, there will be violence because young people will try to prevent wild animals from being torn to pieces in the name of sport, will the Leader of the House initiate an early debate on fox hunting?

Mr. Newton: There have been a number of violent incidents in or near my constituency as well, so I understand why the hon. Lady has raised that matter. I cannot promise an early debate, but we should be concerned to do anything that we can to prevent outbreaks of violence wherever and however they may occur.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): Will the Leader of the House agree to an early debate on the destruction of the coalfield communities that will be brought about by the implementation of the Government's recent White Paper? Will the House join me in congratulating Women Against Pit Closures, which, 100 days ago yesterday, set up pit camps to defend the pits from closure and to defend the coalfield communities from destruction?

Mr. Newton: It will not surprise the hon. Gentleman to know that, while, once again, I appreciate why he has felt it right to raise that point, as it is only a short time—just before the recess—since the House had an extensive debate on the coal proposals, I have no immediate plans to stage another.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): During the proceedings on the Finance Bill on Monday week, is there likely to be a statement on the issue of the council tax and timeshare dwellings, remembering that the statutory instrument has to be addressed within 40 sitting days of 11 March? Does the Leader of the House accept that there is considerable concern among timeshare owners who feel that their property is not used for commercial purposes?

Mr. Newton: Given that the council tax would be a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment rather than one to be dealt with in the proceedings on the Finance Bill, I am not sure of the connection that the hon. Gentleman makes, but I am aware of the concern and of the fact that my right hon. and hon. Friends have made a number of points relevant to that concern. I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's raising of it this afternoon to the attention of the appropriate Ministers.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): The Leader of the House will remember that, in October, the Secretary of State for Employment announced a package of £75 million for retraining measures for redundant miners. On 31 March, she announced measures for the release of that money and it is clear that, because of those criteria, not one penny of that money will come to north Nottinghamshire. Miners feel that they are being short-changed by the Government over their jobs, their pensions and now retraining. May we have an urgent statement on that next week?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise time for an urgent statement, but I shall certainly bring the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate on effective parliamentary scrutiny of the Prime Minister? Many hon. Members on this side of the House feel that Prime Minister's Question Time is too short, is full of planted questions and that the Prime Minister does not answer other questions effectively. Whatever else it is, Prime Minister's Question Time is not an effective way of checking the Executive. Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate so that we may examine possible ways of improving that accountability?

Mr. Newton: From where I sit, it looks like a pretty effective means of scrutiny, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, on the occasions when I have deputised for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, it feels like an effective form of scrutiny. What is more, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I think that my right hon. Friend is very good at responding.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): What chance is there of an early debate on the situation in the aerospace industry? Recently, 260 of my constituents on the production line of the executive jet of British Aerospace at Broughton lost their jobs and 700 of my constituents in the same factory on the airbus production line have also lost their jobs. Surely there should be time for a debate so that we may know what the Government are doing to assist the industry and my constituents who are soon to lose their jobs.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise an early debate, but I would make two points to the hon. Gentleman who, as ever, is representing the interests of his constituents. First, any difficulties are in common with aerospace industries around the world because of underlying recessionary difficulties which go well beyond these shores. Secondly, the British Government, not least my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have manifestly put a huge effort into obtaining orders for the British aerospace industry to help with the problems that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If the Leader of the House is not prepared to have a debate on Bosnia next week, may we have a debate on early-day motion 1766 which deals with arms dealing in relation to Bosnia?

[That this House questions the propriety of Baroness Thatcher calling for a lifting of the arms embargo on Bosnia when her family has substantial interests in the arms trade; and calls upon her to declare interests before future statements are made.]

Is the Leader of the House aware that some of us were incredulous when Baroness Thatcher talked about the innocent little Muslim children, given the way in which she treated those Muslim children in Iraq? When she talks about selling arms, we hear the footsteps of her son the arms salesman and the jingle of Arab money.

Mr. Newton: In view of the seriousness of the concern that is felt on both sides of the House about what is happening in Bosnia, and the difficulty of the issues involved, that question falls well below the level of events.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If the Leader of the House accepts the seriousness of the situation in Bosnia and the concern about it, why is it not possible, even at this late stage, for the Government to reconsider next week's business and, instead of devoting three days to Maastricht, devoting at least one day to a wide-ranging debate on what can be done about the Bosnian situation to try to stop the continuing war crimes there—the atrocities, the systematic rapes—against people whose only crime, it seems, is that they are Muslims?

Mr. Newton: I make two points to the hon. Gentleman. First, it would have been open to his right hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench to choose that subject for the Supply day debate on Tuesday. Secondly, I shall take this as yet another request for what, increasingly, hon. Members on both sides of the House seem to hope will be an otherwise vacant day on Thursday, and I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's help in ensuring that such progress is made on the Maastricht Bill.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): May we have a debate next week on the publication of accounts by political parties? It will be entirely appropriate for the Leader of the House to make a statement in support of that today as there is a notice of motion on the Order Paper for an unopposed return under the Representation of the People Act 1983, which, as the Leader of the House knows, is legislation designed to prevent corruption through excessive expenditure during a general election. Why should not we have similar legislation to prevent corruption, once the Government are in place, by payments to a political party which produced, for example, before the last general election £17 million for the Conservative party?

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): Not enough.

Mr. Cryer: The right hon. Gentleman says that it was not enough. That £17 million has secured a number of promises from the Government, and we want to know what those promises are and from where the money comes.

Mr. Newton: In view of the occasional remarks of some trade union leaders about what they expect from the Labour party in response to the financial contributions that they make, I find that a rather odd question. I will respond, in my usual low-key way, by saying that I have no plans for a debate next week.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Following the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), may I remind the Leader of the House that I have a ten-minute Bill application on the abolition of fox hunting on 27 April? In view of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, perhaps I can put him down as one of the sponsors. In the meantime, may we have a debate in Government time on animal welfare? The Leader of the House will be aware that most hon. Members receive more correspondence on animal welfare issues than on any other subject. It would give us an opportunity to raise the subject of the slaughter of pilot whales by the Faroese and the failure of stores such as Marks and Spencer to take positive action to prohibit the sale of Faroese meat.

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Gentleman would be as surprised as the rest of the House if I were to respond by urging him on with his Bill or immediately promising him the time that he seeks. I want to correct a wrong impression that he might have gained from my, I hope, reasonably understanding reply to the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell). The incident in my constituency that I referred to was gross violence committed by hunt saboteurs against people who were doing something entirely lawful. That too is something that we will be seeking to prevent.

BILL PRESENTED

Coastal Waters (Quality Standards)

Mr. Patrick Nicholls, supported by Sir John Hannam, Mr. Anthony Steen, Mr. Robert Hicks, Mr. David Harris, Mr. Rupert Allason, Mr. Sebastian Coe, Mr. Gary Streeter and Mrs. Angela Browning, presented a Bill to make provision for the introduction of a new system for meeting the costs of improvement of water quality standards in coastal waters; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 30 April, and to be printed. [Bill 178.]

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will recall that yesterday we had a similar situation to that which we now face: a Bill was defeated—by 65 votes to 39—on what was, in House of Commons terms, a very thin day because we had just returned from the holidays. Roughly the same Bill was introduced yesterday, and we challenged it. You said on a former occasion that you would not scrutinise Bills which were presented in an attempt to circumvent a decision of the House.

"Erskine May" says on pages 468 to 469 that Bills should not be accepted if they were substantially the same. I think that the Bill presented today is substantially the same as the Bill which was defeated yesterday. I think that that flouts the rules of Parliament, and I would like to know your ruling and whether it has been scrutinised.

Madam Speaker: My ruling is precisely the same as the one I gave previously. I ruled earlier in this Session in respect of what was known then as the human fertilisation Bill, which was presented to the House by the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess). This course is in order, and since yesterday's refusal to introduce was not the kind of decision which rules out the presentation of a similar but not identical Bill. In so ruling I have taken account of the precedent set in "Erskine May".

I, too, have looked at "Erskine May". Let me correct the hon. Gentleman by referring him to pages 468 to 470. On the earlier occasion I indicated that the existence of this loophole was something which might be looked at by the Select Committee on Procedure—that the House might wish to refer the matter to the Committee, and that remains my view. It is for the House to take action if it feels there is a loophole that needs filling.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 30 March]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

4.5 pm

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): I have an announcement to make before the Committee discusses amendment No. 57. It is a reasonably long statement.

I am prepared, at the appropriate time, to select for separate Division amendments Nos. 225 and 268, both in the name of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), amendment No. 426, tabled by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), the leader of the Liberal Democratic party, and, finally, amendment No. 420 in the name of the right hon. and learned Member the Leader of the Opposition.

I have received from all parts of the Committee requests for separate Divisions, on a considerable number of amendments that have been included in the groups that have been debated. As the Committee knows, in deciding whether or not to allow separate Divisions, the Chair is exercising its power over the selection of amendments which is conferred on it by Standing Order No. 31. As stated in "Erskine May", page 405, it is not the practice for the Chair to give reasons for such decisions. I do not propose to do so in individual cases.

However, I think that it would be helpful if I mentioned one very basic requirement which I am sure that, on reflection, members of the Committee will appreciate: that to be selectable for a separate Division the purport of an amendment needs to have been substantially covered during the course of the debate on the group in which it has been included. I am afraid that this simple criterion cannot be said to apply to a great many of the requests that I have received, and that therefore many of the relevant amendments do not get to first base in terms of selection for a separate Division. This is an obvious point, but I thought it might be useful if I were to put it on the record. Nevertheless, hon. Members will find that I have selected for separate Division a number of amendments and new clauses coming from different parts of the Committee.

As the Committee knows, on 30 March I made a separate announcement about my decision on a separate Division on amendment No. 27, to which some rather special circumstances apply. Since then I have received a number of representations on this matter. I have listened to the arguments, as I promised to do, and I have, to the best of my ability, taken into consideration the particular circumstances of the case. However, I am not minded to alter my previous decision not to select amendment No. 27 for separate Division.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have listened with great care to your statement, and I want to begin by thanking you for your patience in listening to my representations yesterday with respect to amendment No. 27. Although I have always, throughout the many years that I have been a Member of Parliament, respected the authority of the Chair, I must ask you to think again about your decision on amendment No. 27. That amendment meets the criteria you have just described in outlining the reasons behind your decision. It was the subject of the longest debate we have had throughout the Committee proceedings. The amendment is in order. It was selected for debate. It stands in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

At no time during that debate, or subsequently in the weeks intervening until 30 March, was there any suggestion that my announcement to the House during my speech on amendment No. 27—that the Opposition would ask the Committee to divide upon it—was to be contradicted. It was therefore something of a bombshell to hear your ruling on 30 March.

I think that that ruling, which you, Mr. Morris, are now saying must be sustained, is a very odd and dangerous procedural precedent. I certainly cannot recall, in 23 years in Parliament, any precedent of this kind in all of the Committee proceedings in which I have played a part either as a Minister or as a member of the Opposition Front Bench. There may be precedents but I am not aware of them, and no one can show me any.

The reality is, we are told, that the Government are now to accept new clause 75. They are running away from a Division in the House of Commons on new clause 75, so your original argument in the submission of 30 March that you would accept a Division on new clause 75 but not on amendment No. 27—an argument, incidentally, that I never accepted because we did not regard them as alternatives—no longer stands because there is not now to be a Division in Committee on new clause 75. The Government have caved in on that aspect, as we understand that they are to do on amendment No. 420 and perhaps on others as yet unannounced.

I believe that the case for a Division on amendment No. 27 remains as overwhelming as it always has been, and that view is widely shared in the Committee. My view and our arguments, the nature of the amendment and its importance, were not affected by the very dubious ruling, which is itself contested, given by the Attorney-General and expressed to the House by the Foreign Secretary as a way of getting the Government off the hook on this crucial issue.

For all those reasons, I ask you to reconsider the unprecedented announcement that you have made to the Committee today.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I owe it to the right hon. Gentleman to respond to him immediately.

I have thought very deeply about this particular case. I thought about it originally because, while it is not for me to take into consideration political dimensions—and it is not—I have to be sure that the procedures I follow are ones that have logic on their side. I went very deeply into this matter all the way through and, indeed, it does not need me to remind the right hon. Gentleman of the number of references to it that I made.

I started with a reference in column 685 when the original point was raised following the right hon. Gentleman's intervention in column 402. I made a further announcement three days later in column 1026, and yet a further one some seven days later in column 483. I made yet another announcement in column 1271 before I made the substantive statement in column 161 on 30 March.

[The Chairman]

I must tell the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee that, in reaching a decision, I have to follow the traditions of the Chair that I now hold and recognise that they are there as guidance given to the Chair over time and that the Chair has to carry out the duties imposed on it. It is not a particularly easy decision on occasions. I know what the easy decision would be on amendment No. 27, and if I were to take it I would be the hero of part of the Committee. Nevertheless—[Interruption.] Order. If the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and other hon. Members want to go outside, that is entirely up to them.

The easy decision would have been to have accepted, revised and looked again. Nevertheless, the Committee and the House have asked me to assess the merits of all the amendments and whether or not there should be a vote. I have spent many hours in preparation and many hours coming to a decision and I must tell the Committee that it will have to accept that, in the end, I have to make a judgment.

4.15 pm

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. Again, I listened carefully to what you told the House, and I noticed that you did not challenge my contention that your decision sets a precedent for the Chair in such circumstances. I repeat that I believe it to be a dangerous and extraordinary precedent. Having listened carefully to what you said, I can see in your statement no legitimate reason or argument for preventing the House from voting on amendment No. 27. You have certainly advanced no argument; there are no procedural arguments, and no arguments of precedent or order, to prevent the House from having a legitimate vote on the amendment.

I ask you again to reconsider your judgment. Many people far beyond the confines of the Chamber will feel that the House of Commons has been cheated of a legitimate reason to have a vote. I do not use that word lightly, but because I am singularly unconvinced—I believe that the majority of the Committee is unconvinced —about the reasons for your decision. With all due respect to the Chair, I say that, if we are not allowed to vote on amendment No. 27 during the Committee stage, we shall demand of Madam Speaker the right to reintroduce the issue and debate and vote on it during the Report stage.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I shall respond briefly to the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham).

I think that the Committee needs reminding that it is settled practice of the Committee and of the House that the Chair does not give reasons for decisions. The Chair has listened to the representations. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that I have listened attentively to him and to his colleagues at an hour suitable to them on a number of occasions. I say to the right hon. Gentleman again that I have made the decision on the best advice and on my own judgment, and I have to stick by that.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): On a different point of order, Mr. Morris. It may be for the convenience of the Committee if I say that, of the four amendments that you announced that you would call for a vote, the Government do not intend to resist amendment No. 420.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. Although we greatly appreciate the enormous number of hours that you have devoted to the debate, may I ask you to consider two additional points that you may not have been able to consider before? The first is that the protocol which is the subject of amendment No. 27 calls on my constituents to pay money to the European Community for the social chapter applying to the other 11 members. Clearly that is a decision which Members of Parliament should make. It is the kind of thing that Parliament discussed in the time of King Charles: should we pay money or should we not?

May I ask you, Mr. Morris, if there is not some way in which the House of Commons can be allowed to decide, yes or no, whether our constituents should be forced to pay money for the social chapter of the other 11 member states? If we do not have the opportunity to decide, the money will simply be paid over whether we want to pay it or not.

The second issue is that of precedent. I have looked thoroughly through "Erskine May" and all the other basic information available, and I can find only two examples in the history of the Commons of such a decision being taken. One dates from 23 March 1964 and the other from 11 June 1968; both involved Back-Bench amendments, not official Opposition amendments, and in neither case was the decision delayed until weeks after the debate had taken place.

In view of the fact that you have served the Committee so superbly, Mr. Morris, and given so much of your time, and as you have listened to all the arguments and weighed all that has been said, will you tell us what on earth is the argument against letting the House of Commons decide whether we want to pay money to Brussels? Surely, as that is a taxation issue, we should be able to decide yes or no.

The Chairman: The hon. Member was kind enough to write to me on 5 April asking me to take into consideration those very points——

Sir Teddy Taylor: Not both of them.

The Chairman: With respect, the point about 11 June and the one point on 12 June are in his letter; perhaps he has forgotten exactly what he wrote about. At any rate, on 5 April he wrote to me a two-page letter and I can assure him that I have been over it with a fine-toothed comb. It was one of the factors that had to be taken into consideration in coming to my decision.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. From the beginning of this Committee there has been a clear wish on the part of a large number of hon. Members to be able to express a view on whether the United Kingdom should adhere to the social chapter. Are our procedures such that there is no way of taking such a vote, even if—as you, I think, argue —following the Attorney-General's ruling, a vote on amendment 27 would be virtually symbolic? Nevertheless, it would be a vehicle by which the Committee could express a view, and there is no doubt that it wishes to do so.

The Chairman: I am not sure that I can answer the hon. Gentleman's point of order, because part of it was not a point for me as Chairman. He was thinking aloud, if I may put it that way.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am most concerned about what is happening here at the moment. I do not believe that the Committee does itself any credit—and there is certainly not a precedent—when it challenges the ruling of the Chair on the amendments selected. There are ways in our procedure for that to happen, but it is not the custom for the Chair to be put under pressure by arguments about the decisions that the Chair has made in order to carry forward the debate in the Committee. It would set a very bad precedent in our procedure if, every time there was a decision that some hon. Member did not like, we got into a debate about whether we ought to have a vote on it. We have received your ruling, Mr. Morris. I believe that it should be followed and that we should get on with the debate. Enough time has been wasted.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Further to the point of order raised by the right hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), Mr. Morris. I think that all hon. Members would agree that, whatever the merits of any decision, the difficulty which you and the Committee face is the fact that, surprisingly enough, this Bill is not to ratify the treaty. The brevity of the Bill, coupled with the complexity, length and, indeed, importance of the two or three treaties to which it refers are the basis of our problem. So I wish to raise three points of order relating, in the reverse order, to your announcement.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) referred to the Report stage. Can you tell us whether, to your knowledge, the ruling that you have just made prevents amendment 27 from being again tabled, debated and decided on Report, because I am quite sure that nobody wishes to cheat Parliament of an opportunity to vote on an amendment that has been selected, moved, debated, but not put?

The second point relates to the statement that you made about the selection of amendments for subsequent vote. I think you said that you were not able to select many of them because, although they had been selected for debate, during the course of the relevant debate the matters contained in those amendments were not covered. Am I right in saying that there seems to be some disequilibrium between the opportunity for debate, your opportunity for selection and the rules relating to the closure? Can we refer that to the Select Committee on Procedure?

The third matter relates to your list of amendments Nos. 225, 268, 426 and 420 for Division. May I confirm that those are to be taken immediately after the conclusion of the debate on amendment No. 57—perhaps today? If that is so, can you give us any idea of the new clauses and other amendments, to which you referred, which will be voted on before we reach the new clauses on the referendum, which I fancy will be next week some time? Unless we know that, hon. Members will not know what matters they are expected to vote on when we return on Monday.

The Chairman: There are some important points to answer there. I cannot make any decision that affects the Report stage. That is a matter for Madam Speaker and for her alone. On the question about Select Committee on Procedure, the Chairman of that Committee is present and he will have noted the hon. Gentleman's point.

On the question of separate Divisions—this is an important point—immediately following the conclusion of the debate on amendment No. 57, to be moved by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), there will be a separate Division, if so moved, on amendment No. 225, followed by a Division on amendment No. 268, if so moved, and followed by a Division on amendment No. 426, if so moved. At that point, we shall reach the clause stand part debate. After a Division on that, we shall have a Division on amendment No. 420, although I understand that there was an earlier statement on that amendment. That is the position on the hon. Gentleman's three points.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Following the explanation that you were good enough to give the Committee about why some amendments were not eligible for selection, does it not follow that, if some hon. Members had made shorter speeches, more amendments would have been eligible for selection?

The Chairman: Well over 100 hon. Members have contributed to substantive debates on amendments.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. My point is simple. Does not the Government's announcement during business questions that they did not propose to oppose new clause 75 have a bearing on your ruling? You could have found out about that only at the same time as other hon. Members. That must be a relevant factor in the ruling that you have been working out over the past few days. Given that that is a very recent change in circumstances, does it not mean that you should be allowed time for further consideration?

The key factor was that there were two amendments on the same point which were both available for Division. Now that we know that the new clause will not be opposed by the Government, surely that has a bearing on the decision that you have had to reach on amendment No. 27. Should you not ask, Mr. Morris, for some further time for reflection? Given the recent announcement, that would be well understood by all members of the Committee.

The Chairman: The announcement was as new to me as it was to the hon. Gentleman. I heard it on the monitor in my room at the same time as it was heard by hon. Members who were in the Chamber. I immediately sat down with my senior advisers and reflected on whether it did have any further impact on the lengthy discussion I had had earlier. I came to the conclusion that it did not.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Would you be good enough to expand a little on what you said about giving no reasons? That seems to have caused some misunderstanding among some members of the Committee. It is said that you appeared on "The Parliament Programme", which seems to many members of the Committee a very unusual thing for a Chairman to do. It is further said that you gave reasons for your decision not to allow a debate on amendment No. 27 on "The Parliament Programme". It may be——

The Chairman: Order. I gave no reasons at all.

4.30 pm

Mr. Budgen rose——

The Chairman: That seems to be the substance of the hon. Gentleman's point of order. If he will withdraw that point——

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Budgen: I withdraw it.

The Chairman: If the hon. Gentleman has the transcript and says that I said that, he should produce it. If not, I shall be grateful if he will take my word and withdraw.

Mr. Budgen: I withdraw it. However, I understand—and I do not have the transcript—that you gave an explanation of your ruling in which you said that the Bill had received a substantial majority on Second Reading.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman ought either to come better prepared with his point of order or to accept the ruling I have given. I have said to the Committee that in this day and age, if the responsible media approach the Chairman for a general discussion on an issue of major importance to the nation, I have some obligation to the media.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have no wish to enter into a discussion of your reasons for the ruling on amendment No. 27, although I very much support the remarks by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) when he addressed that issue. However, it is clear that your ruling is not supported by the official Opposition. So far as one can judge, it is not supported by any of the Opposition parties, and it is almost certainly not supported by a large number of Conservative Members. It may well be the case that your ruling is contrary to the wishes of the majority of the Committee.

My question to you is this: if that were the case, what remedy is available to the Committee? One obvious remedy would be to move and to attempt to carry a motion of no confidence in the Chair. I assume that no one would wish to see that draconian step taken, but if that majority exists, is there some procedure which would allow that majority opinion to be expressed in such a way as to ensure a vote on amendment No. 27, which the majority of the Committee may wish to take place?

The Chairman: It is the lot of the Chair to make impartial rulings. Impartial rulings sometimes support the majority of the Committee and sometimes the minority, but they have to be made on the best judgment of the Chair, and I have done my best and come to that conclusion.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In 1976-77, the Speaker of the House of Commons was asked to consider the question of hybridity. I understand from readings of Mr. Speaker Thomas that, as you pointed out, Mr. Morris, guidance is taken from the advisers and the Clerks of the House on decisions of this importance, and that initially the decision was taken that the Bill concerned would not be regarded as hybrid. However, it turned out that strong advice was given, contrary to what the Government draftsmen had been suggesting, that in this instance the Bill should be referred to examiners. Therefore, there is a precedent for a change in advice. Furthermore, it is perfectly clear that in relation——

The Chairman: Order. Maybe I shall let the hon. Gentleman continue, but I must not let him proceed on that point, because matters of hybridity are for the Speaker and not for me as Chairman of Ways and Means. If the hon. Gentleman has representations to make, they should be to Madam Speaker and not to me. I hope that there is some other element he wishes to raise.

Mr. Cash: Yes, indeed. It was not the question of hybridity, but the question that you raised, Mr. Morris, on the extent to which, as a matter of practice, you would rely on guidance from the Clerks of the House. It therefore follows that it is possible, even in matters of grave constitutional importance, for that guidance to be reviewed.

Just now in your statement, you put enormous emphasis on the length of the debate. I concur strongly with the remarks by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) about the money question. There is no doubt whatever that there was a lengthy debate. Indeed, it was followed by a further debate, in respect to which the Attorney-General made his submissions, which was followed by yet another debate. In those circumstances, I ask you, Mr. Morris, to review your decision.

There can be no doubt, both as a matter of practice and of length of time, that amendment No. 27 has been thoroughly debated and should be put to a vote. There is no precedent for such a situation to have occurred in the history of the House. In the light of those circumstances, I ask you to review your decision and take further guidance from the Clerks of the House.

The Chairman: I shall make two points in response to the hon. Gentleman. First, it is true that I get guidance, but I do not shirk making a decision. The decision rests on my shoulders alone and I have made it to the best of my ability—and so be it. Secondly—this is an important point and I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has not yet understood it, although we are entering the 20th day of Committee—it is not the length of time that is important. What is important is the content of the debate.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You said earlier that the decision which you had to make in this regard was hard. You could have taken the easy option. You could have taken the democratic option. You could have taken the option which said that a majority of the Committee wanted to vote for the social chapter, as provided for in amendment No. 27. Therefore, I believe that people outside the Committee—whatever the Government may think—will think that this is a crazy place when we can debate at length amendment No. 27 relating to the social chapter and they can see on BBC Ceefax at half-past one today what your decision will be in advance of what you have said now. [Interruption.] Yes, it was announced on BBC Ceefax at half past one today that the Chairman of Ways and Means will rule that there will be no vote on amendment No. 27.

They call it democracy. They call this place the mother of parliaments. We have the whole united Labour party in favour of amendment No. 27. We have the Liberal Democrats, for what it is worth. We have the other minority parties. There are about 26 rebels who want to vote for amendment No. 27, yet in this tin-pot little arena we have a Chairman of Ways and Means telling us that we cannot have a vote. My view is that this is a stitch-up—and has been from the beginning. This is a conspiracy with the Government of the day. Amendment No. 27 was the only real chance that we had of defeating Maastricht and the Chair has not given us the chance to carry out a proper democratic vote.

The Chairman: I simply make one point: what appeared on Ceefax was absolutely nothing to do with me.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The difficulty for the Committee is that, through the mechanism of this Bill, we will be enacting a treaty which is attracting great constitutional interest. It is moving us from democratic accountable government to undemocratic accountable government, as has been explained. Therefore, we are looking at a constitution behind the mechanism of a Bill.

Effectively, you accepted the closure on some of the amendments on which some of us tried to speak and on which some of us were not called. What is the meaning of this place, as the fulcrum of democracy, if you deny us the right to vote on the motions and amendments on which we seek to vote? Clearly, that is encapsulated in your decision on amendment No. 27. It is highly unsatisfactory. What is the purpose of the House of Commons if it cannot determine the constitution of the United Kingdom?

The Chairman: The Committee has had 19 days on this Bill and is now entering the 20th day.

Mr. Shepherd: On a point of order——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman has already raised a point of order and perhaps I can rule on that. If he goes through the list of amendments that the Committee has debated, he will find that there is a representative from the group that he has been assisting. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) signed a great number of amendments, and I think he will find that the vast majority of them were debated.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. After a major amendment was properly selected by you, moved and fully debated in the House of Commons, we now face the extraordinary situation that we are denied an opportunity to vote on it. That could surely be justified only if the House were offered an alternative amendment of the same significance on which to vote. That is patently not so, as has been revealed by the Government's announcement that they are prepared to accept new clause 75, whereas they know very well that they cannot and will not accept amendment No. 27. That is to me the heart of the Bill and the debate, as I am sure that it is to many other right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee.

Mr. Morris, you heard the Government's announcement just a few minutes before you came into the Chamber. I have no doubt that you are a quick thinker, but I believe that the amendment raises such important matters that we are justified in asking you to reflect further on your decision.

The Chairman: The right hon. Gentleman is an experienced parliamentarian, so I take seriously the point that he has raised. I did reflect. There were 15 minutes or thereabouts between my seeing the announcement on the monitor and my coming into the Chamber. In that time I had to decide whether to change the decision that I had come to during the lunch break. I decided on balance that, despite the announcement, the basis on which I had reached my conclusions was unchanged. Therefore, I have to stick by that decision. I am sorry, but I am not persuaded that, even in the newly changed circumstances, a vote would be appropriate.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As Chairman of Ways and Means, you are not the King's man or even the Queen's person. You have a particular responsibility for money Bills and budgetary matters. You are the custodian of the democratic rights of the House. Your responsibility with regard to the disbursement of public moneys is clear: it is to the House and those to whom we, as elected representatives, are responsible. They look to us to ensure that our democratically expressed authority is given before their moneys are disbursed.

In this case, moneys are being disbursed for the implementation by the other members of the Community of the social chapter, to which we in the United Kingdom are not a party. To those outside it will look the most extraordinary anomaly, which is surely worthy of explanation, that, after long debate, we should not be allowed to vote on amendment No. 27. We have had a debate. Why, after that long debate, should we not be allowed to vote? Can you please, Sir, in this exceptional case, explain to us how on earth we can go back to our constituents who sent us here and say, "We debated long and hard on your behalf, but we were denied a vote by the Chairman of Ways and Means, who is responsible to the House and the country for the disbursement of public money and the democratic authority that goes with it"?

The Chairman: The hon. Member's colleague wrote me a long letter on that particular point. I weighed up the points and came to the conclusion that I reached. I am afraid that the hon. Member will have to accept that.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. We on this Bench would be the first to testify to the tolerance and diligence that you have shown in attempting to assess the views of the Committee as a whole, and not of any particular faction there. You would have been assisted in that regard if the Committee had not carried closure motions, thereby terminating many debates which would have given you a wider picture.

However, the same cannot be said of the amendment which is the subject of our discussion now. The debate was conducted in a constructive spirit by everyone who spoke, in the full expectation that they would be permitted the opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27 in the light of all that had been said during the debate. To some extent, through no fault of your own, you were bounced into a position today by an unexpected announcement made in an offhand way—I mean no disrespect to the Leader of the House: the announcement was simply drawn out in answer to a question. You had little time to reflect on the changed position.

In the light of what has happened and the way in which you have been caught off guard, and as you said just now that the matter was of supreme importance to the nation, I join the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) in asking you, with great respect, to think again.

[Mr. James Molyneaux]

4.45 pm

The Chairman: I am grateful to the right hon. Member. The whole procedure for amendment No. 27 has been a moving target. As the Committee will be aware, I made it clear on several occasions before I made the announcement that the whole issue was a changing scene. I can do no better than read to the Committee column 483 of the Official Report of 4 March. I said:

"We are still some way off having to consider anything to do with amendment No. 27. As the hon. Gentleman will know, attempts are being made by hon. Members on both sides of the House to produce more amendments relating to this broad area. It would be wrong of me to make a judgment at this point on whether other amendments—or how many of them—may exist by that time."—[Official Report, 4 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 483.]

I have had to make judgments continually as we have gone along. I have based them on extensive documentation which I have kept on each and every amendment, not least amendment No. 27. That is the basis on which I came to my conclusion.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Few people in the House will understand better than me the burdens which you carry, because I seek in some modest way to share those responsibilities as a member of your Chairman's Panel. However, do you accept that many hon. Members will be deeply saddened and very shocked by the announcement which you have made to the House this afternoon? I am sure that you accept that leaders of political parties, Privy Councillors, Her Majesty's Opposition and numerous Conservative Members believe that amendment No. 27 is critical. You said in your opening statement and have subsequently repeated several times that the amendment was widely debated at great length and in depth. Many hon. Members who were not called to speak would have sought to do so if the Chair had not yet again accepted the closure.

Mr. Morris, you have a critical constitutional job in the House of Commons, to be guided not only by those who advise you but by the precedents of the House. But you surely also have a duty to the genuine Back Benchers of the House to ensure that the House can divide on critical issues. I am sure that I do not need to remind you or the Committee that amendment No. 27 is one of the most critical in the debates that have taken place during the Committee stage so far.

In addition, as my hon. Friends on both sides of the Committee have said, the amendment relates to money. Exceptional circumstances surround the statement that you have made. You stated that you were aware only 15 minutes before you assumed the Chair of the Committee that the Government were prepared to accept new clause 75, which deprives the House of Commons, and therefore the people of Britain, of the opportunity to decide one of the most fundamental issues contained in the Bill which we are debating in the Committee on their behalf.

As a member of your Chairmen's Panel, in view of the exceptional circumstances, because it was unfair that you had to reach a decision in just 15 minutes, and as many of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors have intervened to request that you review your decision——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member will recognise that tedious repetition is not something that any Committee is advised to follow and, as a good Chairman, doubtless he would rule it out of order, as I am now ruling that part of his remarks out of order. I recognise that, whatever decision I took today, one part of the Committee would be well pleased and one part would be upset—[Interruption.]—but that is the lot of the Chairman. It is the lot that I have to accept and I willingly accept it. In the end, I must make a decision.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have no wish to complicate matters still further or make your already difficult job still more difficult. But I invite you to look again at amendment No. 453, which stands in my name. You might feel, on having looked at that amendment again and on further reflection, that it affords you an opportunity to achieve a compromise between the various views that have been expressed so far. With your indulgence, I will explain why.

Amendment No. 27 deletes the whole of the protocol, and that deletion led the Attorney-General to say that the Government could ignore any vote on amendment No. 27 since it was, in effect, a double negative. Leaving aside the merits or otherwise of the Attorney-General's opinion, many members of the Committee are unhappy about new clause 75, which stands in my name and that of others, because they feel that it is too remote from the debate that has already taken place on amendment No. 27, and I appreciate that point of view.

That is why I invite you, Mr. Morris, to look again at amendment No. 453, since it achieves the deletion of that part of the social protocol that allows the United Kingdom Government an opt-out. So although it is a deletion and remains in order, consistent with the acceptance of amendment No. 27, it would, if accepted, force the British Government to accept the protocol on social policy.

It has been accepted as being in order, it would give you the opportunity of a compromise, it does not fall foul of the Attorney-General's opinion—whatever the merits or otherwise of that—and it would perhaps allow the Committee the opportunity of the kind of vote which was anticipated on amendment No. 27 but which will not, if your ruling persists, now take place. That is why I urge you, with respect, to look again at amendment No. 453.

The Chairman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and he is right, in that I had to consider amendment No. 453 very closely. I reached my decision having done so.

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In view of the obvious disturbance and unease in the Committee, and the unusual course of events—to put it no more strongly than that—I beg to move,

That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

I hope that you will grant that motion.

The Chairman: The Question is that I do report Progress. As many as are of that opinion say aye, to the contrary no.

The Committee proceeded to a Division—

Dr. Cunningham: Further to my point of order, Mr. Morris. I submit that the Committee should have an opportunity to debate the motion that I moved. I understand that it is debatable and I urge you to allow it to be debated.

The Chairman: The right hon. Member asks whether a motion to report Progress is debatable. It is. After he had moved it, I quickly looked round the Chamber and did not immediately see hon. Members rising to speak to it—[Interruption.]—but I may have been mistaken. I now make it clear that a modest debate on the motion should take place.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Do I understand that the Division is off? If so, could it be made clear that it is off at this stage and that a debate on the motion to report Progress will now take place?

The Chairman: The Division is off.

Sir Peter Emery: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. While it is, of course, for you to decide whether the motion should be debated, it being debatable, do you agree that if you considered that we should proceed without a debate, it is within the power of the Chair so to proceed? In other——

The Chairman: Order. It was not my wish to prevent a debate. I did not see any hon. Members rise to debate the matter, but, clearly, as there was a misunderstanding, I am allowing a debate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Is it a new one?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes. Am I right in saying that it was within the power of the Chair to allow a debate to take place and to call the Division off even if no hon. Member was standing at the time the vote was called?

The Chairman: Whether or not that be the case, it is clear that there was confusion, and hon. Members were not entirely clear what was going on. I hope that it is now clear that we are debating the motion to report progress. I call the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to open the debate.

Dr. Cunningham: I am sure that at least that decision and ruling will have majority support in the Committee this afternoon, Mr. Morris, even if others which you have given have not. It is important that we have an opportunity to discuss the events of the past hour. It is clear that the Government announced their decision on new clause 75 with little time for you, let alone the rest of the Committee, to reflect on the significance of that in respect of your provisional ruling of 30 March.

The Opposition have never accepted that amendment No. 27 and new clause 75 were alternate—that one vote and one decision on one of those issues replaced or obviated the necessity for a Division in the Committee on the other. We have always challenged that position, and we continue to hold that view.

Other than the adjournment of these proceedings to enable discussions behind the Chair to take place, the motion now before the Committee is the best way to proceed. Hon. Members in all parts of the Committee, not excluding the Government, should have a chance to assess the impact of your new decision, Mr. Morris. The reality is, as many hon. Members have made clear, that there is majority support in the Committee for a Division on amendment No. 27.

I recognise that amendment No. 27 has not been formally moved, but it was among a group of amendments that were discussed, it is in order, it stands in the name of the Leader of the Opposition and I maintain, as I said on a point of order, that the decision to disallow a vote on amendment No. 27 has no precedent. You have not challenged that argument, Mr. Morris, and I repeat it now.

Even as events have been unfolding in the Chamber, Ministers have been briefing the press to the effect that the Government are willing to accept new clause 75 because they will ignore the outcome of a vote on that issue. It is extraordinary that even while this discussion and disagreement is taking place——

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): The hon. Gentleman has made a serious charge. Perhaps he will name those Ministers.

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I will in due course, Mr. Morris—but not for the moment, thank you very much. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman is one of them.

5 pm

Mr. Garel-Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very serious charge. Perhaps he will name those Ministers. If not, perhaps he will withdraw his remark.

Dr. Cunningham: No, I have no intention of withdrawing my remarks—none at all. The right hon. Gentleman knows what has been the Government's briefing, which has been going on at exactly the time as we have been discussing these issues in the Chamber. I stand by what I said. I have no intention of withdrawing my remarks.

It is obvious that your ruling today, Mr. Morris, which will deny the Committee an opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27, will allow a discredited Government to escape the consequences of a potential defeat in the House of Commons and to ignore the will of the Chamber on Divisions on other issues before the Committee—and I do not withdraw my remarks but stand by them absolutely.

That will frustrate the will of Parliament by avoiding a vote on amendment No. 27 and the outcome of a potential defeat on new clause 75. As I said several times this afternoon, those circumstances are without precedent. I made the point and repeat it now, that it is our intention to press for the substance of amendment No. 27 to be brought before the House on Report. It would be outrageous if, following a review of your decision, Mr. Morris, or subsequently, Parliament were denied an opportunity to express a view.

On this occasion—this is not always true—I share absolutely the view expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I am delighted to be able to say that.

Mr. Skinner: I think that I had better write that down.

Dr. Cunningham: But I do not want to ruin my hon. Friend's reputation.

People throughout the country will be astonished that, after all the arguments on the importance of the social chapter issue for the public, the House of Commons will not have an opportunity to record its view. Because the public will feel that they and their representatives have been cheated in being prevented from expressing their view, the whole standing of our proceedings in this place will be brought into disrepute. The public will really come to believe the argument that is all too often expressed these days: that the House of Commons has simply become a rubber stamp for any decision that the Government want to railroad through the Chamber.

[Dr. Cunningham]

That is an onerous charge to make, and I do not make it lightly. The Chair should reflect carefully on the consequences of public disillusionment about a ruling of such significance after so many hours of debate and discussion, on a subject of such importance.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I have been listening to the right hon. Gentleman with great interest: Why is it that members of the Labour Front Bench have left is so late to make a public fuss about amendment No. 27? They knew before Easter which way the decision was likely to go—the Chairman of Ways and Means had already made his announcement. He might have had time to reflect and reached a different decision, had there not been some rather quiet getting behind the pillars by members of Labour's Front Bench, who came forward with an alternative amendment to provide some kind of excuse for not taking amendment No. 27. Why has Labour come out in this way at the last moment?

Dr. Cunningham: I regard the hon. Gentleman's intervention as pure garbage and I am sorry that I gave way to him. For the record, you, Mr. Morris, made your provisional ruling on 30 March—a few days before the House rose for the Easter recess. You properly and generously offered to listen to my representations about your ruling. On reflection, I decided that I should establish precedent and examine parliamentary records during the Easter recess and then see you, Mr. Morris. I wrote seeking a meeting with you before the House resumed earlier this week.

You had an opportunity to listen to my representations only a little while ago and made your definitive ruling only today. So that puts all the nonsense in the hon. Gentleman's intervention into perspective. There is no question of our making an argument late in the day about the significance of amendment No. 27.

I spoke in the debate on amendment No. 27 on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition, the shadow Cabinet and myself. I said then, and have repeated many times since, that we expected the Committee to divide on that amendment. I repeated those arguments on 30 March and again today. To suggest that we suddenly decided, at the last moment, to make a fuss about amendment No. 27 is complete and absolute garbage.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): If, as it appears, the Committee will be able to make few decisions on issues of substance in this major constitutional issue and if the public take the view that legislation has been railroaded through the House of Commons without proper scrutiny and the House being allowed to do what it should, is there not a case for the other place examining the issues in more detail and taking a more radical view than it might otherwise do—as the only bulwark of democracy in this country?

Dr. Cunningham: I have never regarded the other place as a bulwark of democracy, so it is difficult to accept the hon. Gentleman's argument. The overwhelming majority of our fellow citizens rightly regard this Chamber as the bulwark of democracy—and it is in this Chamber that the critical decisions must be taken. In these circumstances, it is the duty of the Chair and of advisers to the Chair to find an opportunity for the House of Commons to record a view on amendment No. 27. If that cannot be done in Committee, it should certainly be done on Report. I will not resile from that view and those arguments.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: The Chair's decision is of enormous constitutional importance. We will commence consideration of the Finance Bill in Committee on Monday week. If the Chair so chose, it need not accept votes on major issues of public policy and expenditure raised by members of the Labour Front Bench in Committee. The principle that has just been announced is of fundamental importance.

Dr. Cunningham: I wholly agree with that intervention. I repeat that the Chair is setting a dangerous precedent, when amendments regarded as in order, selected for debate and debated at length are not selected for a Division, against the majority views of the Committee.

Mr. Cash: Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that on 30 March 1993, the Chairman of Ways and Means stated:

"Right hon. and hon. Members will see that I have selected for debate new clause 75 on transferred powers (commencement). As a corollary, I do not propose to select amendment No. 27 for debate or for separate Division."—[Official Report, 30 March 1993; Vol. 222, c. 161.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, as there was a so-called swap by way of corollary, it is at the heart of the question of the distinction—made by the right hon. Gentleman—between the content of amendment No. 27 and the content of new clause 75, which deals with the agreement of a future motion? Amendment No. 27 deals with the immediate question whether or not the social protocol should be excluded. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree?

Dr. Cunningham: We have always made it clear, and I am happy to do so again in response to the hon. Gentleman, that we have never accepted that amendment No. 27 and new clause 75 presented an either/or situation. We did not accept the argument that one could be exchanged for the other. The amendments have different impacts on the legislation. We had different reasons for tabling them and they provide quite separate opportunities for the Committee to express a view on different aspects of the legislation. That is why we could not accept your provisional ruling, Mr. Morris, of 30 March that, by agreeing to have a vote on new clause 75, we were accepting that there would be no Division on amendment No. 27.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I accept that the right hon. Gentleman is expressing the attitude of the Opposition. However, the Chair has decided that new clause 75 should be an alternative because of the use of the word "corollary". If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that that is a misunderstanding of his intention, would he consider withdrawing new clause 75? If that happened, it could no longer be said that the acceptance of that new clause stops consideration of and, one hopes, a vote on amendment No. 27. If the right hon. Gentleman is serious in his opposition to this matter, as I assume he is, perhaps he will seriously consider asking his colleagues to withdraw new clause 75. If that were done, the Chair would be placed in the position of accepting a vote on amendment No. 27.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Think about it.

Dr. Cunningham: In response to that sedentary intervention and to the legitimate intervention of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), I have thought about it, but I dismissed it. It was in order to consider all these matters that I did not seek to discuss the position with you, Mr. Morris, immediately after your ruling on 30 March.

These are important matters, and we wanted time to reflect on their consequences and check the precedents. As I have said several times, I concluded that we were always right to argue that the two amendments were not alternatives, but that the Committee was perfectly entitled to vote on both of them. They are quite different in nature and intent and I saw no reason to accept the argument that we could have one or the other but not both. There is no precedent for that argument and no procedural argument in favour of that proposition. I did not feel obliged to accept it and I do not accept it now.

It has been to the benefit of the Committee, and I hope to your benefit, Mr. Morris, to allow this motion to be debated, not least because it gives another chance for reflection—what in old-fashioned jargon used to be called a cooling-off period—in which we can assess the issues. It would be remiss of me not to repeat that your ruling is seriously challenged by the Leader of the Opposition, the shadow Cabinet and the Opposition. It is not legitimate or fair to the Committee or to our constituents to deny a vote on amendment No. 27. I emphasise again that in discussions with you, Mr. Morris, and subsequently with Madam Speaker on Report, we shall continue to explore the possibility of a legitimate opportunity for the Committee to express a view on this issue.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. At the beginning of his speech, the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) undertook to name the Ministers whom he alleged had been briefing the press outside. He has noticeably failed to do so. Would it be in order for the right hon. Gentleman to speak again to fulfil that pledge and demonstrate the seriousness of what he was trying to say?

The Chairman: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made three points and I shall seek to deal with them. He advanced the proposition, which may or may not be the case, that the majority of members of the Committee wished to have a Division on amendment No. 27. In response to that, Mr. Morris, you said that it is not always the Chair's duty to respond to the majority. Whether there is or is not a majority, it is extraordinary for the Opposition to propose that a majority should decide whether there should be a vote. [Interruption.] If I may say so, minorities who often seek the protection of the Chair would find the use of a Government majority to thwart their opportunity to express their opinion extremely inconvenient.

5.15 pm

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman said that the Government were seeking to escape a vote on the social chapter. The opposite is the case, because by accepting new clause 75 we are allowing the Committee an opportunity fully to debate the social chapter. Thirdly, the right hon. Gentleman made a series of allegations about Ministers. He has not substantiated those, nor will he be able to do so.

Dr. Cunningham: Downing street is giving a briefing on the view of Ministers. If the right hon. Gentleman is not one of the Ministers who holds the view that I have expressed, he should come clean and tell us on which Ministers' behalf Downing street is giving that briefing.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It may come as a surprise to the right hon. Gentleman when I tell him that I am perfectly well aware of the briefing that is emanating from Downing street and elsewhere. It is not what the right hon. Gentleman has alleged.

Mr. Salmond: I am strongly in favour of the motion to report progress. My first reason for that support is for your benefit, Mr. Morris, in your difficult job of chairing the Committee. That was mentioned in a point of order, and it is by far the most important reason. I fully accept that you found out about the Government's attitude to new clause 75 some 15 minutes before you came to the Chamber to rule on the matter. That was clearly the most important event this afternoon. Almost casually, in the middle of business questions, the Leader of the House observed that the Government had a mind to accept new clause 75.

Before that, it was sustainable, although incorrect, for people to talk up the importance of new clause 75 and describe it as a time bomb ticking away under the Government. As soon as the Leader of the House made his observation, it was clear that the Government regarded new clause 75, irrespective of briefings being given by Downing street, as much less a time bomb and more a damp squib. That must fundamentally change your observations about the relative merits of amendment No. 27 and new clause 75.

I make it clear that in my point of order I did not in any way doubt the fact that you, Mr. Morris, had no prior knowledge of the Government's announcement. On the contrary, I was reinforcing the point, because you were in the same position as other hon. Members and had no knowledge of the Government's apparent change of tack on new clause 75. It is inconceivable that you did not have the time that should have been allowed to make a decision of this magnitude. That is the fundamental reason for reporting progress. We must have time for proper consideration of the relative merits under the new circumstances of amendment No. 27 and new clause 75.

The hon. Member for Copeland spoke about a cooling-off period. Many people would benefit from reconsideration. People outside observing events in the Chamber today and in the past few months may wonder whether this is the place for matters such as Maastricht and the social chapter to be ultimately decided. I do not think that there has been anything so edifying about our proceedings this afternoon that it would suggest to the wider public that this Chamber is capable of making—or will even be allowed to make—decisions on issues of such fundamental constitutional importance as the concept of the social chapter.

[Mr. Salmond]

I hope that, in the time for reflection that the motion to report progress will allow, those on the Labour Benches will look at the question of a referendum on that vital issue, a decision on which will be coming up next week, and at the amendments tabled today to the clauses in a referendum. They would allow for a vote in that referendum on the social chapter and allow the public to make a decision on the matters that will so manifestly not be allowed to be decided, or be capable of being decided, in this place.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am grateful that the Opposition have tabled the motion in this way, without making any criticism of you, Mr. Morris. As you have kindly referred to the letter that I sent you earlier this month, I should like to read out the last paragraph, which says:

"Could I also take the further opportunity of saying in all sincerity as someone who has been around the Euro debates for a long time, that many of us consider you have handled these rather difficult and touchy debates with great courtesy, efficiency and consistency in such a way that no one has a feeling of unfairness."

I meant that sincerely, simply because, although I say nasty things about people, I appreciate that you have performed your role, Mr. Morris, with the courtesy and fairness that is appropriate to the Chairman of Ways and Means.

I support the motion for three reasons. First, things have changed dramatically in the recent past. The statement by the Leader of the House, which came only a few minutes before your statement, Mr. Morris, and no doubt after it was written and then typed, has changed the situation dramatically. They might even be aware of that in Harrow, if they were prepared to listen. The Leader of the House said that the Government, who we understand have been phoning up people in America to ask them whether they would be voting against new clause 75, will now support it. That is a wholly new situation.

You have fairly said, Mr. Morris, that the intention of the Labour party in amendment No. 27 was the same as the intention of the Labour party in new clause 75. The difference is that we shall not have a vote on anything relating to the social chapter before the Queen has to sign Royal Assent. Therefore, the situation has changed dramatically. If we do not have a vote on amendment No. 27, there will be no opportunity for Members of Parliament to express their view on anything relating to the social chapter before the Bill becomes law. That justifies a period of reflection by you, Mr. Morris, on the judgments that you have arrived at, I am sure fairly and reasonably.

The second argument that I should like hon. Members to consider is whether there might be a case for a vote on amendment No. 27 in view of the astonishing statement made by the Foreign Secretary—the second statement on the Government's attitude to amendment No. 27. Hon. Members will appreciate that we had had a statement from the Minister of State which was made with the full authority of legal advice of the Foreign Office, but that the second statement said that that was all wrong and had to be reconsidered.

The astonishing thing was not that the Minister of State was wrong—we have become accustomed to that in these debates—but what happened after that statement. The Foreign Secretary then said that, even if we voted out the protocol from British law, he would still sign the treaty with the protocol in it and, to that extent, Britain would be obliged, under the terms of the treaty of Rome, to pay its share—one twelfth—of the costs of the agreement of the 11 on the social chapter. That is unusual, because the principle involved is whether it is a Community obligation.

Under the treaty of Rome, if an item of spending is a Community obligation, then Britain is obliged to pay, but if it is not a treaty obligation, there is no obligation to pay. In view of the strange and astonishing statement made by the Foreign Secretary, even if we vote against the proposal, it will still happen, and our constituents' money will be paid over. The issue has to be considered carefully by someone else. The only someone else is a court of law, which should have the opportunity to say whether it is right that, even if we remove that section from British law, we shall still have to pay the money.

I have a third argument, which I hope that the Committee will consider. It is a privilege to have hon. Members present to listen to the debate on Maastricht, because the great tragedy has been the low attendance in the debates. I am sure it is not because hon. Members are lazy—I know that they are all hard-working, decent, honourable Members, and that includes my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). However, they do not want to listen to the arguments on Maastricht because, while they know what great damage it will do, they are not sure what they can do about it.

Those hon. Members should appreciate that amendment No. 27 is not about the social chapter, as I am sure that they have been led by the Foreign Office and others to believe. It is about whether their constituents, including those from Harrow, will have to pay over cash to the EEC for the social chapter of the 11 other member states. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East thinks that it is a good idea to pay over money to Brussels, irrespective of the reason, but whether we want to or not, the point is that we should decide. The crucial issue is the old one of no taxation without representation.

Why on earth should my constituents or those of any other hon. Member be obliged to pay over money to Brussels for someone else's social chapter without their Members of Parliament having the right to decide yes or no? That is the issue over amendment No. 27. Some people would think that we should pay over the money and others that we should not. Therefore, I hope that it will be possible, over the weekend, before we return to the debate on Monday, for you and your officers, Mr. Morris, to think carefully about whether it is right and proper to ask taxpayers to pay money without giving the House of Commons the opportunity to say yes or no.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend remember the perceptive remarks, made after the statement by the Secretary of State, of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston)? He said that, where there is a political will, there is a legal way.

Are we not facing a situation in which the Government are determined to get this through come hell or high water, whether or not it is democratic?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I know that my hon. Friend has more experience of the workings of the House, as a Chairman of Committees, than I do. I am sure that there is a great deal in what he says but, if we start talking about those issues, we shall get away from the basic, simple issue that we are meant to be discussing. My hon. Friend has spoken with great sincerity on something that is important and right. However, let us concentrate on the simple and basic issue of whether it is right for people who have fought hard to come to the House of Commons and become Members of Parliament, who have done their best to serve their constituents, to sit back and allow taxation to be paid over without having the opportunity to express their view.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) hit the nail on the head, as he so often does. He said that, if we allow this huge precedent to go through, other taxation issues, on which Members of Parliament will not be allowed to express their view, will be allowed to go through.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the important point that he is making about taxation and our duties to our constituents goes to the heart of the treaty? Under the proposals of stage 2, not even to mention stage 3, the whole question of the basis on which our constituents will have their monetary affairs decided, public expenditure, the exchange rate mechanism, and other policies, are intimately bound up with the question of money. It is the prerogative of the House of Commons to decide those issues. That will be affected not only by the provisions that I have referred to, but by the provision to which my hon. Friend referred, in relation to the social chapter.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is right to make that important and huge point about the destruction of democracy, which those who follow these debates know is happening. However, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), there is no point in debating such great issues when what we are deciding on this motion is a simple issue.

5.30 pm

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): As a parliamentarian of great experience, does my hon. Friend agree that the spending of money will not be addressed by their Lordships when they consider the matter in the other place? Therefore, if we are deprived of an opportunity to vote on this money matter, there will be no vote on it in Parliament. That is thoroughly undesirable and that is why we in this House have been given the power to consider monetary matters and the other place has not. With that power goes the right to vote on the issue.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As usual, my hon. and learned Friend is right. That was to be my fifth point, although I may not have expressed it so fairly and clearly. If we do not vote on the amendment on the control of cash, the other place will not be able to.

The fourth point that I was about to make concerned the question of precedent. I hope that it will be possible to reflect during the weekend. I have been searching for precedents but I can find only two. One was on 23 March 1964 and the other was on 11 June 1968. Both related to Back-Bench amendments and neither was in relation to an official Opposition amendment or announced, as in this case, weeks after the debate took place.

Finally, I appeal to the Liberal Democrats. The sad thing is that, as those who have fears about proportional representation know, at present the Liberal Democrats basically decide everything. I think that they know that this particular motion will not be decided by those who share my views, by the Opposition or by the Scottish Nationalists who attend these debates so regularly and who contribute in such a fair and objective way; it will be decided by the Liberal Democrats.

The Liberal Democrats have a simple decision to make. Is it right and proper that we should reflect over the weekend about whether it is a good or bad thing to vote on amendment No. 27? That is all we ask. We are not seeking to overturn the Government. We are in no way seeking to cast any reflection on the Chairman of Ways and Means, for whom I have a greater regard than any previous Chairman because of what he has done throughout this long Committee. If anyone doubts that, they should have been here to see how he has gone out of his way to protect minorities.

We are not trying to overturn the Government or the treaty. [Interruption.] I am. Make no mistake about it. I shall do everything in my power to stop the treaty being ratified because it is an affront to destroy people's democracy and to take rights from them without giving the people an opportunity to have their say. However, that is the third great argument, and I cannot get into that. The crucial thing is to appreciate that we are considering something simple and basic. The only issue is whether the Chairman, with the help of his advisers and in the light of a new situation which arose only 15 minutes before he rose to speak, should have the opportunity to reflect on whether we should vote on amendment No. 27. That is all we are asking for.

The Liberal Democrats have a great tradition of fighting for people's rights. History shows how the Liberal Democrats represented free trade and how, despite all the difficulties facing them, they have gone out of their way to do what they think right in fighting for people's rights and for democracy. I hope that on this one occasion they will say that it is not a question of being for or against Maastricht, or for or against the Government, but a question of what is right and proper for a democratic House of Commons.

It would be an affront to our constituents if we were to in any way permit taxation to be applied without a vote of the Members of the House of Commons. In view of the Government's astonishing decision to support new clause 75 instead of opposing it, it would be an affront not to reflect on that further. Therefore, I hope that, in the unique power and opportunity that they now have, the Liberal Democrats will vote to think over the matter during the weekend. Such a decision would not bring down the economy or the nation; it just means thinking about something for a few days.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber) rose——

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman is going to vote to beat the rail strike.

Sir Russell Johnston: It is all a bit messy. I have never really participated in any debate quite like this before. We are debating a motion to report progress. Usually such a motion is about getting on with the business, but this is about not getting on with the business. The effect of agreeing to the motion will, presumably, be a short further delay in the Committee stage—and to beat the rail strike, as the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) rightly pointed out, but that is incidental.

As the House knows, the Liberal Democrats believe in getting the Bill through as expeditiously as possible. Usually, therefore, we would oppose a motion of this sort if we felt that it was being introduced to prevent that. We do not agree with those who have sought, by all means possible, to delay the Bill, and we also regret that the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, being declared supporters of Maastricht, have at no stage sought a reasonable, even a behind-the-Chair, agreement with the Government about rational progress in the timetable of the Bill. That would have been the right thing to do.

The motion has been moved because of amendment No. 27, the idea being, as expressed by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), to allow time for reconsideration. That is odd in a way, too, because we are not supposed to debate your ruling, Mr. Morris, at all. Yet, in a way, we are, or at least we are running close to it. That is also odd.

According to the Attorney-General, amendment No. 27 would have no legal effect whatever and, therefore, it would not matter if it were agreed to. The right hon. Member for Copeland said that that was open to question. The higher metaphysics of the law will always produce something that is open to question. I am quite prepared to accept that what the Attorney-General says is true. I do not know. I have no means of arguing in any sensible way against it. However, it would nevertheless be a symbolic vote. There is no doubt about that—I think. But I am not even sure about that in a way. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but consider this——

Mr. Skinner: What does the right hon. Gentleman tell the electorate?

Sir Russell Johnston: Will the hon. Gentleman be quiet for a minute?

The Euro-sceptics on the Government Benches would vote for amendment No. 27 because they do not believe in it. Practically all of them being to the right of the Conservative party, they are against the social chapter. Therefore, many Conservatives, and perhaps—with all respect to the right hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor)—a critical number of Conservative Members would vote for the social chapter because they were against Maastricht and for no other reason.

Meanwhile, in the rest of the Conservative party, a number of Members who are in favour of the social chapter would, in these circumstances, vote against it. So hon. Members may laugh and say, "Ha ha, he cannot make up his mind," but I am just trying to point out to the Committee that none of this is simple and easy. To claim that in some way or other this vote produces a clear result and shows what hon. Members think is not true. Therefore, it is difficult.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Russell Johnston: Yes, but, alas, I am not right hon. yet.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I see that the hon. Gentleman is blushing. It is quite clear what the attitude of the Committee is to the mistake I made, so I wish the hon. Gentleman good fortune.

Is the hon. Gentleman, as the spokesman for the Liberal party, prepared to accept the expenditure of money by other countries without the House having the right to vote on that expenditure? If so, how does he equate that decision with the traditional view of the Liberal party about spending and the need for parliamentary approval?

Sir Russell Johnston: I do not deny that the issue is important, but it is not what we are talking about in this argument. We are talking about a large number of hon. Members who wish to express a view about whether Britain should accept the social chapter. I was simply pointing out that the trouble is that, because of the nature of the break-up of support in the Committee—unless we have a free vote—it will be very difficult to secure a result that genuinely reflects views. That is a big problem.

As for the basic issue and the business statement about new clause 75, I have not had a proper opportunity to think it over. It was described by some as the "Semtex amendment" that would explode everything; it was said to be a very pertinent amendment. It was the replacement of amendment No. 27—there is no doubt about that; that is how it was conceived—and now, suddenly, we can accept it; it does not matter; it is all right; no problem. I find that very difficult to rationalise.

For once in my life I am prepared to agree with the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor)—even at great risk to my privy councillorship—that a pause for consideration is sensible in the circumstances.

You, Mr. Morris, have chaired the Committee in a magnificent and fair way. Nothing that I say in any way reflects on you.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I trust that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) will soon become a right hon. Member and that—having announced his aspirations in a delightful way—he has not sabotaged them with his final sentences.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) rose to intervene, I heard some of my hon. Friends say, from a sedentary position, "Be kind to him, Ivan." They were willing him to vote on their side. He has clearly satisfied their demands and they will therefore support any recommendation that may be made in that regard. I was glad that the hon. Gentleman ended with a tribute to you, Mr. Morris, because I believe that anyone who is fair-minded and has watched the proceedings of the Committee can only come to the conclusion that you have performed an exceptionally difficult job extremely well.

There can have been few occasions during the post-war history of Parliament when minorities have had a better opportunity to voice their legitimate opinions. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East acknowledges that.

What troubles me is that in another guise—until the hon. Gentleman defused the situation with his speech—we came close to embarking upon a criticism of a ruling of the Chair. That is a very dangerous precedent to establish. The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) talked about dangerous precedents; if there is a dangerous precedent at issue this afternoon, it is that. The cornerstone of the House and the whole constitution of this country is the impartiality of the Chair. I believe, Mr. Morris, that you have upheld that extremely well since you acceded to the post of Chairman of Ways and Means. I hope that you will long continue to hold that office.

One expert in procedure, who contributed a particularly perceptive point of order this afternoon, is the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). We do not always agree on political issues, but I yield to none in my admiration for him as an expert on procedure in the House. He made the important point—which has been taken up by others—that there will be a Report stage. On Report, certain things will obviously be debated; it is up to Madam Speaker precisely what they will be.

5.45 pm

When the House first meets in any new Parliament, the first thing that it does is to elect a Speaker—someone elected by the House in whom the House, by that election, reposes its trust and confidence. It seems to me, Mr. Morris, that there should be no challenging of your ruling, which you have made with expert advice. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), I speak as a member of the panel of Chairmen. It is not easy to come to decisions on amendments, and there may well be an amendment about which there are passionate views, but which is just out of order; or it may not be possible to select it or call it for voting. You have made your decision honourably and rightly, Mr. Morris, but there will be another opportunity to debate it. It would be far better if we proceeded with our discussions today.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said about me, although it is not necessarily true. But he has just gone a shade further than he really needs to. I think that he is right to say that "we hope" that there will be that opportunity, but I hope he will agree that there is no guarantee that there will be.

Mr. Cormack: I am sorry if I was not entirely clear. I said that we know that there will be a Report stage. What I was seeking to say is that, because we know that there will be that Report stage, it would be far more sensible not to attack, directly or indirectly, the ruling of the Chair and to accept that he has—whatever we may think of his ruling—agonised over it. It would now be appropriate for those who feel strongly about the issue to make representations not to the Chairman, but to Madam Speaker. She will have ample time between now and the Report stage to reflect on all the issues and, having taken advice and, in her wisdom, to decide whether she feels this issue should be put to the vote. I accept that my hon. Friends feel very strongly about the issue, but the Committee is not being denied a final opportunity this afternoon.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: The worry for many of us on both sides of the Committee is that the ruling that has been made sets an important constitutional precedent and therefore can be cited again. I asked earlier about the Finance Bill. Here we have a precedent relating to the expenditure of money, in which the Chairman may decide—as a matter of power taken unto himself, on the authority of the House—that questions which are of importance to our perception on behalf of our constituents or this country may not be put to a vote. That is what we are challenging, and surely we are right to challenge it.

Mr. Cormack: I do not believe that my hon. Friend is correct in his deductions and conclusions. I do not believe that any Chairman of the Finance Bill Committee—I have done the job myself on a couple of occasions—would act in the way that my hon. Friend suggests or supposes. [Interruption.]

We are all entitled to our opinions. I do not believe that the Chairman of Ways and Means, in taking his decision today, has in any way created a dangerous constitutional precedent. What I am saying—and I appeal to all members of the Committee—is that we damage our Chair at our peril and to the danger of our Parliament.

Mr. Salmond: Does not the hon. Gentleman consider that the real damage to the Chair came from the announcement during business questions which put the Chair in the almost impossible position of having only 15 minutes to consider this vital matter? Does he accept that the real damage to the Chair came from his own Front Bench?

Mr. Cormack: The point that I make once again—and it is the most important point of all—is that this is not the final opportunity. There is to be a Report stage. It is entirely up to those hon. Members who feel strongly on the issue to make their detailed representations to Madam Speaker, who will have not 15 minutes but probably far more than 15 days to come to a decision. I believe that it would be in the interests of the Committee and of those who still look to the House of Commons for some sort of democratic guidance to get on with the business that we are supposed to be discussing.

Mr. Spearing: You have decided, Mr. Morris, that we should debate the motion to report progress. I view that as a procedural safety valve. It allows pause for reflection, at least for a short while. We shall then decide whether to have a longer period for reflection. I support that, for a number of reasons which are self-evident.

May I take up the point made by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) about another opportunity for further representations, an opportunity which may or may not arise? On this issue, I disagree straight away, perhaps unusually, with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who said that the whole thing was a stitch-up. I happen to believe that, as far as we can provide for it, the procedures of the House are there to prevent stitch-ups. Occasionally there are attempts to have stitch-ups, but in my experience when someone in some way tries to stitch up something, we usually run into procedural trouble.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Like today.

Mr. Spearing: Yes, indeed. I said that someone may try to stitch up something. When, therefore, we get into procedural trouble, the yellow lights flash, not just for those who may have precipitated the situation but for Parliament itself.

People complain that Parliament is not dealing properly with the Bill. That, I suggest, may be because of the nature of the Bill and the nature of the material—just as the body tries to reject something that is indigestible and that may come up in the other direction.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is renowned in the House of Commons for his understanding of its procedures. Can he quote to me any precedent when a leading Opposition motion, in the names of official Opposition spokesmen, pressing for an amendment has been refused on any major piece of legislation going through the House of Commons?

[Mr. Nicholas Winterton]

Mr. Spearing: I do not want to go too far down that road. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] I know of no precedent in that respect. I bear in mind the terrible difficulties faced by any occupant of the Chair, whoever it may be. Therefore, I can divine certain reasons why the decision has been made, but it does not mean that, if I were the occupant of that Chair, I would come to the same conclusion. I intend to devote the rest of my remarks to saying why it should be possible for a decision on amendment No. 27 to be taken. I hope, Mr. Morris, that you will take that remark in the spirit in which it is proffered.

To revert to the question of yellow flashing lights, this is not the first problem that we have encountered. There has been a succession of constitutional and procedural hiccups along the way. To take the treaty that we are discussing, it was published four weeks after the general election, which was supposed to give the House of Commons a mandate to pass it. That, surely, was a major constitutional hiccup that we should not forget.

Furthermore, this is a treaty to amend another treaty, which would produce a third treaty. That is not before us, either as a treaty or in the Bill. The Minister of State is not here. When we asked him on several occasions whether he would print that treaty—for it will be a treaty of union, if it goes through—he said no. The Government are not prepared to produce a document that would certainly result from the Bill being passed and the treaty ratified.

There is also the fact that one member of the European Community has said no to the treaty. Unanimity, however, is required. Many people thought that that was it—that we would not proceed with the Bill because, under article 236, there was no unanimity. But some people said, "Oh, no, there is going to be some arrangement." So the Prime Minister said, "All right, we'll pause now," which was quite fair, "but we'll have a vote as to whether to proceed at all."

At Edinburgh a decision was taken by the Council of Ministers that has no vires whatsoever. The Minister of State agreed only yesterday that it makes no difference at all to Denmark's obligations. Denmark's referendum, therefore, is a repeat of something to which the Danish people said no. That is another curious constitutional hiccup along the way.

Then we had the debate which the Prime Minister offered. It was a most dramatic and extraordinary parliamentary occasion and was won by a few votes. All sorts of accusations were made. If that vote had not gone the Prime Minister's way, we should not have embarked upon the proceedings on this Bill, would we—or re-embarked upon them? That was another curious incident in the night, as Conan Doyle would have said.

The Bill is very brief. It details with over 200 articles of a treaty and 16 protocols, but we decided to discuss the contents of that treaty in a tiny Bill. Of course, there are procedural difficulties which you, Mr. Morris, and the rest of us have had to grapple with. The media say, "Can't Parliament get its act together?", even though Parliament is being asked to digest something that is highly indigestible.

That brings us to the difficulties of today. We all knew, including you, Mr. Morris, that at about 4 o'clock today we should reach crunch time. So many issues had to be decided all at once. We had to know your decisions on amendments Nos. 27 and 75; we had to know what debates we were to have; we had to know which amendments had or had not been selected; we had to know what the result of the vote immediately after the debate would be. Into that maelstrom of decision taking and 10 minutes before that announcement was due to be made, the Government made an announcement of their own, which could change the complexion of the debate altogether.

We are therefore in the position—and you, Mr. Morris, are in the most unenviable one—of having all these things coming together procedurally at one moment. Of course, there are difficulties. I put it to you that the reason for the difficulties is that most constitutional and parliamentary proprieties have been ignored. Nothing so far may have happened that is outside the rules of procedure, but those rules have been stretched to breaking point.

We have to ask who is responsible for stretching constitutional practice and the rules of the House of Commons to breaking point and, moreover, in what cause they have done it. Having asked a rhetorical question, I shall give a factual answer. The cause for which they have done it is to pass power away from the House of Commons. Is that an honourable cause? Is it honourable to stretch the rules of procedure? No.

Therefore, we come to the unenviable decision that you, Mr. Morris, have to make on amendment No. 27. I can see that there are some reasons for it, but I would also suggest to you that there are other reasons which should be taken into account. I put it no higher than that. People look to the House of Commons to provide parliamentary practice as it should be. I would not put it as high as that. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover said that this is the mother of Parliaments. I believe, as Lord St. John Stevas would say, that that is wrong. It is the United Kingdom which is the mother of Parliaments. Nevertheless, the procedures of this place are the envy of some other Parliaments that I could name.

What do we do? The procedure is that we have a motion, question, debate and decision. Everything is decided in that way. That is the sequence of events and the rules are fairly clear. If a motion or an amendment is selected, there is a motion to move it. The Chair then proposes the question that the motion or amendment be made. We then have a debate, followed by a procedure for closing the debate and a decision. I remind the House that, at that point, an hon. Member is entitled to request to withdraw the motion. Only one out of 600 or so hon. Members has to say no for the decision to be made because the question has been put and the debate has been conducted.

People outside and in the world as a whole will see that an important question has been put, whatever its purport and whether it means nothing or everything. They will see that it has been debated, but then, for some curious reason, the House is denied the opportunity of coming to a decision. They will realise that something is wrong. It will be not only the yellow lights that are flashing, but red ones, and doubly red ones at that.

Just as justice has not only to be done but be seen to be done, so our debates must lead to a decision. If they do not, democracy had better look out.

6 pm

Sir Peter Emery: I am concerned about this debate because it seems that, although it is wrapped in cotton wool, there is a criticism of decisions made by the Chair. Following the speech of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), we are beginning to talk about democracy and also about destruction, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). It is strange that, although more than 240 hon. Members voted for the Bill on Second Reading, some now believe that democracy is being frustrated because a small minority who oppose the Bill find that they cannot get exactly what they want.

Several hon. Members rose——

Sir Peter Emery: I have no intention of giving way.

Another issue of great importance is the fact that your decisions, Mr. Morris, whenever they are made, should be accepted without question by any hon. Member. If there is any doubt about that——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In view of the line that my right hon. Friend is taking, will you advise the Committee whether it is in order for hon. Members to change their minds about the Bill? Second Reading took place nearly a year ago and many events have occurred since then. My right hon. Friend is suggesting that it is not in order for hon. Members to change their minds.

The Chairman: That is not a point of order for the Chair. I hope that we can now listen to the right hon. Gentleman, who is dealing with important matters.

Sir Peter Emery: Under the Standing Orders as set out in "Erskine May", it is absolutely clear that, in a debate on a motion to report progress, the Chair does not give reasons for its decisions on selecting amendments——

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Is it a new point of order and a matter for the Chair?

Mr. Cash: It is indeed. My right hon. Friend is referring to "Erskine May", a pretty weighty matter in itself. He is telling us that, under Standing Orders, the Chair does not give reasons for the selection or otherwise of amendments. If he had read further and glanced at page 405, he would have seen that it is modern practice, not a question of Standing Orders, whether a reason should or should not be given for selecting amendments. He should perhaps cast his eye down and read a little more carefully.

The Chairman: That has nothing to do with the Chair. We should let the right hon. Gentleman make his speech as he wishes to make it.

Sir Peter Emery: If my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) wants the reference, it is page 405, the third paragraph and the last sentence. That is the end of the sentence.

The Committee knows that there is something inherently wrong with our challenging the Chair on its decision whether or not to select amendments. When that happens, we get ourselves into exactly the situation that we are now in. We are having a debate——

Mr. Wilkinson: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend in full flow, but surely the motion we are debating is whether we should report progress. No one is suggesting any criticism of you, Mr. Morris, and my right hon. Friend is wrong to infer that we are.

Sir Peter Emery: Obviously, I have been listening to a different debate from my hon. Friend. If the debate is not about whether an amendment should or should not be selected and voted on, I do not know what the devil it is about. For my hon. Friend to suggest that that is not the point of the motion to report progress shows that he is as much out of touch on this aspect as he is on the whole of Maastricht.

It is absolutely clear to me that the moment the Chair bends over backwards to be generous and give reasons for its decisions, it opens itself to the sort of problems that have arisen today. It is interesting to note that when you decided, Mr. Morris, that there should be a vote on new clause 75 in place of amendment No. 27, there was no major criticism of you. If we had proceeded to a vote on new clause 75 and the Labour party and its allies had won, there would have been much rejoicing and a belief that the Government had been defeated. Now that the Government are willing to accept the new clause, there is no rejoicing. This motion is merely another attempt to snare the Government.

Those who talk about money should reconsider the original debates on the Single European Act. The way in which control over money matters was handed over then is much greater than anything suggested in the Bill. People should realise that there is a lot of pseudo-rhetoric which has nothing to do—[Interruption.]

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has the right to be heard. Hon. Members may not agree with him, but they should listen. He is a senior Member of the House.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have been listening with great interest to my right hon. Friend. I dare say that he is coming to a conclusion. May I simplify matters by suggesting that what he wants to say is that the House should not vote on anything?

Sir Peter Emery: No one has made that suggestion. That is exactly the calibre of debate that we have when we get ourselves into this situation.

I repeat for the last time that in future the Chair might be best advised not to bend over backwards to help some hon. Members who have been pressing for reasons but to reach a decision without giving reasons, as "Erskine May" suggests. We should not then have a debate, and there would not be the sort of problem that we have at the moment.

Mr. Skinner: I do not know whether I shall be smearing anybody, but at the outset I say that the decision made today by the Chair was appalling. I do not accept for one moment anything other than what my instincts tell me.

[Mr. Skinner]

When I spoke before Easter, when a short statement was made about new clause 75, I stood where I am standing now and said to you, Mr. Morris, that I smelt a rat. I believe that events have proved that I was right.

At the very beginning we were told that our only real opportunity to defeat the Government was the social chapter. It is true that we defeated them on the Committee of the Regions, but nobody really expected that. However, when it comes to main Maastricht issues, everybody—everybody in the media and even millions of people outside who do not follow such events carefully—knew, because of all the comments that had been made, that the social chapter was the one issue on which the Government stood to lose. At the beginning things were difficult because some of the Tories who voted against Maastricht were a bit unsure of their ground on the social chapter—I fully understand that. But after a while they came to the conclusion that that was the only way that they could undermine the treaty. The whole Labour party was going to vote in the same way; the Liberals, for about the only time, were going to vote that way too, and so were all the other minority parties.

What the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) says about people outside not understanding the issue is fanciful. They understand only too well that the Government were in peril on amendment No. 27. When new clause 75 was tabled, some of us suspected that there was some murky work afoot. I have never taken the view—you in the Chair can accept this or not, Mr. Morris—that the Chair of the House of Commons is immune from the Government and the establishment. You can call that criticism, or call it what you like, but I have never varied from that point of view. Events show me that, generally speaking, the Government are expected to get their measures through. That is what it is all for. The establishment is there to win and the Opposition are there to try to defeat it on occasions. I went through the whole period 1974 to 1979, and I know what happens when the Chair is faced with a dilemma. I saw it all then, so I do not want any lectures about the idea that somehow or other Mr. Morris should be immune from criticism.

We are debating an issue that is in a time warp. Maastricht is about yesterday; it is not about tomorrow. The treaty is all about an issue that is past its sell-by date, and some Tory Members know that. They may understand it for reasons different from those that influence us, but they are strong enough to stand up against the treaty. Thousands of other people in the Tory party must support what they have done over the past few weeks.

What has happened with all the jiggery-pokery? When the Government first realised that they were in a mess they brought out the Attorney-General. You can believe him if you like, but he is a member of the Cabinet and his job was to lay a trail to try to separate the Tory rebels, the Liberal Democrats and the Labour party. That is what the game has been all about from the beginning, because there was a majority for amendment No. 27. How could the Government get off the hook? Then, suddenly, new clause 75 appeared. I do not know who invented that, which heads were discussing the issue—[HON. MEMBERS: "The Opposition."] I know whose names are on the amendment paper, but I wondered whether there had been other discussions.

Let us assume for a moment that the new clause was tabled innocently. The Government realised straight away what a great opportunity it presented. What a chance to try to shift the debate on to another issue. I believe that the stage was then set for a betrayal. That is why I said what I did at that time.

Today at 1.30 on the BBC Ceefax, there it was. Ceefax said that there would be a ruling in the House of Commons today and that the Chairman of Ways and Means would not allow a vote on amendment No. 27. I came to the House and mentioned that to one or two people and they asked me whether I had got it right. I said that I had read the item several times. So it was no surprise to me when a further trail was woven in the Committee today. However, in the 23 years that I have been in the House, including my early days when I used to listen to the arguments in Committees, I have never known of one occasion when the Chair has not allowed a vote on an amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition—although there have been many occasions when the tin-pot Liberals have moved an amendment and the Chair has said that, on balance, a vote would not be allowed.

6.15 pm

I find it odd that people in the other countries can have a referendum but we cannot even have a vote in the House of Commons. The Danes can have a referendum; they have even had to have a second one, and I hope that people will be singing, "Wonderful, Wonderful Copenhagen" again in a few weeks' time. The Danes might save us all the bother. The French and the Irish can have referendums but the Prime Minister, banging the Dispatch Box, told us, "We do not do things like that here; we discuss things line by line and clause by clause, and we vote on the issues. That is our wonderful parliamentary democracy. It is not for us to have referendums or to go to the people; we have a super democracy that enables us to decide." That was until the Government realised that they would lose. Then they conveniently found ways and means to dodge the column. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ways and Means."] I choose my words carefully.

This is a sad day. You can call it democracy if you like, but I do not believe that Maastricht is about democracy; it is about selling out to Brussels, Germany and all the rest. It sickens me to think that, after the halcyon days of the Common Market are over, some people here still believe in it; they are stuck in that little cocoon in which the Rome treaty and the Maastricht treaty will bring in all the goodies for Britain. Let us understand that treaties do not last for ever. Why should this treaty last much longer than it already has?

What has happened today is a disgrace. Millions of people out there will say, "Why should we bother sending MPs to Parliament? Why get involved?" When Members get to Parliament some of them betray their promises; I understand that. They may not do it for Machiavellian reasons, but none the less they do it. But we have seen an example of something else today, and it has not been about run of the mill Members of Parliament or Governments; it has been a conspiracy in which the decision has been made that, having been prevented by the Government from having a referendum, the British people are to be stopped from even having a vote, through their representatives, on the crucial issue. Everybody knows—the dogs were barking it in Bolsover—that the Government were in trouble on amendment No. 27. Every inch of print on Maastricht has been mainly about this issue, as have all the comments that have been made. Then we have the appalling experience of finding out that there will not be a vote.

They call this place the mother of Parliaments. They tell the eastern countries to copy us, that they have never understood democracy. They say, let us take it to Czechoslovakia, Romania and Bulgaria; let us tell them how to do things, because we are super-democratic. Yet, when we can have as many votes as we like on all the little issues, when 60 people go into the Lobby, on the crucial issue, when it seemed that the Government were in peril, the official Opposition and the other Opposition parties, and those on the Conservative Benches who were going to join us, have been deprived of the crucial vote. It stinks to high heaven.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There have been many tributes to the Chair during this Committee, and I would like to pay tribute to the Chairman for the imaginative way in which the proceedings have been conducted this afternoon.

We had to imagine that the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was standing when the Division was called; we had to imagine that he was wearing a hat when he was seated and raised a point of order, because he got that wrong; and we have to imagine that he is listening to the debate on reporting progress—a debate that was accepted on his motion.

Just to remind the Committee of what is happening, we are debating a three-clause Bill that fills one side of a sheet of paper. It is a debate which has been going on, in effect, for nearly a year, following a Second Reading in which the House, with a majority of well over 200, gave its blessing to the principle of the Bill. It is my belief that when we come to the Third Reading, we will have a majority of between 250 and 300.

I believe that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was right in saying that the Government's tactics were designed to divide hon. Members on the Conservative Benches who are flatly against the Bill, because they are flatly against the European Community; from the Labour party——

Mr. Wilkinson: No: it is about a referendum.

Mr. Bottomley: If my hon. Friend will listen to me with his ears, rather than use his mouth, for a moment, I will make my point.

The Government are trying—I think rightly—to divide those who are against the European Community from the Labour party, whose official policy is to support the Bill. When the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) ended his speech with a great shout about the powers that he believed were to be transferred to the European Community, he was shouting against the official policy of the Labour party.

One of the difficulties for people trying to follow these debates is that they get the impression that the Labour party has lost its principles over Europe. They expect the Labour party to be opposed to Europe. The Labour party has changed its policy, but many of its supporters and many of its Back Benchers reject that change of policy. That is why the present leader of the Labour party, who in the late 1970s voted against his party when it was opposed to the European Community, is now supporting the European Community against some of the votes in the Committee that would make it possible for us to endorse the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

I believe that it comes down to the disappointment of those who expected to get approval of new clause 75, or at least to have a jolly good row and argument about it, and would have lived with the fact that they could not get a vote on amendment No. 27. Now that they have heard that the Government are minded to accept new clause 75, they are in a similar position to Lord Denning, I think it was, who, when he heard that the House of Lords had upheld his view on an appeal, shook his head sadly and said that he still thought that he was right.

My view is that those who are desperately keen to use the social chapter element to try to wreck the progress of this Bill through the House are in great fear that, by getting a vote on the social chapter after the Bill has had its Third Reading, they will have to decide whether to vote against the social chapter, which they are against, or to vote for it in the hope that it will do more damage.

In the mid-1980s I was asked by a Belgian Minister why so many people in Britain opposed the fifth company directive and Vredeling—in effect, the predecesors of the social chapter. I said that half the people who opposed them had never read them, and the other half had read them. He said that nobody had ever explained it to him that clearly before.

We have to accept that the social chapter does not apply to people in most white collar occupations; the limits on hours and the like do not apply to European Commissioners. The social chapter applies only to working people, who are the ones who get the overtime from the extra hours.

The fact that the Labour party is arguing for that and being joined by some of my hon. Friends demonstrates clearly that the Committee ought not to pass this motion, but that we ought to make progress by returning to the new clauses and amendments, and to the Bill itself. I hope that within a few weeks we shall be able to say to the country, as I say to my association, that the Bill should be passed and we should go on trying to build a better future for this country in partnership within Europe.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I have one basic proposition to offer in support of the motion that the Committee report progress. As a relatively new Member—although I do not know how long one can continue to describe oneself as new—I found the contribution of the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) very flippant. I believe that all hon. Members, irrespective of their points of view, must recognise that there are serious and fundamental issues at stake.

If new clause 75 was ever a time bomb—with all due respect to my hon. Friends, I doubt that—it has become a damp squib. That is because we have had a shameful example of manoeuvring by the Government this afternoon and we should not be duped by it.

Many of us were in the Committee, Mr. Morris, when you took your original decision and I do not believe that any rules were breached. I believe that your decision was reached in good faith and that you continue to operate in that way. When the decision was referred to by right hon. and hon. Members at that time, you beseeched us to read new clause 75 before making up our minds.

[Mr. George Stevenson]

I left the Committee worried about this, but nevertheless prepared to accept that you had taken the view that this fundamental issue of the social chapter needed to be debated and voted on by the Committee and by the House. You had decided that new clause 75 made it possible to meet this objective and was therefore the new clause that should be voted on. But there was never any doubt in my mind—although I am prepared to accept your advice, Mr. Morris, and that of hon. Members with more experience than I have—that the Committee wanted to vote on the clause concerned with the social chapter.

We are now to be denied that right and I am not prepared to consider satisfactory the point made by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who said that there would perhaps be an opportunity at Report stage for this vital issue to be resurrected. There is no guarantee of that, as right hon. and hon. Members have said. Therefore, this fundamental issue will remain subject to a decision that may or may not allow the will and wishes of the House—or allow the will and wishes of your good self, Mr. Morris, as you took the original decision—to be expressed through a vote.

6.30 pm

Mr. Cash: As the hon. Gentleman has recalled the suggestion made by the Chairman of Ways and Means that he should read new clause 75 with more care, did he also note that the Chairman said of the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham):

> "I have given a substantive answer and made an offer to the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads new clause 75 with a little more care."—[Official Report, 30 March 1993; Vol. 222, c. 164.]

In other words, there was a supposed trade-off being offered between amendments Nos. 27 and 75. The Chairman went on, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), to say: "I listen to submissions." In other words, we can now make indirect submissions through the debate, and that will, I hope, be an oppportunity for the Chairman to listen to the respectful remarks currently being made.

Mr. Stevenson: I am prepared to accept the hon. Gentleman's reading of the record because that is a matter of fact, but I cannot accept or otherwise the interpretation he puts on it, as I am sure he will understand.

In all the deliberations of the Committee on this fundamental issue, there has never been any doubt that, one way or another, it must be voted on. I wanted a vote on amendment No. 27 because it had been debated at length. In my naivety, perhaps, I thought that that would be the case as, I have no doubt, did the Government at that time. I agreed entirely with the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) about new clause 75, which I have read on many occasions. I certainly do not agree with the interpretation of many right hon. Members and hon. Members that it is an alternative to amendment No. 27. Nevertheless, one is prepared to accept that there are different points of view. I repeat that in all this discussion there has never been any doubt that a vote should be taken.

The machinations of certain hon. Members, who want to sweep the issue under the carpet and to pretend that nothing has happened so we should continue with the debates, are not good enough. If such machinations had happened in local authorities, those same hon. Members would be jumping to their feet and condemning those local authorities as undemocratic. That is what we are in danger of becoming here.

I hope that the motion will be supported. If there was ever a time that the Committee needed to stand back and to reflect on what was happening and to what we were being asked to agree, this is it. I beseech the Committee to support the motion. Let us reflect on the situation, which has changed as a result of what I consider to be the quick and clever manoeuvre by the Government of seeking to support new clause 75.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: We are debating a motion to report progress. For me, progress has been too rapid. Earlier, Mr. Morris, you drew attention to the number of days during which the Bill has been debated in Committee. I reflect that we had, for example, fewer than six hours on citizenship. That is the most profound concept, which touches on who we are and what we are about—the very nature of our society. Yet in 1981, when you and I were both Members of Parliament, Mr. Morris, we spent 51 days on the British Nationality Bill, with a guillotine, and with three days on Report. How can anyone think that 22 or 23 days is sufficient to discuss the nature of the British constitution, which is fundamental to our view of democracy, and how we control the laws, the Government and the instruments of power in our society?

The Government send junior Ministers to argue what they claim is their central policy—the ratification of Maastricht. We should remember that the intent of the ratification of Maastricht is to remove beyond the call of the British people and the British voter powers to affect the central finances of their state. That will determine their levels of employment, their interest rates, output and deflation which are central to the control of the civil society of the United Kingdom.

Intolerant Members say, "How outrageous it is that we have spent as many as five hours discussing this point." I am glad that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) is here. Now that I have him in my sights, I know that he is attending part of the debate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That is a cheer. All too often the impatient outside are those who are not prepared to attend the debate inside. They can therefore announce that these are trivial matters. In fact, the Bill contains acceptance of the concept that its measures should be irrevocable and irreversible. There is no mechanism in the Bill for winding back its provisions, despite the disaster of the exchange rate mechanism.

An important point worries me about your ruling, Mr. Morris. I share the view of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). The House of Commons and its Committees must be able to discuss everything, including the conduct of the Chair. That point is at the heart of how we satisfy the needs of our constituents. I do not make the point lightly. When I watch the progress of business—I know that I must have misunderstood, Mr. Morris—I have seen you share the attention of the Deputy Chief Whip, I have seen you looking at the clock at quarter to the hour and I have seen a nod go between you. I foolishly conceived that as an agreement that there would be an acceptance of a closure motion. I know that that must be wrong, so I make the point with diffidence. However, the watching of each day and the timing of each debate has caused us to gallop through some of the most profound concepts.

We had a Home Secretary who was not quite sure whether the Queen became a citizen. He saw no reason why not. The matter is taken with that amount of levity. We are talking profoundly about our institutions; that is all that the debate has been about. That is why, when we argue our contentions, we think that it is appropriate and proper that the Bill should have been proceeded with at a more gentle pace. The constitution of the United States was not formed in 22 days. The Government, no less, cannot send more than two Cabinet Ministers—their Front-Bench team—to argue propositions that affect the nature of our constitution. I am afraid that that approach has characterised the debate.

The principle, which I raised with the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), to whom I am extremely grateful for introducing this debate, that the Chair may now not accept amendments that would allow us to vote on finance during the passage of the Finance Bill is important. What is left to us of our control over the economy will require us from time to time to vote on it. Yet no Minister makes much of that. Ministers say that these are not considerable matters.

Our argument is that this is not finally a matter for the House of Commons, because we are only the surrogates for the people out there. I, like all hon. Members, stand here because people voted for me. We are trying now to take away the effectiveness of that vote. That decision should be taken solemnly, yet we cannot table an amendment requiring a referendum because, we are told, there is no money resolution. That is curious, because the Bill is an amendment to an earlier Act that had a money resolution.

We asked the Government how, if amendment No. 27 were passed, they could pay money to the other 11 parties, outside the treaty itself. How could that be? How is it that two answers are sometimes cited? One is that the original money resolution of 1972 gives authority for every subsequent payment and therefore will be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Yet when I or any hon. Member says that there should be a referendum, we then have to go round the most fanciful track, play cat and mouse with the Chair, go upstairs to Mr. McKay to seek advice and we are then told that it can only be done in a courted and difficult manner. Why can we not be direct on such an important matter?

If the ruling stays or sticks, the country and the House, until such time as the powers are transferred, can have no certainty that it can earnestly, properly and appropriately discuss the business of the British people. The Government are prepared to cast away the powers by which they may save them.

When we come to the Budget, which concerns after all the bill for the exchange rate mechanism, and the finance for all the extra costs on electricity and gas because of coal that have to be paid for by pensioners, all those costs result from the Bill and the ERM.

We know full well that the ERM, on the day's negotiations and failures of businesses, costs between £10 billion and £20 billion. We are hoping to raise on that wretched energy measure, which is a temporary, emergency expedient on 17·5 per cent. of fuel bills, only about £6 billion or £7 billion over three years. It is nonsense, yet, to save the concept of Maastricht, we are prepared to expend the wealth and well-being of ordinary people in Britain.

We are raising taxes, we are setting aside election pledges that we solemnly gave because of the effects of the ERM, yet because we have progressed the Bill in the way that we have, how do we discuss the ERM? I did not get to speak on it—of course not. In debate after debate, many hon. Members have failed to get the opportunity to speak, and that is in Committee. Ministers tell us that they do not intend to give way to people who want to wreck the Bill.

Let us look at the sequence of the Bill. We are told that we have had an important vote on it. During the general election the treaty was not available in English. It was not published until one week before Second Reading. All the new Members, who now form a large part of the House, had one week in which to weigh the contentions. The Government claim, by some amazing transference, that a mandate was secured on something that the public could not have read, even if they had wished to read it.

Now that we come to take the matter seriously—I have tried to be a serious member of the Committee and have sat through the long hours, and tried to move or help my hon. Friends move amendments to be debated—we have not been called. We are told by the Chair that because we have not debated the issue on which we have not been called, we are not allowed to vote on it although it was in a group of amendments and we made references to it or tried to vote on it under an umbrella.

I return to citizenship, on which we spent less than six hours, and again I use the comparison of the British Nationality Act 1981. How much more trivial that was because of one important difference—we could change it. If we got it wrong, the House had the power to call it back, but under this Maastricht nonsense, what is the mechanism by which we may call it back?

If there is anger in my speech, it is at the facetiousness with which the Committee is treated, when I see new Members such as the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) getting red in the face and pointing to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and shouting out, "You are finished, Bill Cash." Why? Because an hon. Member wished to raise matters that are meant to be disposed of for ever, not just for this year or next year, not determined by a general election, as all that has been swept aside.

We are shifting our seat of government from the control of the people to an unelected bureaucracy, a Council of Ministers that meets in secret who will rule on transport, education and the whole range of apparatus of the state, including setting up an independent central bank well beyond the call of any one individual nation.

When we grind on about the consequences of the ERM and when the Government bring it back in the middle of the night, as they did two weeks ago, and when they guillotine it like this, I learn one thing from the progress of the debate. I think that the guillotine is God-awful. The Government used to tremble before they introduced it because it is an abatement of the freedom of speech of the House which is the representative of freedom of speech. I have now seen that, with a compliant Chairman of Ways and Means, one can effect the guillotine much more by the closure.

I say all those things advisedly because I have had 22 days to reflect on progress and there is no purpose to my being in the House if I cannot speak clearly, loudly and honourably the beliefs that I hold for my nation. If I cannot do that, and if we are closed down, the process of today whereby a clear precedent is being set means that, if we are ever in opposition and wish to vote on something, the Chairman of Ways and Means, on a matter affecting the finance and taxation of the people, may say no.

[Mr. Richard Shepherd]

6.45 pm

Dr. John Cunningham rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The Committee divided: Ayes 556, Noes 9.

Division No. 231] [6.45 pm

AYES

Adams, Mrs Irene
Adley, Robert
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Allen, Graham
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Arbuthnot, James
Armstrong, Hilary
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Arnold, Sir Thomas (Hazel Grv)
Ashby, David
Ashton, Joe
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Austin-Walker, John
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset North)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnes, Harry
Bates, Michael Batiste, Spencer
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A. J.
Bellingham, Henry
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F.
Benton, Joe
Beresford, Sir Paul
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Dr. Roger Betts, Clive
Blackburn, Dr John G.
Blair, Tony
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Body, Sir Richard
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyce, Jimmy
Boyes, Roland
Bradley, Keith
Brandreth, Gyles
Bray, Dr Jeremy Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thorpes)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Browning, Mrs. Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Budgen, Nicholas
Burden, Richard Burns, Simon
Burt, Alistair
Butler, Peter
Butterfill, John
Byers, Stephen
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Campbell-Savours, D. N.
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Carlile, Alexander (Montgomry)
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew Cash, William
Chapman, Sydney
Chisholm, Malcolm
Churchill, Mr
Clapham, Michael
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcl)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coe, Sebastian
Coffey, Ann
Colvin, Michael Congdon, David
Connarty, Michael
Conway, Derek
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cook, Robin (Livingston)
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cormack, Patrick
Corston, Ms Jean
Couchman, James
Cousins, Jim
Cran, James
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'ire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H'l)
Day, Stephen
Denham, John
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dewar, Donald
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Donohoe, Brian H.
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Dowd, Jim
Duncan, Alan
Duncan-Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Dunnachie, Jimmy
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Durant, Sir Anthony
Dykes, Hugh
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Eggar, Tim
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Enright, Derek
Etherington, Bill
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fishburn, Dudley
Fisher, Mark
Flynn, Paul
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Fraser, John Freeman, Roger French, Douglas
Fry, Peter
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Gale, Roger Gallie, Phil
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Garrett, John
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Gill, Christopher Gillan, Cheryl
Godman, Dr Norman A.
Golding, Mrs Llin
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gordon, Mildred
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, John
Gould, Bryan
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Sir Anthony (Cambs SW)
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Gunnell, John
Hague, William
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Hamilton, Rt Hon Archie (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hannam, Sir John
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Hargreaves, Andrew
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harris, David
Harvey, Nick
Haselhurst, Alan
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Hawkins, Nick
Hayes, Jerry
Heald, Oliver
Heath, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Henderson, Doug
Hendry, Charles
Heppell, John
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hicks, Robert
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence L.
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Hinchliffe, David
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas (G'tham)
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Home Robertson, John
Hood, Jimmy
Hoon, Geoffrey
Horam, John
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howells, Dr. Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes Robert G. (Harrow W)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Ingram, Adam
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jamieson, David
Janner, Greville
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Johnston, Sir Russell

Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (Lpool Brdgn)
Key, Robert
Khabra, Piara S.
King, Rt Hon Tom
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil (Islwyn)
Kirkhope, Timothy
Kirkwood, Archy
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Leighton, Ron
Lennox-Boyd, Mark
Lester, Jim (Broxtowe)
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lidington, David
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Lord, Michael Loyden, Eddie
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
Macdonald, Calum
McFall, John
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
Maclean, David
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McLoughlin, Patrick
McMaster, Gordon
McNamara, Kevin
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Madel, David
Mahon, Alice
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mandelson, Peter
Mans, Keith
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Martin, Michael J. (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll Bute)
Miller, Andrew
Milligan, Stephen
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Mitchell, Sir David (Hants NW)
Moate, Sir Roger
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Monro, Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Rt Hon A. (Wy'nshawe)
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Moss, Malcolm
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Norris, Steve
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Michael (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Oiner, William
O'Neill, Martin
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard Paice, James
Parry, Robert
Patnick, Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pendry, Tom
Pickles, Eric
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L.
Pope, Greg
Porter, Barry (Wirral S)
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Powell, William (Corby)
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, John
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Rathbone, Tim
Raynsford, Nick
Redwood, John
Reid, Dr John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Richardson, Jo
Rifkind, Rt Hon. Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, George (Hamilton)
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roche, Mrs. Barbara
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Tim
Salmond, Alex
Scott, Rt Hon Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shaw, Sir Giles (Pudsey)
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Rt Hon John (M'kl'ds E)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Soames, Nicholas
Soley, Clive
Spearing, Nigel
Speed, Sir Keith
Spellar, John
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Steinberg, Gerry
Stephen, Michael
Stevenson, George
Stewart, Allan
Stott, Roger
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Straw, Jack
Streeter, Gary Sumberg, David
Sykes, John
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M. (Solihull)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Tipping, Paddy
Townsend, Cyril D. (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trimble, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Rt Hon Sir Harold
Wallace, James
Waller, Gary
Walley, Joan
Ward, John
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Wareing, Robert N
Waterson, Nigel
Watson, Mike
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Wicks, Malcolm
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wigley, Dafydd
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wilshire, David
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Wise, Audrey
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Worthington, Tony Wright, Dr Tony
Yeo, Tim
Young, David (Bolton SE)
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Peter Kilfoyle and
Mr. Eric Illsley.

NOES

Biffen, Rt Hon John
Cryer, Bob
Knapman, Roger
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Lewis, Terry
Marlow, Tony
Redmond, Martin
Skinner, Dennis
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'f'ld)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Peter Luff and
Mr. Andrew Rowe.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Question put accordingly and agreed to.
Committee report Progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it not an extraordinary event in the House of Commons that at the end of a Committee stage, the Government fail to produce tellers, having shouted in the first instance against the motion? Can the country outside reflect on the seriousness of Her Majesty's Government not even having the courage to produce tellers to allow a vote to proceed with their own business? Given that already today they have announced that they will not contest new clause 75 or oppose amendment No. 420, are they not a Government in minority, without authority who now run away from every possibility of being defeated on the Floor of the House?

[Mr. George Robertson]

The Chairman: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Dovelands School (Leicester)

7.10 pm

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the problems of Dovelands school in my constituency. I am relieved to be doing so now, rather than in the early hours of the morning—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. It is extremely discourteous to the hon. and learned Member who is speaking if hon. Members make a great deal of noise when leaving the Chamber. Will they please leave quickly and quietly?

Mr. Janner: Noise or no noise, I rejoice at the opportunity to raise the matter on the Adjournment now, rather than in the early hours of the morning. Whatever little one may have to thank the railroad strikers for, at least we have the knowledge that, together, Government and Opposition Members have conspired to debate the Adjournment at such an early hour.

It is a tradition that on the Adjournment Back-Bench Members can raise the problems of one comparatively small school in one constituency. Even so, in this case those problems are reflected in all constituencies, for I doubt whether there is one in the country that does not have a school that is afflicted with the misery suffered by the Dovelands school in Leicester, West.

What is wrong with the school? There is certainly nothing wrong with the teaching, the pupils or the parents. On the contrary, it is a very fine school. The buildings in which the pupils are taught—the places where the teachers work and the children are required to learn—are the problem. I have visited the school dozens of times since I was elected 23 years ago. It is a happy place, but the school has been allowed to develop through a series of what are called temporary mobile classrooms. I suppose that they are temporary, in the sense that we are all temporary on this earth, but they are about as temporary as the prefabs were. You might just remember the prefabs from your youth, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am referring to a temporary joy which seems to go on for ever, and as it goes on, the classrooms deteriorate. Indeed, some of them are so bad that I have seen them propped up with timbers in the winter, with water dripping in, with damp on the walls and with windows that do not open. One of the temporary mobile classrooms is a caravan that was donated by the parents.

Another, believe it or not, is the sole place in the school where the children can gather. Because the floor of that building is defective, because heaters have had to be fixed and because there are no proper fire exits, only about 100 children of the 300 to 400 in the school are allowed in there at a time. Because it is so defective, the much-praised national curriculum cannot be taught because PE cannot be conducted in the classroom. In other words, four out of five pupils in the school are taught in temporary permanent mobile classrooms that were built in the 1930s.

All 350 pupils at the school use outside lavatories, whatever the weather, and that is a disgrace. There is no sick room in the main part of the school, a perfectly good building that has been allowed to decay. With the windows unopened, roofs leaking and floor damp and uneven, it is the sort of school to which none of us would want our children to go. And that is the real test. If hon. Members said, "It is the sort of building in which our children can be educated," it would be fine for our constituents' children. But if we say, "We will not let them go there because it is unhygienic, below standard and, above all, dangerous," the place is not fit for the children of our constituents.

I will describe some of the dangers. One of the heaters in the so-called main hall caught fire. The caretaker entered the place a few weeks ago to find it filled with smoke. A defective heater had caused another fire. Instead of replacing the classroom, they replaced the heater. A chunk of copper piping about 3 ft long fell from one of the gutters into the playground just after the children had gone back into the school. It would have killed an adult, let alone a child.

I had been planning a wicked little enterprise. The piece of piping is on its way to Parliament. It was due to arrive here at about 9.30 in time for the 10 o'clock Adjournment debate. It was to have been smuggled gently into the Chamber through the main doors and, though fearing a rebuke from you, Madam Deputy Speaker, I hoped to show the object to the House. It is so dangerous and defective that hon. Members would have appreciated to the full, from seeing it, why the parents of the children who go to the school are up in arms, why the teachers, governors and parents have prepared a parliamentary petition and why the local councillors, whatever their political parties, have come together and said, "We cannot allow this to go on."

I may be asked what good an Adjournment debate is in such circumstances. At least it gives us a chance to explain to Parliament what is going on in a school that is representative of many thousands of schools for which there is insufficient money. We are able, as a result of the debate, to continue the campaign of the parents, governors and teachers to get action before there is tragedy. I hope that the Minister who will reply to the debate will give hope to the school and will assure those who run it and work in it that they will be looked after.

Naturally, I have written to various Ministers about the situation at the school. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State wrote telling me:

"We are very concerned about the state of Dovelands School."

I was glad to hear that, and when asked what he intended to do about it, he wrote:

"This Government is committed to improving the condition of school buildings generally."

That is fine. They intend to improve matters generally; but what about specific problems? If the Government are so committed to improving school conditions and buildings, they should provide money to enable Leicestershire county council and the local education authority to fix Dovelands school.

But the Government blame the members of the local authority and say, in effect, "They have their money and it is up to them to decide how to use it," and the local authority says, "Blame the Government. They do not give us enough money to fix the school, so we cannot do the necessary work." The Government blame the local authority, which blames the Government. The result is that the school is a danger. It is not a worthy place in which children can or should be taught.

What is to happen? The LEA says, "We hope to allocate money in due course, when we have it. We cannot do anything just now because we do not have the cash." I say on behalf of the parents, teachers, pupils and governors that that is not good enough. A commitment to improve the buildings in time will not do. If the Government do not believe that it is a top priority to have school buildings in proper condition, I do not know what is.

It is more important to have school buildings safe than to spend millions of pounds on testing children against the wishes of their teachers, or even in accordance with their teachers' wishes. I am referring to a job that must be tackled at once. The director of education wrote to me saying:

"The Dovelands project is not the highest current priority, although much needed, as a handful of schools are considered to be even more urgently in need of major investment."

One wonders what they are like. If Dovelands is not the worst, the worst must be an appalling slum and an incredible danger.

The Government say that they are concerned about Dovelands, but they do nothing but blame the local authority. The director of education is deeply concerned about the school, but has reported that no money will be available until 1995 at the earliest, and he blames the Government. Each blames the other and nobody gets anything done. Everybody throws up his hands and says, "It is not us. Blame someone else."

I have a horror that stems from an incident in Braunstone, where we begged for a new road to be made safe. No one would spend the money. The Government blamed the local authority, and the highway authority blamed the Government. There was then an awful tragedy when a child in my constituency was killed on that road. Local parents protested, as I did, and within months the money appeared out of thin air so that there would not be another tragedy.

I do not want the same to happen with Dovelands school. I do not want the authorities to wait until there is a tragedy—until there is a fire. In one of the early fires at the school, a child's sari was set alight. By a miracle, she was fine and survived. In another incident, a child had just entered a classroom when guttering fell that could have killed the child. Are we waiting for another tragedy? Then, I guarantee, the local education authority would find the money and the Government would contribute.

We ought not to wait for tragedies. We ought to act now. Dovelands is a fine school with a great reputation. It has an excellent, kind and tremendous head teacher. It has a devoted staff and governors who care about the school. The school has lovely pupils in a happy atmosphere. But no one should be forced to teach or to learn in a crumbling school that is in a disgraceful, dangerous condition. There should be action before there is a tragedy.

7.21 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) for raising this important subject. Having worked with my hon. and learned Friend in Leicester for a number of years, I am well aware—as are his constituents—of his great concern for the education system. He spoke eloquently, as always, about the problems that affect Dovelands school. I am happy to support his excellent work.

Not long ago, we jointly campaigned on behalf of another Leicestershire school, Abbey primary school. My hon. and learned Friend's remarks were very much a reflection of that campaign. His description of Dovelands school reflected also the problems that are to be found in the city of Leicester—crumbling schools, and the inability of the local authority to provide resources to make those schools safe. One cannot underestimate the effect of the condition of those schools on the morale of teachers, ancillary staff and the children themselves.

[Mr. Keith Vaz]

If we want to produce good citizens for the future, we must do exactly as my hon. and learned Friend says—provide resources to create the climate and conditions that will enable our children to be taught in schools that are happy places in which their education and skills can be developed and enhanced.

I hope that the Minister will accede to my hon. and learned Friend's requests. Is it not true that the resources made available by the Government to Leicestershire county council have declined in real terms over the past few years? That is not the fault of the local authority. Recently, it had to set a budget that will unfortunately mean education cuts. The Labour group was in the forefront of the campaign to ensure that there were no cuts—but that local authority and others throughout the country are having to cut back expenditure on repairing schools and stopping them from falling further into decay as a result of cuts in Government expenditure.

When the Government refuse to make available the resources necessary to allow local authorities to undertake basic maintenance and repair work, the consequences are such as those described by my hon. and learned Friend, and young children—vulnerable members of our society—are put at risk.

I admire greatly my hon. and learned Friend's campaign following the death of a young girl in Braunstone. He said well before that tragedy that there ought to be sufficient traffic calming measures to ensure that there would be no accidents. Nobody listened. It was only after the campaign that followed the death of that unfortunate child that something was done.

When the Minister replies, I hope that he will give in and will award Leicestershire county council the resources that it needs. Perhaps he will even ring-fence them, to ensure that they are devoted to Dovelands school. There are many schools in my constituency, as in that of my hon. and learned Friend, that ought to be funded. I hope that the Minister will accede to my hon. and learned Friend's request and will grant the resources for which he has asked.

7.25 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education (Mr. Tim Boswell): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on his good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate. It is a pleasure for me, as a fellow east midlands Member, to respond to his comments. I associate with those remarks the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), although I do not always agree with his comments as to where the blame might lay in this particular case. If it is not inappropriate, I extend my personal felicitations to the hon. Member for Leicester, East on his recent change of status.

Mr. Janner: And to his wife.

Mr. Boswell: Indeed—quite right.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West spoke eloquently about the poor condition of the school buildings and the impact that that has on pupils and teachers. That is clearly an unsatisfactory state of affairs. But his concerns would be more properly addressed to Leicestershire local education authority, which maintains those schools. The LEA is, accordingly, responsible for ensuring that the premises of county schools are safe, in good condition and suitable for their purpose.

Under the local authority capital finance system it is for Leicestershire to decide, within the level of resources available to it, how much to spend on education capital projects. Within that total it is again entirely for the county to decide which projects are priorities. If the Dovelands schools are judged pressing priorities, Leicestershire has the flexibility and the resources to refurbish or replace the buildings.

The hon. and learned Gentleman might find it helpful if I said a little more about how the capital finance system works. Local authorities are given permission to borrow up to a certain level to fund capital programmes for all their services, including education. This borrowing limit, the basic credit approval, is not, however, the limit on local authorities' capital spending. They can also, if they wish, use funds transferred from their revenue budgets for capital purposes. They are also able to invest capital receipts. Leicestershire and other LEAs can take advantage of the relaxation of the rules on the use of capital receipts announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement. That effectively means that, until the end of this year, LEAs will be able to spend 100 per cent., rather than 50 per cent., of receipts realised, which will provide valuable additional capital resources for all LEAs.

Leicestershire's basic credit approval for 1993-94 of more than £14 million covers the capital requirements of all its services, not just education. It is calculated by reference to the individual annual capital guidelines—ACGs—issued for each of those services, including education. The county's education annual capital guidelines for the current year is just under £7 million.

In distributing the national total of annual capital guidelines to LEAs in 1993-94, we gave priority to three categories—commitments arising from projects allowed for under previous ACGs; the provision of new places in areas of population growth, which we term "basic needs"; and implementing cost-effective schemes to remove surplus school places.

Within the second priority category of basic need, we also cover projects that are termed exceptional basic need. They cover situations where school premises are no longer repairable in practice and where no alternative provision exists. Leicestershire made a small bid in that exceptional basic need category for part of the Dovelands junior school in 1993-94, which was accepted in its entirety. I shall return to that later.

After the three national priority categories are covered, the remaining ACG resources are largely distributed by formula to contribute towards the cost of improving existing school buildings. These national priority criteria were agreed with the local authority associations and retain the support of LEAs. How the categories are defined and details of how LEA bids will be assessed are set out each year in letters to LEAs inviting bids for ACGs. Generally speaking, these letters are issued in May or June.

The deadline for bids is usually in September or October and the ACGs are announced in December for the following financial year.

Leicestershire has done well under the system. Education ACGs alone have totalled over £22 million in the past three years, including the current financial year. While ACG bids from LEAs always exceed the total available, Leicestershire has received a much greater proportion of its bids than the national average—over 42 per cent. compared with the national average of 27 per cent. in the current year. In particular, the county has received substantial cover in the commitments and basic needs categories. In contrast, however, Leicestershire has made few bids in the other high priority category of surplus place removal projects. Reorganisation schemes which remove surplus places generate revenue savings. They also attract sufficient and significant capital support within ACGs for investment in improving the stock of existing premises.

I understand that the county currently has a significant number of surplus places, particularly in the secondary sector where it approaches 20 per cent. of the stock. Surplus places are a drain on the system. They take up resources which could be available for other uses, including refurbishment works. I hope that the county of Leicestershire will look carefully at this issue to see what savings can be made for reinvestment elsewhere.

The county has also done very well recently in the distribution of unallocated supplementary credit approvals. These are resources which are held back each year when annual capital guidelines are distributed in December. They are largely earmarked to cover projects arising from proposals to remove surplus places that have not yet been decided. As some of those proposals are rejected or withdrawn, the supplementary credit approvals are available for redistribution.

These unallocated resources are distributed to LEAs after careful consideration of the bids that have been received. Most of these relate to urgent refurbishment work at existing schools. In the 1991-92 financial year, the county's bid for these unallocated resources listed a number of schools where urgent work was necessary. Many LEAs submitted bids. Exceptionally, we were able to allocate supplementary credit approvals for work at three Leicestershire schools—Abbey primary, Marriott and Charnwood.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West will recall the problems at Abbey primary in particular. He made many representations on the problem that that school faced, as he has done about Dovelands schools. I am sure he appreciated the help that we were able to provide. The allocations for these three projects totalled over £2 million. Leicestershire also received an unallocated supplementary credit approval in 1992-93 for work at another Leicester school, Sir Jonathan North. Those schools were seen by the county as its most urgent priorities. The exceptional assistance that we have given for work at the schools should mean that the LEA is now better placed to carry out work at other priority schools.

In submitting the earlier bids, Leicestershire did not actually include the Dovelands schools. That is a matter for the county. It is, of course, open to Leicestershire to submit a bid for any unallocated supplementary credit approvals that there may be in the current financial year. Any such bids, including bids relating to the Dovelands schools, will be treated on their merits. This is an option that the LEA will want to consider carefully. No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Member for Leicester, East will wish to press this possibility. The most important matter at this stage is for Leicestershire to decide what needs to be done at the schools. Having done so, it can then decide what time scale is preferred and what priority to give to the work.

I understand that the county's bid under the annual capital guidelines for 1993-94 included support for the removal of temporary buildings at Dovelands junior school. That bid was made in our high priority category of exceptional basic need. The bid was accepted in its entirety and support totalling £190,000 was therefore included in the 1993-94 annual capital guideline.

In the longer term, I understand that the LEA plans to provide both schools with new premises. I also understand however, that it remains undecided on how best to do that. I believe that the governors of both schools are currently being consulted on a number of options, including rebuilding on the same site or on a new site or sites.

Mr. Vaz: The House was moved by the description of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) of the current safety standards at Dovelands school. Surely the Minister accepts that the situation there is not dissimilar; in fact, it is worse than the situation that we described in support of the Abbey campaign. Why does the Minister have to wait for another bid? Why does not he accept what my hon. and learned Friend has said and treat the issue as a priority?

Mr. Boswell: As I have explained, it is for the local education authority to decide its priorities. As I have said, the LEA's priority was to go for the Abbey school and the other two schools first. At that time Dovelands was not mentioned, although it has been mentioned now.

Mr. Janner: We are back to the position that I outlined. The Minister says, "Blame Leicestershire local authority." When it is approached, it will say, "Blame the Government." Will the Minister at least undertake to send someone senior to see the school, to inspect it and consider whether there is the sort of danger that I have described? If there is, will the Minister please be kind enough to give some hope that the Government will intervene to assist? We are not talking politics, because nobody can get anything done at the school. This is a hung authority. It is a matter of humanity, kindness and decency to give some reassurance to the parents and not simply say, "Blame Leicestershire authority." Will the Minister undertake to send an inspector or someone else to look at the school, and will he give it some hope?

Mr. Boswell: I referred obliquely to statutory safety obligations on local authorities in relation to school premises. I am aware of the political situation in the county. I was extensively briefed by my officials about the local situation. I shall certainly draw this debate to the attention of the local education authority and see whether my officials are entirely satisfied that the authority is aware of the situation on the ground.

I do not resile from the principle that it is for the local authority to submit bids. We are not apportioning blame. There is a mechanism, which I have been at some pains to explain. The authority should avail itself of that mechanism, as it has done on previous occasions with success, and matters will then be considered on their merits.

[Mr. Boswell]

Mr. Janner: I thank the Minister for giving way. We have until 10 o'clock, although we shall not take that long.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There a few rules, and they include brief interventions.

Mr. Janner: I have a brief question. Would the Minister be good enough to come with me to the school one day to see it for himself? I cordially invite him to get out of Westminster, away from his office. I assure him that he will get a much better reception than I did 23 years ago, during my first general election campaign, when I was booed in the playground. That does not happen any more, and the Minister will be well received if he comes.

Mr. Vaz: And we will buy him lunch.

Mr. Boswell: Even without that improper inducement, I am always interested in invitations such as that seductive one from the hon. and learned Gentleman. He may be aware that my colleagues and I, although I have other responsibilities in the Department, visit schools on a regular basis and have done so more than 100 times in the last calendar year. I have noted his invitation, and if he would care to put it into writing, I shall see whether I can respond to it. The schools are not all that far from my constituency. We shall see what we can do, but I am not going to commit myself to that, let alone promise a complete recasting of the rules in this case.

I believe that the governors of both schools are being consulted on a number of options, including rebuilding on the same site, or a new site or sites. A number of possible sites have been identified. Clearly, the matter now rests in the hands of the county and the governors.

Let me conclude by saying—the hon. and learned Gentleman has acknowledged this—that the Government are committed to improving the conditions of school buildings. We have provided LEAs with considerable resources in the past few years for them to do so. LEAs spent over £2 billion on school buildings between 1986-87 and 1989-90. Much of this will have gone on remedying deficiencies such as those at the Dovelands schools. In addition, we estimate that LEAs will spend a further £2·5 billion on schools between 1990-91 and 1993-94.

Clearly, the position at the Dovelands schools is unsatisfactory, but, at this stage, it is really a matter for the LEA and the governors. We have provided generous capital support for Leicestershire over the years. In particular, we have provided support for urgent work to renovate the premises of a number of Leicester city schools. The county has the resources available and the flexibility to put right the problems at the Dovelands schools if that is regarded locally as a priority.

Therefore, it is important that the LEA and the schools come to a decision on what precisely they need to do to tackle the problems. That is a matter for them. No doubt the hon. and learned Member will be pressing the LEA as hard and eloquently as he has pressed me tonight on this. There are a number of options open to the LEA. The county can submit a bid for unallocated SCAs during the current financial year. Any such bid would be treated on its merits.

It is also open to the LEA to bid for capital support for work at the schools as part of the normal round of bidding for annual capital guidelines for 1994-95. Any such bids will be considered carefully against the detailed criteria set out in our annual bidding letter to LEAs, which will be issued shortly.

I have listened carefully to arguments put by the hon. and learned Member and the hon. Member. I understand and share the concern that they and those associated with the schools must feel, but the onus now is on the county to decide how the problems are to be rectified and when, and to give the work concerned the necessary priority. The system is in place, and, according to the decisions they take, we are in a position to respond to it, in accordance with those provisions.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes to Eight o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 16 April 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Local Government Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

9.33 am

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): It is a pleasure to introduce a full day's debate on local government. Local government matters a great deal. Good councils and good councillors can make a lot of difference to their counties, towns and districts. The Government are interested in promoting the best in local government and in leaving many vital issues to be settled democratically in the council chamber.

In recent months and years, the difference between the best-run and the worst-run councils has become marked. Successful Conservative councils get out of debt, collect their money efficiently, contract out and provide excellent value for money. Councils such as Wellingborough, Hambleton and Huntingdon are offering their taxpayers refunds in the current year because they have been so successful at managing. Hampshire county council has succeeded in setting the lowest county council tax, while at the same time recruiting more carers and teachers.

Some Labour councils, in contrast, set high council taxes, pile high the debts and fail to provide value for money. Those are the issues which electors will shortly be able to judge in the county campaigns.

The public sector that we wish to advance is there to organise services for those in need whom the market has passed by, to regulate the market so that it remains open and competitive, and to provide leadership and representation for communities. Good local government provides, or sees to it that there is provision for, care for the elderly and disabled. It plans our physical and built environment—for example, to prevent the noisy sawmill being located next to the old people's home. It acts as leader for the local community, creating a place in which people are prepared to invest, to create jobs and to enjoy their leisure time.

In the current year, local government will receive financial support from Government grant and business rates of more than £33,000 million. My first message today is that plenty of choice and diversity is possible within that large sum of money. The House should remember that the money goes to local government in the form of a block grant, and councillors and councils are left to make the important decisions about how to spend that money, what the priorities should be and how efficiently it delivers the services.

The private sector is there to supply wants. It is there to make money, as profits are the lifeblood of new enterprise and the means of remunerating savers, and to provide the funds to invest in new plant and equipment. Without profits, businesses cannot innovate or adapt to changing customer needs, and they soon fall behind with the provision of opportunity and employment in their local communities.

Throughout my business and political life, I have found things of excellence in both the public and private sectors. As a one-time chairman of an industrial company, as a former director of a merchant bank, as a previous director of small companies, I learned a great deal about the best that the private sector can offer. I learned to admire its flexibility, its speed of reaction, its preparedness to take calculated risks, its ability to make decisions in an uncertain world with imperfect information, its attention to detail, its ability to put the customer first, second and third, its interest in quality and its enthusiasm for new ideas and for innovation.

As a senior civil servant, as a Government adviser and, more recently, as a Minister, I admire the public sector at its best, when it is judicious, fair-minded and open, and prepared, before acting, to debate the issues before the people, capable of helping those most in need and giving hope to those whom the competitive market leaves to one side.

Sometimes, in both sectors, life does not work out for the best. In the private sector, there is the Labour party's caricature, where speed leads to sloppiness and the pursuit of profit can lead to spivvery. In the public sector, things can degenerate into bumf and bureacracy, where nothing happens for interminable months or years, where letters go unanswered, problems are unresolved, and instructions, regulations and counter-instructions are issued, as if half translated from Latin into a kind of official double-Dutch.

At its worst, the language of the private sector is costive or monosyllabic. At its worst, the prose of the public sector is shambolic, confused and inchoate. Language without cadence and clarity is good neither for governing nor for doing business.

The Conservative agenda followed over several years aims to make government work better. One of the biggest breakthroughs, in our approach to government came with the introduction of the idea of the enabling council. Such a council decides how much service the community requires, but does not necessarily itself employ all the people providing it. This idea, despite its somewhat ungainly name, has been adopted across the country by councils of differing political persuasions.

Many have come to recognise that business is better at organising service provision through a competitive market; only government can decide how much service and how many public goods to buy on behalf of people who lack the income to compete in the marketplace. So we believe that councils should make the best use of what the marketplace has to offer.

An increasing number of councils are pioneering putting services out to tender voluntarily before statute and regulation require them to do so. The London borough of Bromley has already market tested more than a third of its revenue costs. Lincolnshire county council is planning market testing of property surveying, project management and building maintenance. The London borough of Brent is entering on a vigorous programme of market testing. That usually results in better quality and in lower costs.

In the United States of America, part of President Clinton's new agenda have been christened "reinventing Government". The titles may be different from those that we are using, but it looks rather similar to what we are doing here. His Administration, according to the proponents of the new agenda, want government to concentrate on steering rather than rowing; on leading societies instead of providing services themselves.

[Mr. John Redwood]

We are told that President Clinton wants government to provide competition between service providers and to empower citizens by pushing control away from bureaucracy into the community. The United States Administration wish to measure the performance of their agencies by not the amount of money that the agencies spend but the achievements that they record. The Administration wish government to be mission-driven rather than ruled by regulations. They wish to concentrate on preventing problems as much as on providing solutions; they wish to put energies into decentralising authority. Above all, they prefer market mechanisms to bureaucratic ones.

I therefore hope that, in responding to the debate, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) will tell us whether he and his party welcome those Democratic party initiatives in America. It is time we knew whether the Labour party is full of Clintonite reformers at its top or not. Are they now in favour of the market and what it can offer, or do they continue to pursue their vendetta against it?

Labour councillors in council chambers throughout England need to know the answer. They need to know where they are being led by the Labour party here in the House of Commons. Are they, like the President of America, to welcome competitive tendering and private partnership, or have they to resist doggedly and unsuccessfully our proposals for reform and improvement?

Public-private partnership in Britain has a long and successful history. It is not even something entirely dreamed up by successive Conservative Administrations since 1979, good though the ideas of those Administrations were. Its provenance goes back much further and its acceptability spans the political spectrum.

Although, in the 1980s, the Labour party nationally in the House fought tooth and nail against the idea of contracting out, around the country in practice some more sensible Labour-led councils were doing it, as they had been for many years. So we need to know whether the national party has caught up with that strand of thinking.

In a Municipal Journal piece, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North implied that the Labour party was catching up. He said, or was reported as saying:

"In principle, there is nothing wrong with local authorities deciding to what extent they are providers of services and to what extent they buy in the service to provide for their local residents".

Indeed, even the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who is sharper of tongue in such matters, seemed to announce his conversion to the advantages of contracting out in a recent interview in Tribune. I believe that there was some dispute about whether it accurately reflected his views, but the House might like to be reminded what Tribune thought he had said. I can understand the difficulties between a Labour Member and Tribune, but there we are. Tribune reported the hon. Member for Blackburn as believing:

"There is wide acceptance that the division between contractor and provider that compulsory competitive tendering has produced has been sensible".

That is praise indeed from the hon. Member for Blackburn.

Many members of the Labour party have recognised for a long time that contracting out and using the market can be sensible. It has rarely made sense for councils to employ top-rate barristers in case the council should be called into serious litigation; they have always relied on the marketplace when they need those skills.

It has rarely made sense for councils to employ their own financial and investment specialists. They have often called upon advisers in the City when and where they need them. Seeking provision from the marketplace is not simply a way of cutting costs or even dealing with the problem of peaks and troughs. It can also be a way of improving service quality. Management of a service is usually strengthened, whether or not an outside group wins the contract, by the very process of competitive tendering.

This was well known in the 19th century, when the Government had a problem with the unreliability of their international mail service. The Government's solution then was to let mail contracts to private sector shipping companies. By so doing, they built incentives into the system to deliver the post. Many more letters were subsequently delivered rather than allegedly being "lost at sea", as had happened under the public sector monopoly.

Similarly, under modern contracting out, service quality has often been better specified for everything from dustbin collection through to the running of the local swimming pool. This service revolution, based on quality and the use of the market, will continue in the next few years. Central Government are now pitching in. They are contracting out many of their functions and grouping many of their staff into executive agencies and trading funds.

The problem in a large amorphous civil service can be that individual branches or divisions lack esprit de corps or a clear sense of purpose, swallowed as they are by a greater whole. Market testing allows the Minister to answer more precisely to Parliament for the policy and allows some responsibility to be clearly delegated to managers for the day-to-day running of the service.

Large organisations need delegated responsibility, as well as the buck resting on the desk of the most senior person for the big issues. The idea that the Minister is directly responsible for every facet and every action, every letter written, every benefit administered by local government is Labour nonsense that we often hear from the Opposition.

Of course the Minister in Parliament should be responsible for the general policy on local government, for the amount of money voted and for the framework of law. Parliament should expect to debate those matters vigorously and to criticise the Minister if it feels that he has failed to respond. But should the Minister be responsible for every benefit cheque that goes missing, every piece of litter in the local park or every poor school result?

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): The Minister's last few sentences implied that local government should be given more opportunity to make its own decisions. Does he feel that they run counter to the Government's policy on capping and their view that local government is not able or sufficiently responsible to make those decisions?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman cannot have followed my earlier argument, in which I said that £33,000 million gave enormous choice, scope and discretion. I wish to strengthen the choice and scope of local councils in administering that money by encouraging responsibility in councils and reminding the Labour party that many of the issues should properly be debated in the council chamber and not brought to the House of Commons. Ministers should not be blamed for matters that are clearly within the competence and responsibility of the local authority.

In the many layers of management between the park attendant failing to pick up the litter and the Secretary of State for the Environment, responsibility is held by people elected or appointed, who can and should often be held to blame. In a vigorous democracy, an Opposition will naturally wish to blame the Minister for everything. In their view, everything can be related to the amount of money available and the Minister can always be blamed for the total amount of money.

The Opposition in this Parliament, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North has just shown, delight in arguing two entirely contradictory propositions. They argue that local government should be independent, but, at the same time, they bring every shortcoming to local government to the House, claiming that it has happened only because the revenue support grant was not large enough. They should learn that the obverse of the coin of local autonomy is local responsibility.

Many councils throughout the country are managing well within the large block grants allocated to them. The question is, why cannot the others do so and what will the Labour party do to encourage better management of some of the Labour-controlled councils that claim that they cannot manage so well?

Within budgets of £70,000 million this year, local government has considerable scope to do good and great opportunity to make mistakes. Believing in local freedom underlines that. The adoption of more businesslike practices can make partnership between public and private sectors easier. The partnership must extend, especially in the inner cities, to creating a climate in which business can invest and prosperity can return. Exciting new developments are now under way, with the provision of private sector roads, railway lines and other transportation systems, through the development of joint venture projects and private sector projects in their entirety.

The link of the world's busiest international airport, Heathrow, to one of the world's largest cities went unmade by the nationalised industry over 45 years. Private capital will put that right. Even the shadow Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), welcomes the principle behind that development——

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): My hon. Friend proposed it.

Mr. Redwood: That comment is a bit rich. The Labour party spent the whole of the early 1980s claiming that the private sector was full of rogues and villains and had no role to play in such developments. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and his hon. Friends have learnt from what we have been saying over the past 10 or 20 years —that the private sector has a role and that private capital can be most important.

The public sector's task is to handle the community's aspirations and fears and to provide the necessary permits and rights. Some of the projects may well need some public financial assistance. The public sector may need to be involved in acquiring the land, granting planning permission, debating with local communities on the best routes and deciding on the correct mixture of facilities that can be provided as a result of a regeneration scheme. Such thinking lay behind the Government's launch, earlier this year, of the capital partnership and housing partnership funds. Those funds have been very successful in attracting three-way money—a three-way partnership—between central Government, local government and the private sector.

The capital partnership scheme for the inner cities, through £20 million of promised Government grant, promises £33 million of local authority receipts money and £130 million of private capital. It is a big boost for the winning areas in deprived inner cities. The housing partnership fund, with £30 million of promised Government grant, promises £29 million of local authority receipts money and £37 million of private investment. Those partnership schemes show how private and public sectors can work together in the best interests of urban regeneration.

In the Foleshill area of Coventry, £2·6 million of urban partnership grant will be used alongside other central Government grants and almost £17 million of private sector investment to redevelop a former warehouse, textile factory and other sites, to provide workshops, light industrial units, new private and housing association dwellings and training opportunities. More than 2,000 new jobs have been promised from that scheme alone.

In Southwark, the local authority is using £5 million of its capital receipts, alongside £1 million urban partnership funding, to bring in an estimated further £5 million of private sector money to regenerate central Peckham. That project is a good example of private-public sector partnership which will increase retain space and improve leisure facilities and the environment for the benefit of local residents and businesses.

In Huddersfield, slightly more than £1 million urban partnership resources are expected to attract more than £23 million from the private sector, which, together with more than £3 million of local authority capital receipts, will provide a major retail and leisure park. That ambitious and imaginative project will develop sports facilities with regional, national and international potential.

The present state of the property market presents enormous opportunities. I asked property specialists when they thought that they would next be able to buy properties and undertake developments at current high yield levels and current low interest rates. Why did so many clamour to buy land at £1 million or more an acre in 1988, which they would now turn down at £250,000 an acre? Is not it time for them to think again and recognise the opportunities? There has rarely been a better conjunction of rental yields and borrowing costs.

The economy is growing again and, as we approach the middle 1990s, there will be demand from tenants for commercial space and industrial property in our major cities. There will be more demand for affordable homes from a new generation of potential home owners.

Central Government, urban development corporations, councils and city challenge partnerships can sketch the ideas and point the direction. The private sector can respond by recognising the opportunities and by working in tandem with public bodies. We now have some experience of our city challenge rounds. Taking the two rounds together, and adding up the promises, we recognise that they can make a huge difference to the inner city areas that they are targeting.

[Mr. Redwood]

The 31 city challenge winners are forecasting, over five years, 70,000 new or improved dwellings; 91,000 new jobs being created; the improvement and reclamation of 2,831 hectares of land; more than 3 million sq m of new and improved business and commercial space and 7,000 new business start-ups. They anticipate bringing in more than £3,000 million of private sector investment. That is a huge task and those projects alone will make a very big difference to large areas of our inner cities. I am sure that that will be as welcome to the Opposition as it is to me.

Great cities are not built on public grants alone. The period of urban expansion in the Victorian era saw the erection of some great municipal buildings, but mostly the architectural and commercial fabric of the city came from vigorous and competitive private enterprise. The era of maximum expansion of the railroads came in a period of private capital provision. All the canals, all the main railway lines and many of the original turnpikes were built using private money. The comely inheritance of red brick warehouses, private quays and Victorian suburban villas showed the vigour of the private sector, organised within a planning and public utility framework set out by central and municipal government.

Partnership unleashes a variety of decision makers and a variety of tastes, styles and approaches. Variety is important to the architectural, cultural and street life of urban England. Just how drab Government and local government patronage in London can be is seen in the construction of the concrete festival hall, the Marsham street towers and the tower blocks of the east end. In contrast, how lively are the colours, shapes and forms of many of the new docklands developments on the Isle of Dogs and in Surrey Quays and Wapping, as the private sector has unleashed new architectural talent.

Two weeks ago, a new UDC began its life in Plymouth. The public sector brings organisational skills, planning, former Ministry of Defence land and the fine collection of buildings of the Royal William yard. Today, I announced two further appointments to the UDC board, making a total so far of nine directors—five from the local authorities and four representing industry, commerce and other interests. The chief executive post has been advertised and the chairman will be making the appointment shortly.

I want the private sector to bring forward the money and the ideas to create cafes, restaurants, pubs, hotels, small business workshops and offices, where before the Royal Navy victualled her ships. In the dying days of naval occupation, the Royal William yard lost some of its lustre. It was closed off from the people of Plymouth and it became a sad outrider overlooking the Sound. With the right partnership of Government, the city council and the private sector, this decade will see the renaissance of the Royal William yard, its return to the people of Plymouth for their use and the creation of a new centre of enterprise, jobs and prosperity. Plymouth is most definitely open for business. I now want the private sector to come forward with its ideas and its money.

Such partnerships are already working in many other parts of the country. In Manchester, public-private partnership is redeveloping Victoria station, and £35 million of Government money in the form of city grant will provide the Olympic arena. It will generate almost £200 million of private sector capital in the associated commercial, retail and leisure development, offering a five-star hotel, cinema, substantial office accommodation and other facilities.

Mr. Henderson: I understand that the Minister is proud of some developments in certain parts of the country, but does he accept that the way in which the Canary Wharf project in the east end of London was put together, and the Government's action in ignoring the advice of the local authorities and local people, made a major contribution to that scheme's failure? That failure is reflected in the fact that only 15 per cent. of Canary Wharf is occupied.

Mr. Redwood: Sometimes, risks are run that take time to come right. If the hon. Gentleman and I were to return to Canary Wharf in five or 10 years, we should see a flourishing and successful development, with many more tenants and businesses. I hope that the hon. Gentleman joins me in wishing those involved every success in letting that space and in developing more businesses to fill it. That will mean an even more flourishing and enterprising London and City of London economy.

Under the partnership envisaged for the Manchester concert hall site, public money could build the concert hall if the private sector could construct the offices and other facilities to complete the scheme.

At the heart of the Manchester Olympic bid is a further bold regeneration project. Many facilities will be constructed on the Eastlands site—an old industrial area in need of attention. The private sector will be harnessed to provide hotel spaces, car parks and much of the housing. There will be a lasting monument to the Olympics and facilities for the continued enjoyment of Manchester and her people.

Of more immediate interest to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North, the partnership on Teesside and Tyneside has taken off through the work of the urban development corporations. They successfully transformed the Tees and Tyne from rundown, derelict areas into serious locations attracting new businesses from England and around the world. The waterfront by the Tyne bridge is being completely reconstructed and the new business park has several leading companies as its tenants. New houses, new waterside facilities and a new university are all rising from the old mudflats and rundown land alongside the two great rivers of the north-east.

For partnership to flourish, local and national government need to be more responsive and alert to opportunities. The private sector needs more courage and confidence after a bruising recession, and a willingness to respond to the new climate. To the private business I say, now get ready to run the risks. To the Government I say, let us make sure that nothing that we do locally or nationally impedes enterprise, success and regeneration —for the wind is at last set fair for prosperity.

10.2 am

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I welcome this debate, initiated by the Government, on the provision of public services, which Opposition Members believe is a crucial part of our way of life throughout the country.

The Government claim that changing the balance between the public and private provision of local authority services is all about the delivery of those services. They have systematically made that point over a long time, and it was repeated by the Minister this morning. The Government claim that their approach to further education, schools, economic development systems, residential provision and contracted services is all about the delivery of efficient services. The Government do not need me to remind them that their actions over the past 14 years have not been about the delivery of local government services.

I suggest that it has been the Government's motive all along, contrary to the Minister's statements this morning, to dismantle local government service, curtail local democracy and undermine public confidence in local government. The Government know that changing the balance is not about delivery but about centralising power in Whitehall. They know that removing local authority responsibility for further education and handing it over to self-perpetuating boards with funding controlled by a central Government quango is not about the delivery of service.

The Government know that taking economic development and planning powers from local authorities and handing them to unelected boards with funding controlled by central Government is not about the delivery of service. They know also that changing social security rules to give an unfair advantage to private residential homes, which has led to the closure of local authority homes, is not about the delivery of service. The Government know that forcing local authorities to dismantle essential services and to hand them over to private contractors, who often then cut staff pay and conditions, is not about the delivery of service. They know that their latest idea of taking away the limited responsibility that local authorities have in respect of police facilities is not about the delivery of police facilities.

Mr. Redwood: Can the hon. Gentleman explain why senior Labour councillors come every year to see the holder of my office or the Secretary of State for the Environment to say that in the ensuing year they need considerably more money to deal with all the extra responsibilities that Parliament and the Government have asked them to adopt? How does that square with care in the community, environmental and other measures that the Government have added to local government responsibilities in the past? If the hon. Gentleman's thesis is correct and local authorities have fewer responsibilities, why do councillors argue that they need more money to meet extra responsibilities?

Mr. Henderson: The Minister does not need me to answer that question because he knows the answer himself. If there is any economic growth over a period of time—and even under a Conservative Government there has been some, though not as much as in the 1970s—there must also be growth in public sector expenditure. Local authority leaders such as Jeremy Beecham, on my own council, have been knocking on the Minister's door because the damage done—as in Tyneside and Newcastle—by Conservative policies over the past 10 years has produced many more calls on local government to ameliorate that damage, to make life better for the people in their community.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the remark made by Jeremy Beecham in the Municipal Journal in May 1992 that "compulsory competitive tendering has brought some cost effectiveness and genuine saving which might not otherwise have been achieved"?

Mr. Henderson: It will be better for the debate if I deal with the hon. Gentleman's question at the appropriate point in my speech. If I fail to do so, perhaps he will remind me of his question.

Government actions in taking power away from local authorities related to the provision of services and not to their delivery. I ask the hon. Gentleman to join me in expressing concern at the proliferation of quangos that have been established throughout the country to administer public services. In a democracy, the people best placed to judge the needs of a community and whether those needs are met are those elected by the community and who are accountable to it, yet democracy has been offended by an avalanche of public sector appointments.

In my district of Tyneside, it is well known that the same unelected people are often given four of five quango appointments on non-elected public boards. It is often said that many local Tory worthies on Tyneside have more appointments on unelected boards than there are air ticket promises in a Hoover salesman's pocket.

The Government know that few of their actions, whether establishing unelected public boards or contracting out public services, are ultimately about delivery. If the Government are honest, they should admit that all such moves challenge the concept that community provision has validity and local people have a right and ability to determine the level and nature of the services that they want. If the Government have any honesty, they will admit that those measures during the past 14 years of Tory government have been a cynical and systematic strategy to break up the power of, and services provided by, local authorities.

Will not the Government admit that the reason that they begrudge community provision is that, in many cases, it means more money for the ordinary, vast mass of people in this country than for the very rich? The Government find that inconsistent with the philosophy of "Put yourself first" in Tory Britain. Are not the Conservatives frightened of local democracy? They believe that it is a highly dangerous counterforce to central Government control, as it allows local people to be responsible for the policies in their communities. That policy often poses a direct challenge to both the position and views of Tory central Government.

The Minister said that he now felt more sympathetic towards local government. He recently issued a press release from his Department—on 25 March—containing the following welcome comment:

"Local Government is not just in the business of providing services. It should also be a natural leader of local communities."

Opposition Members would have no difficulty in supporting those sentiments.

Earlier this morning, the Minister said that he liked to refer to the 1970s and drew some comparisons between now and the 1970s, when his writings about local authorities and local authority provision were prolific. I am pleased to remind the House of what the Minister said about local authorities when he was a councillor in Oxfordshire in 1977, and pleased that the Government welcome further references to the 1970s. Writing in the "National Westminster Bank Review" in February 1977, he said:

[Mr. Henderson]

"It would be quite possible to repeal community land legislation, to put an end to structure planning, to cease providing public recreational facilities, to cease policing trading standards and to abolish a whole range of local authority services . . . Radical reform"—

The Minister has a reputation as a radical—

"would include the cessation of all public housing and a return to market place decisions."

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham) indicated assent.

Mr. Henderson: I see that those comments have the approval of some of the Minister's Conservative colleagues. The Minister was not content with those remarks, because the review continued:

"the welter of corn-dolly making courses and swimming pools"— contrary to what he said this morning—

"are no longer feasible in the new financial climate."

Like me, the House may find it interesting to compare those views with those that the Minister now expresses. It may be helpful for the Minister to clarify his position. Is he now saying that he was right in 1977 when he said that it was possible to repeal community land legislation, end structure planning, cease providing recreational facilities, cease trading standards, cut out vocational evening classes, close swimming pools and abolish public housing? Is he saying that he was right then and is wrong now?

Mr. Redwood: Some of my words were prophetic because when the Conservative Government came into office they scrapped community land legislation, which was a tax on success and regeneration. The Conservative Government got rid of two-tier planning in London, which was an unnecessary and burdensome cost. In the conditions of 1976-77, when the article was written, the country was bankrupt thanks to the Labour Government, which meant pulling in our horns over some desirable schemes. Now that we have had many years of Conservative prosperity, we can take a more relaxed view of some of those matters.

Mr. Henderson: I do not know how the Minister has the gall to say that the country was bankrupt——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): We paid it all back.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Sedentary observations, particularly from the Front Bench, are to be deplored.

Mr. Henderson: I do not know how the Minister has the gall to say that the country was bankrupt in 1977 when unemployment was a third of what it is today, there was growth and the social fabric of our country was in much better health than it is today.

Is the Minister saying that he was right then and is wrong now, or is he saying that everything that he said then was wrong and the action that flowed from it, providing the philosophical base of Tory policy in the 1980s, was wrong? Is he saying that he now believes in local government and that the policies of the Conservative Government of the 1980s were at best inappropriate and, more likely, damaging to our British way of life? What is his real view of and honest position on local government and the provision of local government services? I am happy to give way to the Minister if he wishes to reply.

On the issue of the provision of resources for local authority demands in the current year, the Secretary of State for the Environment said on 26 November 1992 that "provided that local authorities manage their resources efficiently, they should be able to maintain the full range of services they provide."—[Official Report, 26 November 1992; Vol. 214, c. 1011.]

There are now clearly cuts in services and jobs in many parts of the country as a result of the restrictions in the budget settlement. There are also cuts in services and job losses in many Conservative-controlled authorities.

Does the Minister agree with his boss, the Secretary of State? If he does, what is he saying to those Conservative-controlled authorities? What will he say to his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment about Barnet council, which faces a £7 million cut, and where a residential home has been closed and a day nursery has been threatened with closure? Is the Minister saying that what is happening in Barnet has everything to do with delivery? Is he saying that Barnet council is inefficient?

What is he saying to Enfield council, a Tory-controlled authority in north London, in which his hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) may be interested? That council faces a £10·7 million cut, 400 jobs have gone, the discretionary award scheme for students is being threatened, and the youth service is being threatened with cuts. Is the Minister saying that Enfield council is inefficient and that that is why it finds itself in difficulties?

What is the Minister saying to Conservative-controlled Castle Point council, which has been capped? Is he saying that it has been capped because it is inefficient? If he is not saying that, does he accept that his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State misled the House when he made his statement last November?

What would the Minister say to Bill Dixon-Smith, the Conservative leader of the Association of County Councils, who said on the BBC television programme, "On the Record", on a Sunday a few weeks ago:

"Because of the capping regime, local government no longer has any room to manoeuvre. In effect, even the level of the Council Tax is also set by the centre. As I believe in independent local government, that is wrong. So in an absolute sense it must and always will be wrong and personally I will always fight against it.

The man who pays the piper calls the tune. The Government is paying up all the money, they say 'we have an absolute right to say what should happen'.

Now I find that obnoxious. The purpose of local government is to judge what is necessary locally and do it. But at the moment we don't have the independence I think we ought to have."

Does the Minister agree that, because of the capping regime, local government no longer has any room to manoeuvre, as Mr. Dixon-Smith, the Conservative leader of the Association of County Councils, says? Does he agree that local councillors are better placed to judge what is necessary locally? Does he understand why Mr. Dixon-Smith finds it obnoxious that central Government believe that they have the absolute right to say what should happen?

The Prime Minister said at the Tory local government conference that an end must be put to wrangling between central and local government and that local government should be left to get on with the job. The Minister has made similar comments in recent weeks. Does he recognise that those who face cuts in services in communities throughout the country and those who are either threatened with the loss of, or who have already lost, their jobs in councils throughout the country—perhaps people in Barnet and Enfield—are aware, as Mr. Dixon-Smith seems to be aware, that there is a huge gap between the Government's rhetoric, the Prime Minister's rhetoric, the Secretary of State for the Environment's rhetoric and the Minister's own rhetoric and what is actually happening in councils throughout the country? Does the Minister agree that if that gap is to be narrowed, and that if conciliation is to be genuine, a major review of local government financial structures is necessary?

Mr. Redwood: If the hon. Gentleman had an increase of 3·7 per cent. in the current year, would he be plausible if he went round saying that he had had a cut? Local government has had a 3·7 per cent. increase in respect of business rates and grants from the centre.

Mr. Henderson: The Minister and I have had this argument before.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): The hon. Gentleman has lost the argument.

Mr. Henderson: No; the Minister has lost the argument. It has been shown clearly that the figure of 3·7 per cent. is an accountancy figure, a notional figure. The real increase in cash resources between what local government spent last year, based on capping regulations imposed by a Conservative Government, and what local government needs to spend this year to stay within the law is very much lower than 3·7 per cent. Independent sources have estimated it to be a 1 per cent. increase in cash resources at a time when inflation is about 3 per cent. That is clearly a reduction in real resources.

Does the Minister agree that a fundamental review of the standard spending assessment system is urgently needed if any sense of equity among the competing claims for resources is to be restored, so that we do not end up in the ridiculous position whereby Huntingdon—the Prime Minister's area—is considered to be more socially deprived than Chester-le-Street? Anybody who took a walk from the railway station to the local hotel in those two places would immediately observe that that is not the case.

Does the Minister also agree that capping regulations should be changed now in order to give more democracy to local authorities and that there would then be a need to remove those capping regulations completely in the next financial round of financial settlements in the autumn statement?

I am not here this morning just to outline where I think that the Government have got things wrong in recent months and during the past 14 years. Conservative Members will be pleased to hear that I am also here to outline Labour's position on a number of these issues. I shall return to the point that was raised earlier by the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls).

The Opposition believe that if local democracy means anything—as the Minister is beginning to suggest he is adopting as a policy and as his friend, Mr. Bill Dixon-Smith, clearly believes is essential—capping should be ended and the system of distributing Government grant should be subject to a major review and overhaul. We say that because we believe in local democracy. Individual liberty requires the guarantee of democracy. Our nation's democracy is offended if there is no balance of power between central and local power structures. That balance requires more vigorous, independent and better-resourced local government.

Some Conservative Members, as evidenced this morning by a flurry of observations relating to the 1980s and Conservative philosophy during that period, have argued that community provision holds back individual liberty. Individual liberty and opportunity for the vast majority of people are enhanced by community provision of education and training, by community regulation of our environment, our space and our transport systems, by community provision of law and order forces and social action to tackle crime, by individual advice services to our citizens and by the provision of care services to our most underprivileged and vulnerable people. Our citizens, however, will not be empowered to have more control over their own lives unless their liberty is protected. Their liberty can be guaranteed only by community provision, which can be guaranteed only by local democracy.

Our citizens are entitled to the efficient use of public resources. Value for money must be assured by sound auditing procedures. Where inefficiencies are identified in services provided either directly or indirectly by subcontractors, they must be put right. Councils must decide—here I come to the point raised by the hon. Member for Teignbridge—as they have decided for more than 100 years, how best they can meet their responsibilities. If they judge that direct provision is most effective, they must be allowed to make that choice. If, on the other hand, they judge that the subcontracting of services is better, tendering should be on the basis that the council determines the quality of the service and that legal obligations are met in relation to the terms and conditions of the staff.

Mr. Nicholls: I do not believe that the difference between us on this point is as great as it might seem, but it is in one crucial respect. How on earth can it be decided that a council has made the right decision in contracting out its services unless it is required to go through the process of competitive tendering?

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. What is crucial is not just that services that have been contracted out are measured in relation to efficiency but that services that have been provided directly are also measured in relation to efficiency, and that the overall efficiency of the council is not broken down by having too great a division between those services which are contracted out and those services which are not. A recent London Business School survey, reported in the Municipal Journal, reinforces that point.

The Labour party is not against councils tendering in the private sector for the provision of services. Councils have always tendered in the private sector. The important point is that councils should make the right judgment on how best they can provide services by means of a combination of direct provision—some services cannot be contracted out and have to be provided directly—and indirect, subcontracted provision.

[Mr. Henderson]

If one believes in local democracy, which I thought the Government suggested earlier in the debate they had been converted to, one has to resolve the conflict between central Government telling local government how it should provide its services and local government having the democratic right to decide on the best way to provide those services.

The important point for central Government to understand, contrary to the impression that has been given during the past 10 years, is that central auditing procedures should be tightened up, as should the reporting procedures, so that everyone in the community, both those involved at local government and central Government level, are fully informed about what is actually happening in local authorities. Then decisions can be made about whether the Government need to change the regulations that govern the way in which the provision is made. That decision cannot be made until they know how efficiently services are being run at local level. That is what the quality commission, for which the Labour party argued at the last election, would have been responsible for finding out. I concede to those who exaggerate the productivity impact of compulsory competitive tendering that it can improve efficiency, but it has not always done so. In some instances, compulsory competitive tendering has reduced the quality of service and, in many instances, it has reduced the wages and conditions of the staff who have to provide those services. In some cases, it has been adopted as a cover to break up the integrity of community provision; it starts by cutting the corners and finishes by cutting the services.

The only guarantee of effective delivery of service is good management. That is true of services that are directly provided and of subcontracted services. In the spirit of their recent mutterings, I challenge the Government to strive to obtain the most effective way of delivering local services and to stand up for the principle of local people deciding local services. If the Government agree to no more than what many Conservative councillors are demanding, they will revoke the current rules on the standard spending assessment, end capping and seek to restore democratic local government. That is what the Labour party demands, and it is reasonable to do so. I believe that the majority of the British people support that demand and that the majority of those who live in county council areas will support it on 6 May.

10.30 am

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I begin by declaring my interest as a parliamentary adviser to the Federation of Associations of Specialists and Sub-contractors and the National Sub-contractors Council. I also hold a partnership in a firm of solicitors called Dunn and Baker.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) forgot to mention Mr. Beecham. He was so generous in giving way that I did not want to remind him yet again. In case that troubles him, I shall refer to Mr. Beecham again, and if by then he has understood what he said and wants to intervene again, I shall happily let him do so. By then he will have had a long time to work out the answer to the point.

Like many hon. Members, I have experience of local government. I served on a district council and now work as closely as possible with my own district council in Teignbridge. Teignbridge district council, like the council on which I served, is not perfect, but it is extremely good. Like any council, its performance must be judged against the service that it provides to local people.

Ultimately, the only test that can be applied is, how good is the service and how much does it cost? There is nothing wrong or contradictory in saying that a council is judged by its services and how much they cost because, directly or indirectly, local people pay for the service.

Even under the arrangements for the council tax, 14 per cent. of the money that is spent by local government is raised locally. That represents an inevitable but substantial burden on local council tax payers, and obviously the burden of inefficient services will fall on local people. Therefore, the ultimate test of councils must be whether they provide that service and at an appropriate price.

That may sound relatively uncontroversial, but it can go slightly deeper. Labour Members sometimes express their belief—perhaps more than we have heard today—that councils have a further role as job providers and that their worth can be assessed by how many jobs they provide.

That point was put honestly, if somewhat starkly, in a radio programme about three weeks ago. A COHSE trade union official was being interviewed about the national health service and he said that it was the responsibility of the national health service to provide work for the people who work within it. I waited for the qualification that I thought would follow about service to the consumer, but it did not come. I do not criticise him for that—he obviously felt strongly that the NHS has a role as a job provider—but I disagree with that assessment. A council is not entitled to justify its performance by saying, "We do a range of tasks for which we may not be well fitted, but we provide jobs."

Where do we go from there? It must be in the interests of local people that, where possible, services are put out to competitive tendering. It is such a common-sense proposition that one wonders why one must argue about it at all. In an earlier intervention I mentioned Jeremy Beecham, the Labour chairman of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, who said, straightforwardly:

"compulsory competitive tendering has brought some cost-effectiveness and genuine saving which might not otherwise have been achieved."

That tribute to the effectiveness of a process that the Labour party has opposed throughout and apparently opposes today is all the more impressive for having been said through clenched teeth.

But it is not just Mr. Beecham. The chief executive of a Labour authority, Kieron Walsh, writing on competitive tendering for local authority services seems to have gone beyond the clenched-teeth stage to positive enthusiasm. He said:

"There is an awful lot that comes from it"— compulsive competitive tendering.

"There is much greater knowledge of particular service areas. It exposes an awful lot of inefficiencies formerly taken for granted. We are a more efficient, slimmer organisation. It has had real and definite benefits and not just in defined services."

There is nothing particularly surprising in those comments. It is no more than the practical conclusion that one would draw from a common-sense proposition.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (Lancashire, West): It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman chose to quote a chief executive who is probably earning more than £60,000 a year. Has he any quotes from workers at the bottom end of services, whose wages are being cut and many of whose jobs are disappearing altogether as a result of what he repeatedly calls compulsive competitive tendering?

Mr. Nicholls: If the hon. Gentleman is troubled about the salary of the chief executive of a Labour authority, his questions might be better addressed to that authority. I should have thought, but I will stand corrected if the hon. Gentleman thinks that I am wrong, that it has probably said that it has to pay that sum to get somebody of suitable quality for such a responsible job. If the hon. Gentleman had said, "No, we give those salaries to our cronies," that would have been a different point that I had not anticipated.

It is perfectly obvious that it is in the interests of those who live in a local community that services should be provided cost-effectively. I hoped to hear today, but we have not heard it, the Labour party's attitude to that. My hon. Friend the Minister said that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) does not seem to understand quite where he stands on this. In his interview with Tribune, he seemed to be saying that there is something to be said for it, but later he is quoted as saying there is not so much to be said for it.

In the Tribune article, the hon. Gentleman says that he sees the case for CCT for the provision of basic services such as refuse collection, and at the launch of Labour county council election campaign in response to the question,

"Are you still opposed to CCT?"

he said:

"Yes we are, because it does not lead to great increases and improvements in efficiency."

That is the position of the mugwump through the ages. Labour Members will recall that Lord Shinwell defined that as someone who keeps his mug on one side of the fence and his wump on the other.

One cannot have it both ways. The problem is that Labour has not said how it feels about CCT. It is quite straightforward. Going out to tender produces the information that a council needs to know whether it is providing its services efficiently. It is worth spending a moment or two considering what happens when councils are asked to go through that process, which even Labour politicians and Labour appointees believe serves their community well.

I shall give only two brief examples, one from Bristol. As it was obliged to do, Bristol council recently put its services out to tender. It put out a single huge tender for its refuse collection services, street cleaning, public convenience and building cleaning. Not surprisingly, no one private firm was able to come up with a contract which would have been worth more than £6 million.

Rather more interesting is what happened in the Nottingham area in 1990. The Labour-controlled council put out to tender its road-sweeping and refuse collection services, and awarded the contracts to its own workers despite two lower bids. To celebrate the triumph of compulsory competitive tendering, it was announced that a party would be held to mark the awarding of the contract. That party cost about £2,000, but I do not know whether the catering went to outside caterers. However, the example shows that, even if at times lip service is paid to observing the law in the first instance, it is often not observed throughout the process. I hope that the Minister will be able to say what is being done to prevent such flouting of the law.

Although the case is well made for proper compulsory competitive tendering, there are two aspects on which one must ask whether the application of the general rule works as it should. The first aspect is that of specialisms, of which two are especially important—the provision of legal services and education services. I am sure that there are others of which other hon. Members will have experience.

Teignbridge district council has told me that the legal services provided by a local authority are often specialised. Local authority law is not the mainstream law with which solicitors in private practice are usually involved. Clearly, in a major city such as Exeter, there are a number of extremely good firms of solicitors which provide a full range of services. As such firms operate in large cities, they have the expertise to provide competent services across a range of subjects.

There are many excellent firms, but it has been pointed out to me that, in smaller areas, it may not be possible for smaller firms of solicitors to compete and offer the same level of expertise as exists in-house in local authorities, because those firms cannot offer the same specialism.

Hon. Members know that law is an increasingly specialised business. The fact that one holds a legal qualification does not mean in practice that one can deal with a particular class of work as competently as it should be dealt with. That may sound odd coming from a solicitor in private practice, but it is a fair point which has been well made to me by my own district council. I hope that the Minister will refer to specialised services.

The second specialism that concerns me was mentioned by my county council. Although there are transitional arrangements to enable the county council to offer the services of its own educational psychologists to grant-maintained schools in its local authority area, they are time-limited and, in due course, the council will not be able to offer those services. To some extent, it is the mirror image of CCT, but it reinforces the main point that certain in-house specialisations and skills in local authorities may not be available outside. That problem should be taken into account.

Another point that has been mentioned briefly and has caused some misunderstanding is the provision of part III residential retirement homes in the private or local authority sector. From the comments that one hears—usually from the Opposition—one would think that there was only one way to provide part III residential accommodation for retired people, and that is through a particular outfit. The classic way of providing a retirement home structure is through the local authority. Clearly, those who work in the local authority believe that to be so because, understandably, they are thinking of their jobs.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the best test would be to ask elderly people and allow them to choose whether to go into the private or public sector? Should there not be a level playing field so that the same rules for the financing the care of the elderly in residential homes apply to both sectors? Does he agree with the Select Committee on Health's conclusion that the present rules need changing because they discriminate in favour of the private sector and against the public sector, which is what some elderly people chose?

[Mr. Hugh Bayley]

Mr. Nicholls: I would agree, if it were not for my own experience. Often, when it is proposed that there should be greater provision of private retirement accommodation at the expense of local authority accommodation, the public sector unions tells people that they are being privatised, will have to go into inferior accommodation and will end up as the product of someone's profit motive.

Mr. Bayley indicated dissent.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but I am speaking from my experience of my county. He will speak from experience of his county, but I know how the public sector unions opposed plans in Devon to replace the substandard accommodation that it was providing with better private sector accommodation.

I understand that people working in the public sector in county council homes regard the greater involvement of the private sector as a threat to their jobs, but that should not ultimately guide us. We should be guided not only by the job prospects of those who work in the homes but by the standard of accommodation being offered to retired people. That is the ultimate test. The idea that suitable accommodation can be provided only by a local authority is entirely wrong.

I have probably spent more time in retirement homes than many people of my age, because my mother was the matron of a county council part III residential home. One of the things that I picked up over the years, having lived in homes in the private and public sectors, is that elderly people need the comfort and security of a service well delivered.

To tell people living in retirement accommodation that services would be better delivered in another way will not automatically appeal to them greatly in the twilight of their days. It is important that we can tell them that they are not being farmed out to provide profits for wicked entrepreneurs but that they are being provided with a service better than that which they would receive in the local authority sector. That is the ultimate criterion.

Mr. Bayley: Is not it wrong for the council, the Government or anyone other than the elderly person and his family to decide whether one provision is better than another? Does the hon. Gentleman agree with my earlier point, that it should be for the elderly person himself or herself, with the support of the family, to choose where to go, and that there should be a diverse range of provision from which to choose? After all, we are talking about elderly people's homes; the hon. Gentleman knows that from his experience of the residential care sector. Should it not be for elderly people to choose where they are to live in the last few years of their lives?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman is clearly most well meaning, but he is also an innocent abroad. Does he think that that is the way in which the matter was put to people when Devon county council was phasing out some substandard accommodation? The hon. Gentleman comes from a gentler part of the world than I do. What I saw going on in my county was public sector unions ruthlessly exploiting the fears of people who were about to be given a choice, by terrifying the life out of them and telling them that they would be in all sorts of trouble if they found themselves——

Mr. Bayley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Nicholls: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman again in a moment, because he makes my case even more effectively than I do, which frankly is saying something.

What I found especially interesting during the general election campaign was meeting a number of people who had moved into private retirement homes from the county council sector and said that they had had no idea how good it would be and that they only wished that they had had the opportunity earlier.

We have managed to give people that opportunity. Those who back the public sector unions, following their own particular interest, know the business that they are in. The problem for the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley), for many of his hon. Friends and for all Labour Front-Bench Members is that, if one is sponsored by the whole range of public sector unions, one cannot act objectively on the matter.

Mr. Bayley: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way three times. I wish that he would not cloak his argument in spurious attacks on trade unions, and I wish that he would stick to the point—the welfare of elderly people.

Before I came to the House, I was a health economist. I carried out a survey in a Conservative-controlled county council of care for the elderly in private sector residential homes and nursing homes, in national health service long-stay beds and in the county's part III publicly owned residential homes. I interviewed more than 1,000 elderly people about their preferences.

Fewer than one in 20 in the public sector homes said that they would have chosen, when they moved into a home, to move in a private sector home. Fewer than one in 309 in private sector homes said that they would have considered moving into a public sector home. The choices of those individuals should be respected, whichever home they have chosen.

Will the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) therefore answer my question, not with vague references to and smears about trade unions, but by referring to consumer choice? Does he believe in consumer choice? Does he believe that elderly people, like any other people, should choose where they live?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman's aspirations would lead him to cross the Floor of the House, even if his logic did not. In Devon, people were not being offered a choice by the public sector unions. They were told, "If you leave the secure accommodation provided by this county council, you will be exploited in the outside world." The hon. Gentleman says that I was attacking trade unions. I was careful to say that I understood why those who are in public sector trade unions and who work in part III residential homes within the county council structure are concerned. I did not attack them for one moment.

Let me make it clear to the hon. Member for York that the people I have been attacking are the local politicians —politicians ultimately like himself—who are irredeemably compromised. On the one hand, they are sponsored largely by public sector trade unions. On the other hand, they know that a choice can be provided for elderly people who could benefit from it, to the possible detriment of the job interests of those who put them here. That was my attack. I promise the hon. Gentleman that I reserve my attack entirely for the politicians, and not for those who operate within the public sector.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Is there free choice when only the Government have free speech?

Mr. Nicholls: No. In this sector and in many others, there will be an element of choice only if the House ensures that there is an element of choice. If it were left to local authorities, and especially if it were left to Labour authorities, there would be no choice. The whole history of compulsory competitive tendering shows that it benefits the community and that it has been opposed to the hilt by the Labour party.

All this debate has to be judged against one criterion only: do the processes of CCT and the other processes about which we have talked produce a benefit to the consumer? If they do, that justifies them. The fact that, in the process, vested interests may find that their noses are put out of joint is neither here nor there. Ultimately, it is local people and the service that is delivered to them which should be the final judgment on the processes that we have discussed.

10.54 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I welcome the debate greatly because the subject is timely and also generally important. I welcomed the summary of the Government's position—if it is now to be reflected in their policy—when the Minister said those three simple but often repeated words, "Local government matters". It matters greatly. It matters that more and more people of high quality are involved as councillors and as officers in local government. Many good people are already involved in local government, as councillors and as officers. However—I know that the Minister shares this view—there are some who are not involved because the present structure is not conducive to such involvement. One target that we have to seek to achieve in debating and regularly deciding the question how we develop local government is to maximise the best use of the best people so that the best services are delivered to the widest number.

The Minister made one other statement with which I partly agree. In large measure, the job of local authorities should be to enable rather than to provide. That does not, of course, mean that often they should not provide. That is where the Government begin to get into some difficulty. One of the Minister's phrases, which Hansard will record accurately, suggested that local government services should be principally for those in need. That depends on definition. I would not support the Minister if he said that the free provision of public libraries should be for those in need and then defined those in need as those who could not afford to buy books. There is a range of services which should be freely available at the point of delivery and to which people should contribute according to their ability to pay through local and central taxation but which should be freely available for everyone. Many of the services that local government provides are such services. To take up an exchange earlier in the debate, people may choose to opt into local authority accommodation for the elderly and such accommodation should be available for people to choose.

In his peroration, the Minister said that the wind was now set fair for prosperity. Ministers always live with hope triumphing over reality. He may be right.

Mr. Redwood: I am.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister is never modest. Whether he is right is not yet entirely clear. Let us hope that he is right. The more prosperous the nation, the more we can ensure that local government provides higher quality services because there will be more money to spend.

This debate raises not only the question of what the balance between public and private provision should be, and how much the private sector should be a partner, but other fundamental issues. For my lifetime and for decades before that, there have been battles over local government. As our constitution gives no guaranteed place to local government, and as we have a sovereign Parliament which can do anything, unrestrained by a constitution or a supreme court, local government could be abolished by this place tomorrow. For local government, that is a fundamental weakness because it allows Parliament to interfere regularly with local government, and not always to the advantage of the provision of local services.

The history of the Tory party and local government over the past 30 years has not been glorious. The Tories created the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council in the 1960s. They reviewed the shire structure and created new counties in the 1970s. They abolished the metropolitan counties, the GLC and the Inner London education authority in the 1980s. Now central Government have realised that they did not get it right when they reviewed the counties in the 1970s and propose to abolish some or all of them and other councils as well. That whole process has hardly been conducive to the stability of local government. My fundamental theme today, which has already been hinted at, is that Government have often acted without the consent and co-operation of the people in local government and of the people on whose behalf services are delivered.

There has been regular central Government interference in the financial regime under which local government works. The revenue support grant and the standard spending assessment have both been decided by the Government and not as a result of a collaborative decision or, better still, a decision by local authorities. Local government should itself be asked to agree the formula for the allocation of money. We had the rates and the poll tax and we have just started with the council tax—a series of different local financial regimes that have not generally taken into account the views of the people delivering the service; indeed, the poll tax did not take those views into account at all. These people have argued strongly about the foolishness of the Government's proposals. Now, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) said, all this has also been circumscribed by capping so that no local authority has the freedom to decide how much it wants to raise and spend without certain decisions having severe adverse implications.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about the method of grant distribution and said that local authorities should be able to determine the basis of that distribution. He should anchor his argument a little closer to the ground. As he knows, the Government are undertaking a full review of the SSA this year in the light of the new census output, and we already circulate provisional SSAs each year. The hon. Gentleman must accept, however, that there will never be a way of distributing money that will be 100 per cent. popular with local authorities, for the understandable reason that every change that is made brings benefits to some and disbenefits to others. That will ever be the case.

[Mr. Robin Squire]

Mr. Hughes: Of course I understand that, and I accept that it will ultimately be the responsibility of central Government to decide the total sum, inasmuch as this concerns money that central Government hands back to local government—leaving aside the money that local government can raise. My hon. Friends and I have long argued, however, that it should be left to local government —unless it fails to do so—to work out the formula. What local authorities actually get will depend on the total, but the formula should be left to them to determine. I believe that if we had a system similar to the election of the Pope and locked local government away and waited for the white smoke, it would eventually reach agreement on its own formula and prefer that to one imposed by central Government of whatever party. That formula would be better for some local authorities than others, but, in any event, everyone would be forced to reach agreement.

A further question that is central to the debate is how we can ensure quality and value for money in the delivery of local government services. That involves questions of audit and accountability. Although we have an audit process, the public do not see the results clearly; they are not given regular independent information, statistics and audit review results in respect of their local government services. Those involved in the auditing process ought to be able to report back to the public, local authority by local authority on a regular basis.

As yet, there is not adequate accountability either, although the extent of accountability varies in different parts of the country. Of course there are elections, but the more that local government services have been put out to quangos, which are not accountable, the less accountability there has been. As the Minister realises, I know about that specifically because for a decade many of the decisions in my borough—and, indeed, in my constituency—have been in the hands of the London Docklands development corporation, a body appointed entirely by the Secretary of State for the Environment. In every case, the majority of those serving on the LDDC have come from outside local government. That is not an accountable service. The LDDC's planning committee is in no way accountable to my constituents or to me. That is not good local government and does not produce democratic results.

I believe that the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities is considering proposals that will in part improve accountability in London, and I hope that something will happen sooner rather than later in that regard. I understand that serious consideration is being given to the proposal that elections to borough councils should be annual as opposed to four-yearly. That would bring London into line with the rest of the country and would improve accountability. I hope that the legislation to allow that to happen is introduced soon.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North will know that we share his view that capping should be ended and that there would be a revision of local government funding. That is fundamental. We also share his view—and this is perhaps his most important point philosophically—that individual liberty is enhanced by good community provision rather than demeaned by it. That is important. I mean no criticism of the hon. Gentleman when I say that it is important that those in the Labour leadership, who understand these things, should ensure that their local authority colleagues also understand them. I speak from bitter experience when I say that they seem still not to be the views of many Labour councillors or in many local Labour parties.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) was right in stating that the job of local government is not to provide jobs for people in local government. It may be to provide jobs in the community to assist regeneration, but the defence of self-interest in the form of local government jobs is not its purpose at all. I would qualify my remarks, however. Suppose that—as has happened in my borough —there is a threat to remove wardens from sheltered housing units and the elderly people respond by saying, "We want the wardens." The retention of certain jobs is fundamental to the provision of the service. Certain jobs —the jobs of home helps, care assistants, social workers, teachers and residential wardens—are fundamental to an integrated local community service. People sometimes prefer to deal with staff employed by the local authority than with a contractor who sends different agency staff from one day to the next. That makes for a far less good quality service.

Local government has had many problems over the past 14 years, but its main problem has been that the Tories have put dogma first rather than need. The Government's privatisation policies for local government have brought some benefits, but they have also often brought hurt, no cost saving and no satisfactory result. It is not necessarily the case that jobs can be done better by the private sector; there is no evidence for that. It is not necessarily true either that the cheaper the tender price is the better the job will be. It is quality, not cheapness, which should be the determining factor. It is in their subservience to the principle of privatisation come what may and compulsory competitive tendering that the Tories have gone wrong. Of course competitive tendering should be allowed, but local government should make that choice rather than having competitive tendering forced on them.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman will know that I have embarrassed both of us before by saying how much I agree with him and I shall do so on this occasion, too. Surely the hon. Gentleman is saying that competitive tendering can produce benefits. It would surely be common ground between us that, if it were not compulsory, there is no way in which a number of Labour-controlled authorities would ever do it, for the reasons to which he alluded. If, in particular cases, the process of compulsory competitive tendering has not delivered a service, it has failed in accordance with its own terms of reference. There is no question of Conservative Members justifying that, as we would be as concerned about it as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. Hughes: I understand that important argument. It is a fundamental principle of democracy that people should be allowed to make mistakes. I believe that the people made the mistake of electing the wrong Government in the past four general elections. I am consoled only by the fact that a minority of people voted for the Government, so it was a minority mistake and not a majority mistake. The system delivered the wrong result. We must allow the same principle in local government.

If we have a very good auditing system and the report of the auditing process reaches the people, if a local council —for example, my Labour-controlled Southwark council —does not have a competitive tendering process in leisure provision or the management of parks and it therefore provides bad value for money, the audit process should expose it and that would influence the electorate at an election. I understand the arguments, but there should be a reaction by the local people instead of an imposition by central Government who know much less about the needs of Southwark or Teignbridge than the people who live there.

Mr. Robin Squire: Does not the history of the past 10 years or so demonstrate that what the hon. Gentleman has described does not deliver the goods? Indeed, no less than one of the then Labour spokesmen pointed out that without CCT Liverpool would not have cleaned its streets.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister understands the point that of course we sometimes end up with a bad service if we leave it to people who are not good at running the service. However, the ballot box exists to enable people to kick out the bad service providers.

For example, Labour-run Lambeth has had a history of the worst excesses of Labour local government. There were recently two by-elections in Lambeth—one in a solid Labour ward and one in the ward just over Westminster bridge—and my colleagues won both of them from Labour because those voters said that they would no longer put up with Labour in Lambeth. I hope that that continues next year and that Labour in Lambeth is swept from office because Labour deserves to go. However, we must leave that to the electorate. If the electorate decide that they cannot be bothered to change things, we must live with that. Indeed, the Minister, at his level, has been the beneficiary of that for the past few years.

To finalise the point, the Audit Commission and many other experts in local government have made it clear that the private sector does not necessarily deliver a better result. The Audit Commission has made that point regularly when considering urban policy and other matters.

I believe that the partnership between the good in the private sector and the good in the public sector must, however, include the vital third element: a partnership with the people who must make the choices. If the people do not comprise the third partner, and if we believe we can take the decisions for them, we are not doing what is best for local government.

Local government should not be a battlefield between public and private dogmas. My colleagues and I, and our predecessor parties, believe in a partnership approach which brings together the public sector, private business, community and voluntary groups and, most importantly, the local people in each local council area.

Liberal Democrats believe that local government should be accountable through local, democratically elected representatives. We do not believe that better service can be achieved if local government is increasingly fragmented through more quangos created by central Government which sidestep the process of local accountability. Ours is the kind of partnership, coupled with accountability, which delivers the best results. We believe that it gives the plurality of service provision that a country, with all its diversity, requires. It also allows the different communities and community mixes to be reflected in their local government services.

I accept that the Minister has become much more measured since his earlier and obviously more headstrong days in the 1970s. Perhaps that is the result of the sobering experience of first being a parliamentary candidate in the constituency of Peckham. That was not a particularly successful part of the Minister's political career before he went to the leafy shire seat of Wokingham—at least, in comparison to Peckham, Wokingham is a leafy shire.

I hope that one of the things to come from the Government's review is that we shall establish the core duties of local government so that we can agree the purpose of local government. Many people in local government do not know what local government is for. The police do not know, as they are about to have local accountability taken from them—apart from in London where at last, after a very long time, we are to have a little local accountability. Teachers do not know, because in many cases schools are becoming grant maintained and moving outside the local authority system, as further education has also just done.

There must be some security about the obligation and duty of local government. Of course, that can be the subject of local debate, but we must be clear that, unless everything that is provided locally is provided adequately, we are not providing the service that local people want.

There is another fundamental flaw in the present system. We regularly legislate for local government to provide services. The latest large-scale example of that relates to community care which is in force from this month. The Minister wanted to know why people always ask for more money from local government. They do that because when we tell local councils, through legislation, to do something, no one guarantees that they have the resources to perform that task. It is a fundamental failing in our system that we can pass any law that we like without guaranteeing the money to carry out what we require people to do.

Until we sort that out, local government will always fail to deliver, in a way that is different from central government, because central Government ultimately have the power to collect the money to do whatever they want. That is why 92 per cent. of the directors of social services have just said that the Government are not funding community care adequately. That is why the standard spending assessment structure, which is based, as I understand it still is, on the level of spending in 1985, has been so criticised. The Minister looks doubtful as I say that, but I understand that the fundamental structure is based on that pattern. Obviously, we know that it has been tinkered with. Indeed, it is tinkered with every year, as we all know to our cost. However, we must try to establish that financial relationship on a more secure basis.

In the world of local and central government, particularly in the run-up to elections such as this year's county elections, there are always discussions of where there will and where there will not be pacts. I observe that there are discussions in Berkshire, no doubt in the context of the Newbury by-election. I believe that there should be many more pacts. However, the pacts that I am talking about today are clearer and more secure pacts with the people for whom social services should be provided.

[Mr. Hughes]

We must ensure that we enable the local government that local people have chosen. We must ensure that we do not impose on people local government structures that we believe are best for them. Whitehall and Westminster do not know best.

Tomorrow I will attend the launch of the vote to establish the largest tenants' management co-operative to be set up from local authority property in Britain, on the Tabard Garden estate in my constituency. There are 35 blocks of council properties on the estate and a community of 1,500 or more people. They will decide to take on their own management. They have opted to do their own thing. That is a choice exercised by them under legislation.

Our job should be to legislate to allow local government to make choices and to allow people to make choices from the services provided by local government. That is the way to secure that we get the best quality of service and the best people to provide it at the best possible cost. I hope that in the future we have less dogma and are more responsive to what people say that they want.

11.18 am

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): I am pleased to be called to participate in the debate, because for some years I was a councillor on Kirklees metropolitan council. That council was spawned by the Local Government Act 1974. Probably no one knows where Kirklees is, but everyone knows the location of Huddersfield and Dewsbury. Those two towns were fused, like reluctant Siamese twins, by that same Act which sought to destroy the Ridings in my county. I hope that that situation will soon be rectified.

When I left school in 1974, I joined our family company, which was established in 1845. One way or another over the past 150 years, our company has seen many changes in local government. In the context of the debate, it is interesting to examine the meaning of the phrase "private enterprise". At its simplest, private enterprise is the best system yet devised by mankind for the supply of goods and services.

When my grandfather used to rock me on his knee, he told me about the Labour party and its plans for nationalisation. What an old-fashioned word that seems today for an old-fashioned creed. He told me how Labour regarded business and business men. If he were alive today, would he recognise the present Labour party? He would not, but only because, in his day, that party was made up of genuine working-class socialists, whereas the present rulers of that ailing party tend to be middle-class adherents to sociology rather than socialism. Its councillors want to impose their modish views on race, sex, education and feminism on our local and national life.

Labour is a party of left-wing teachers and lecturers, but even they cannot ignore the fact that, in 1993, from Moscow to Manchester, all around the world, the market is the best possible method of supplying goods and services. The opposite method, the public sector, has been proved beyond all doubt to be the worst possible method of supplying goods and services. Today of all days bears witness to the truth of that. Of all the 47 British companies that the Government have put back in the private sector, which one has downed tools today? There is a deathly silence in the House. The answer is that none of them has downed tools, because they are all getting on with the job.

Those companies are not interested in political strikes led by maniacs from the 1970s, who dream of the days when they brought this nation to its knees. The only companies in which strike action is taken nowadays are in the mollycoddled public sector where people are led by union bosses who think that everyone owes them a living, a guaranteed job for life. We see that today in the actions of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, and the National Union of Teachers, the Confederation of Health Service Employees, the National Union of Public Employees and the National and Local Government Officers Association are adopting the same appalling attitude.

That brings me neatly to the subject of local government, which remains largely the preserve of the public sector. The rigours of the market have been brought to bear in many areas of our previously semi-nationalised public life, with resulting benefits, and it is clearly in the interests of the public to extend such benefits to local government. They need to be extended by the bucketful, especially in the metropolitan areas.

I admit that dozens of councils have already seen the light, but there are many more Labour councils in which there is an inconceivable hostility to business and enterprise. In those councils, the threads of mistrust, rivalry and envy among councillors and officers alike frequently curdle into malice. In such places, the prevailing attitude is that if the council cannot get its nose in the trough, it is not worth going to the trough. While the rest of us in the real world have to get on with making a living by competing in the real world, the vast, gridlocked structure of municipal socialism has clamped itself securely to almost every aspect of local life.

Talk of partnership with private enterprise sounds hollow in the corridors of such town halls, but most services for the public can be better handled by the private sector. Business men seeking partnership in such areas are wasting their breath. In the meantime, people living in the areas have to deal with the council across a bewildering range of everyday activities that would be better done by the private sector. It is frustrating to hack one's way through the permafrost of local government processes whose icy grip has atrophied town centres all over the land. There is nothing dynamic or vital about Labour councils and officialdom. They toil between two masters—politics and financial constraints.

Some people say that the Government should give more money to Labour councillors, but those councillors have a voracious appetite for spending other people's money and the worst record for spending it unwisely. It is taxpayers' money, not the Government's. Business has different priorities and invigorating qualities.

Mr. Bayley: The hon. Gentleman represents a constituency in the same county as mine. Why is the borough of Scarborough charging a higher average council tax than Labour-controlled York, and why did it charge a higher poll tax than Labour-controlled York? Under the old rating system, why did it charge a higher average rate per household than York?

Mr. Sykes: I shall answer that with great pleasure, because the hon. Gentleman makes my case. Perhaps he is not aware that Scarborough borough council is Labour controlled. That is why the rates are so high.

Mr. Bayley: I do not think that it was Labour controlled when rates existed. It was Conservative controlled at that time, as it was during the period of the poll tax.

Mr. Sykes: The hon. Gentleman should know that the rating system was completely unfair. That is why a Conservative Government had the guts to destroy it and substitute a fairer system.

As I have said, business has different priorities and invigorating qualities that our towns desperately need. The last thing that business needs is a committee, a sub-committee or even an executive sub-committee, because usually anything that a Labour committee touches turns to stone. That is why there are now so many badly run towns, whereas at the turn of the century our local government was an example to the world.

In those days, there was a true partnership between the public and private sectors. The great men who built our great town halls, which by and large are now occupied by left-wing pigmies, built and ran them as a matter of pride and service. It was not because no one in the private sector would employ the people who worked in them, as is sometimes the case today. If a true partnership is to arise, it is vital to get local government back to basics.

Some people could be forgiven for wondering how on earth we ever managed before the Local Government Act 1974. Just as in the private sector, local government needs a bank manager breathing down its neck all the time and, as in the private sector, it needs true competition. Why is it that one can return almost anything to a Marks and Spencer shop if one is not satisfied with the goods, whereas, if one has more than a bin full of rubbish, one has great difficulty in trying to get council bin men to take it away?

Local government needs to realise that the customer is king, which is what the private sector has realised. Like it, before voting for expenditure, councillors must ask themselves, "If I had to dig my hand into my own pocket for this money, would I vote for this measure?" Councillors should be forced to meet in their own time. If that happened, the public would see how dedicated some of their Labour councillors were. Because of the partnership working properly between local government and the private sector, there would be less for councillors to talk about.

I have little hope that many Labour councils will ever come to terms with the importance of consumer-led services. They are interested only in producer-led services. They have closed minds and are interested only in closed shops. It is all done in the name of local people, but never in their interests.

The plain, unvarnished truth is that the vast bureaucratic structure of socialist local government has become one gigantic gravy train. It is saturated at almost every level by Labour party activists, and its top Labour councillors, many of whom one would not pay in washers, are clambering over one another for chairmanships, or chairs as we are supposed to call them these days, or for any committee place as long as it has an attendance allowance plus expenses.

County council elections are looming. Conservatives believe in partnership with the private sector and that consumer-led services are the most important of all. We believe that the consumer, the customer, is king, and that taxpayers' money is precious. The public also believe in those things. They share our vision, and that is why they will vote Conservative on 6 May.

11.29 am

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I have no objection to partnerships between the private sector and the public sector. Indeed, such partnerships have been a feature of local government for decades, if not centuries. Many of the most imaginative and innovative partnership schemes have been brought in by Labour authorities.

For example, in economic development, metropolitan counties such as West Yorkshire pioneered job creation partnerships between local government and the private sector and brought jobs into their regions. The Greater London enterprise board was established by a Labour-led Greater London council. However, the metropolitan counties and the GLC were abolished by the Conservative Government, partly because the Government did not like those public sector/private sector partnerships.

District councils also have a good track record. My district council, York city council, has brought in innovative schemes that have tied together private sector finance and council finance to build homes for homeless people.

No Conservative Member can give Labour Members any lessons about partnership between the private sector and the public sector. However, it is important that talk about partnership does not become an excuse that masks poor performance by local authorities, whether Conservative or Labour-controlled. Sadly, all too frequently, Conservative-led local authorities fail to perform or deliver value for money.

As I said a moment ago, as the Member for Parliament for York, I live in North Yorkshire county council, which is Conservative led. Its home help service is under-provided—constituents come to me seeking and needing a home help service that they cannot obtain—and hugely over-priced. For people in North Yorkshire on income support, the cost is £2·40 for two visits a week. Home help visits are built on one-hour blocks, but, in a rural area, travelling times mean that the actual visit is probably only half an hour.

For people on incomes low enough to entitle them to housing benefit, the charge is £4·80 for home help services, if they can get them. For people on a slightly higher, but still low, income, who do not receive benefits, the cost is £7·20 a week. Those are high costs for a badly needed service. In a neighbouring shire county—Labour-controlled Humberside—2 million hours of free home help service are provided to 16,000 people in need.

Let us take the example of the provision of nursery education for three and four-year-olds. In neighbouring Cleveland county council, to the north of North Yorkshire, 90 per cent. of three and four-year-olds attend nursery education provided by the council. In Humberside, more than 60 per cent. of three and four-year-olds receive nursery education, but in Conservative-controlled North Yorkshire, the figure is less than 40 per cent.

[Mr. Hugh Bayley]

I can tell the House of my experience as a parent—I say to the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes), unashamedly, a middle-class parent. I wanted my children to have nursery education and we were fortunate enough to obtain it, although not for the whole of the three and four-year period, in the one nursery school in York. That meant a journey across the river, through the city centre to the other side of town for two hours of nursery education for the earliest months and a slightly longer morning period afterwards.

My children were able to benefit from that experience because my wife was not in paid employment at the time, and she drove the children, through the rush hour traffic, to the nursery. She drove home, had an hour or so there and then drove back again to pick up the children.

That service was available, if one was lucky, to people who had the time and resources to travel to obtain it. That is in the urban centre of the county in York. The situation in rural North Yorkshire is worse, and the Conservative-led county council has slashed the programme for increasing the availability of nursery education. Labour authorities like Humberside and Cleveland do not need lessons from Conservatives about the quality of services.

Nursery education matters. A recent study—I admit to the hon. Member for Scarborough that it no doubt came from the sociology department or educational sociology department—by Leeds university showed that children who had had the benefit of nursery education performed significantly better at key stage 1 maths and English. The Government have set up the key stages as a way to measure the performance of children, of schools and of local authorities. If they believe in increasing the opportunities for individuals and in the quality of education, they should be doing what the Labour party promised in its election manifesto—establishing a programme to provide nursery education for every three and four-year-old whose parents want it.

Such an objective cannot be achieved instantly, but we said in our manifesto that we believe that it would be possible to achieve it by the end of the decade. The rate at which North Yorkshire is going means that we shall be a quarter of the way into the next century before that pledge can be met by that Conservative authority. However, in Labour-controlled Cleveland, it is already met.

Let us look at the police service. In 1979, according to the chief constable's report, just over 20,000 offences were reported to the police, and the figure had fallen for three years running. The most recent figures for North Yorkshire show 50,000 recorded offences, and the number is significantly increasing year after year. Crime in North Yorkshire is spiralling out of control.

What has been the response of the Conservative county council? In the five years of the last Labour Government, North Yorkshire received an authorised increase to the police establishment of 155 officers. In the first 10 years, that the Conservatives were in power, from 1979, North Yorkshire received not one single extra police officer, but crime in that period rose from 20,000 to 35,000 reported offences a year.

For the first seven of those 10 years, the council did not even put in a bid to the Home Office for more police to curb crime in the county. It was only when Labour county councillors organised a campaign that it did so. Now, after 14 years, the Conservative Government have provided the county with 50 extra officers, compared to the 155 in the five years of a Labour Government.

It is all very well Conservative Members decrying the efficiency of public sector provision, but what other branch of a public service would be expected to deal with a 2·5 times increase in work load with a 4 per cent. increase in officers available to deal with it? Not to devote resources to curbing crime is a false economy for local authorities, for the people—every one of those 50,000 crimes had a victim—and for businesses. It is in everybody's interest to put the resources into supporting the police in their efforts to tackle crime.

I have compared quality of service. I have compared the quality of nursery education, policing and the home help service provided by Labour and Conservative authorities. People say, "Yes, but there is a price to pay." We heard from the hon. Member for Scarborough about spendthrift Labour councils. We were told that they are always prepared to spend other people's money.

Let us look at the facts. According to the statistical section of the House of Commons Library, which provided some figures for me, the average council tax precept per shire county was as follows. Councils with no overall control had the highest average, with £394 per household; councils under Liberal control—I see that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has left the Chamber—had the second highest, with £378 per household; then came Conservative councils, at £372 per household; cheapest of the lot were Labour-controlled shire counties, at £366 per household.

In my local area and that of the hon. Member for Scarborough, Labour-controlled Cleveland's average council tax per household is £359, Labour-controlled Humberside's average is £366 and Tory North Yorkshire at £368 is the highest of the three. So the statement by the Prime Minister at the Conservative local government conference that Labour councils cost people £100 more is —I am not allowed to use the word in the House—a Scrooge-like economy with the truth. It simply is not so.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman has used an entirely specious argument. Is he not aware that, band for band, Conservative councils cost considerably less? My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister drew the right comparison —£100 less in the middle band compared with Labour councils. All that the hon. Gentleman is telling the House is that there are more low-band properities in some Labour areas. We give them much more grant to compensate for the fact that they have more low-band properties. Let him come clean with the House and tell the truth to the nation: Conservative councils always cost less, and band for band a lot less.

Mr. Bayley: Bluff and bluster will not do. What the Minister is saying——

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): Give us facts.

Mr. Bayley: Yes, I will give the facts. If we compare one group of council taxpayers in band D with another, the Minister's figures are right. But an independent group of advisers such as the House of Commons Library statistical section, which does not bear allegiance to the Minister's Department or his party, or to the Labour party, says that the Government's figures are fallacious and specious, because they simply look at band D.

The truth is that the cost per household is lower in Labour counties. That is what people have to pay and that is what matters to them. They are not interested in airy-fairy averages for one band. The Library has given the independent, unbiased figures, which show that overall Labour councils cost us less.

In my area, too, the Labour councils cost people less. The Minister's argument that Conservative-controlled authorities are in the south where house prices are high, and Labour-controlled authorities are in the north where house prices are low, does not hold water, because the three examples that I have used are all in the north.

The Minister's argument does not stand up. He can bluff and bluster as much as he likes, but it is not true that Conservative councils cost less. We should go to an independent source for the true figures, and that is what I have done. I have used not a Labour party source but an independent source.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is unfair to bring the House of Commons Library service into the argument? It has provided extremely good information in response to the questions asked by hon. Members. Of course, if he asks what are the averages, without taking into account different house values for different bands, he will get one answer. But it is an entirely misleading answer to the question, "Which council gives better value for money?" Band for band, the Conservative councils always set lower council taxes than Labour.

Mr. Bayley: All I can say is that the Minister is a better politician than a statistician. I am comparing across all the bands. The Minister is selecting certain groups of the population and comparing them. I am comparing across the board. The figure that matters is the figure that people pay, and that is the figure I am using.

The choice is not only between cheap and expensive services—although services cost less in Labour areas—but between better and worse services. As I have shown in my examples, people receive better services in Labour county councils such as Cleveland and Humberside. Those councils provide nursery education for a greater proportion of the population. Humberside provides a home help service free of charge for a greater proportion of the population.

How can the trick be achieved? Labour authorities provide better services at lower cost. The answer is obvious. Anyone who has been in business as I have—I set up and run my own business—knows the answer: it is achieved by being more efficient. The figures prove that Labour authorities are more efficient, because they provide better services at less cost.

Conservative Members talk about the need for a partnership between the private and public sectors, because they believe that private sector provision will always be more efficient. They should look to Labour authorities, some of which have resisted compulsory competitive tendering yet have produced better services at less cost than Conservative authorities that have fallen head over heels for CCT.

If Conservative Members are looking for efficiency, they should tell their colleagues in Conservative-led local authorities to look at the efficiency record of Labour-led local authorities, as well as looking at the private sector. Conservative councillors have a lot to learn from better-run Labour local authorities, and they should learn those lessons if they are serious about improving the services to people in their areas.

11.46 am

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I am grateful to the Government for giving me the opportunity to discuss services in local authorities. Perhaps I should say first that one of the greatest problems for Labour-controlled authorities is that they have a split view of what their role is in life. They seem to be confused about whether it is to provide services or jobs. Time and again, we hear the cry that they are defending the jobs of those who work in local authorities. Time and again, they are caught having to decide between providing services and supplying jobs.

Labour authorities have the confused idea that if they do not provide the jobs, no one else will provide them. That is a great fallacy, because the private sector will take on the jobs that are required to provide the services. Surely the most important factor is that it is the role of the local authority to provide good quality service at the cheapest price possible for those who live in the area.

The key is the amount of money that is spent or given by Government to local authorities. I was glad that my hon. Friend the Minister mentioned in his excellent opening speech that some £33,000 million is raised and given to local authorities. That is hardly what one would call a small amount. It is a substantial amount. It is high time that local authorities understood that they should spend the money carefully and provide a good service.

I am a great supporter of contracting out through compulsory competitive tendering, as all Conservative Members must be. It has forced authorities that, until we pushed the measure through, refused to entertain the thought that the private sector should have any involvement in providing services. As we heard earlier from my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), Mr. Jeremy Beecham has said that CCT has opened his eyes to the improvements in cost and quality of delivery.

That is important because it is the compulsory element which has changed matters dramatically for many people in the Labour party. It has made them realise that there are other ways to deliver services and that the private sector is capable of delivering them at least as well as local government, and in most cases much better.

The Local Government Act 1988, which extended competitive tendering to six areas—including refuse collection, street cleaning, buildings cleaning, ground maintenance and catering services—is to be greatly welcomed, not least because it has opened the eyes of many Labour-controlled councils to the idea that services can be contracted out.

I was intrigued by the results of the research on compulsory competitive tendering commissioned by the Department of the Environment from the Institute of Local Government Studies at Birmingham university. It showed some significant benefits. More than 20 per cent. of contracts have now been awarded to private companies; competition has led to the streamlining of the direct service organisations of local authorities, thereby cutting waste and bureaucracy; and there has been a manual staff reduction of between 17 and 20 per cent., achieved largely without compulsory redundancy. We should remember that initially the doom and gloom merchants in the Labour party were shouting about massive compulsory redundancies, but that has not happened. The research also showed annual average cash savings of more than 6 per cent. and an improvement in the quality of services.

[Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith]

I want to dwell for a moment on the record of my local authority, Labour-controlled Waltham Forest. It has fought the concept of competitive tendering tooth and nail. Because it has dragged its heels, it now needs to search for savings. It failed to find those savings by embracing the excellent concept of CCT initiated by the Conservative Government.

The council imposed a series of very high community charges, but its inefficiency in collecting them resulted in its having to impose additional surcharges year after year on my constituents in Chingford—yet they tend to be the sort of people who pay their community charge on time and in full. The council continually refuses to embrace competitive tendering to make the necessary savings, despite the fact that there have been some significant savings in other councils.

It is interesting to note that, although the allotments section of the council's recreation department has a budget of only approximately £50,000 a year, the overheads for running that section are some £26,000 a year. By anybody's standards, that is absurd. It is one area that just illustrates how the intelligent use of competitive tendering would help. It also highlights the nonsense of the policies followed by the Labour-controlled council.

By comparison, when that council was forced to contract out the Leyton leisure lagoon, great savings were made. Pressure had to be put on the council to do that because it had fought the idea tooth and nail. The savings meant that the subsidy per swimmer dropped from £6 to £3, and I hope that eventually it will disappear altogether. The council did not want to do that, but it was forced to do so under great pressure from local people and the local Conservative group, resulting in a saving of £156,000.

Mr. Harold Elletson (Blackpool, North): I am interested in my hon. Friend's remarks about his local council. My local council in Blackpool is also Labour controlled. In the old, happier days, it had a Conservative council, which proposed the introduction of CCT. I well remember the howls of anguish from the Labour party; it was as though the Conservative party had tried to introduce some new form of Armageddon. Of course, no one now talks about the standard of service being provided because there are excellent street cleaning and parks services, which are provided by private sector organisations. In the old days, when we suggested the introduction of street cleansing services, from the reaction of the Labour party one would have thought that we were trying to introduce ethnic cleansing.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend, who is right in what he says.

I have been trying to show that had my Labour-controlled council embraced CCT a little earlier and more vigorously, it would not now be in such financial difficulties. It would have already made the necessary savings while improving the quality of services, which in so many areas are well below standard.

I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister that the experience of Waltham Forest shows that centralised services such as the direct service organisation and direct labour organisation have not been restructured. We must do something to force local authorities to do that. It is all very well to make savings by contracting out building and highway works, catering and so on, but the central organisations remain staffed and manned very much in the same way and in the same numbers as before. All the other areas therefore have to bear the extra costs of still having a large group centrally administering something which, to a large degree, no longer really exists. We must find ways to force local authorities to change the structure across the board. If they will not do it through common sense, they must be driven to do so, or the council tax payers of Chingford will end up paying extra for services from which, quite frankly, no one reaps any benefit.

The old DLO in Waltham Forest did not send out its invoices for well over a year, or even longer, with the result that when it finally did so it was not paid because people said that they could not recall ever having had the service, leaving £3 million of unpaid invoices. The commercial acumen of some of those organisations is quite staggering. There is a whole mine of information like that sitting in Waltham Forest.

I am glad that the Government are considering extending CCT and have set out some of the key areas in their document "Competing for Quality". Private firms will have a fair chance to compete for local authority contracts. There will be a separation of client and contractor responsibility to ensure that those conducting the competitive process have no direct interest in the result. The timing of various stages within the tendering process has been laid down to ensure that outside contractors have sufficient time—that is important—to prepare bids. One of the ways in which local authorities have managed to get around CCT has been by giving contractors little time to put a sensible bid together.

Again looking back to the Waltham Forest experience, prior to the local mananagement of schools, the council was very quick to get out the four-year school cleansing contracts—but it did it for all 70 to 80 schools in the borough, so that any contractor that did not have the necessary capability at that stage found it impossible to bid for the contract at such short notice. I am glad that the Government intend to ensure that the contractors will have time to prepare their bids. To ensure a level playing field for those tendering, the items that a local authority can or cannot take into account in the tender valuation will be specified. I am glad that local authorities will have to publish rigorous internal accounting covering any white collar work that they undertake.

Local authority services have become a political football in the sense that Labour authorities fought the issue on the ground that only they should provide those services and jobs. They were becoming confused. More and more, local authorities are realising that by making savings and improving services, they are doing what they are meant to do—making sure that local residents do not pay more than they should for services that are dispensed in their name to those who need access to them.

Local authorities must provide local services as cost effectively as possible. That does not mean that they must provide jobs in the local area. Those will come as a result of the local authority being the best provider of the service or of its being decided that the private sector is the best source of the relevant service.

I fully welcome all that the Government are doing and only urge them strongly to ensure that local councils such as my own can be directed further and faster in the distribution to the private sector of essential services.

12.1 pm

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): My background is in local government, as a member of Ipswich council since 1973 until May last year. I was fortunate, or unfortunate, enough to become leader of that council at the same time that Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister, so I know that of which I speak.

Ipswich council has an interesting history. At the time of the last war, Ipswich county borough—known then, and even today by some older residents, as the corporation—ran all the services now run by Ipswich borough council Suffolk county council, and Anglian Water. It produced its own electricity and gas, looked after the town's poor and needy, and had an embryonic health service. Nationalisation and the establishment of the Department of Health and Social Security took some of those powers away, but from the 1940s until the early 1970s the corporation ran Ipswich.

It was a partnership in that business men served on the council, and the council worked with business men. The council drained marshy areas and then sold or let that land for business use. It was a fully functioning, local democracy—a partnership between all the people in the town and the corporation. It is totally beyond me why that arrangement had to be changed in the early 1970s. It was only after the so-called reforms of 1974 created so much duplication between Anglian Water, Ipswich borough council and Suffolk county council that concern was expressed about the cost of local government. Right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House will acknowledge that it is true of their own areas.

Since those so-called reforms, there has been pressure on local government finance from central Government of all political colours. The situation became much worse in 1979, when Mrs. Thatcher became Prime Minister. That was partly to do with the fact that her dear dad, Alderman Roberts, was kicked off Grantham council, and she never forgave local government.

A war was waged by central Government against local government during the whole of the 1980s. I take heart from one or two comments by Government spokesmen recently to the effect that that war may be coming to an end.

One tactic was to use the word "partnership" instead of "privatisation", which is what is really meant in many cases. The Government say that they believe in partnership between local authorities and the private sector and between central and local government. I will cite one or two examples of the Government's assertions not being reflected by their actions

I refer first to compulsory—not compulsive—competitive tendering. Ipswich objected to being compelled to adopt that policy, but it was the law so Ipswich complied and got on with it. Ipswich won its own building works and street cleansing contracts—it collects its own bins. It maintains all the services provided by its own direct labour organisation.

In addition, the authority has tendered outside Ipswich and maintains Liberal-controlled Colchester's housing stock. It also landscapes parks and gardens in other areas that have Conservative-controlled councils. Competitive tendering has been a success for Ipswich council, for the moment—but if one delves deeper, one sees that it will not be that way for ever, because the Government have not established a level playing field for compulsory competitive tendering.

Direct labour organisations must make a 5 per cent. return on capital, but the private sector does not—and it does not attempt to do so in hard times. The council must make a profit every year, or it would be in danger of being closed down. That is not true of the private sector. Successful councils such as Ipswich have been threatened by the Audit Commission for competing outside their boundaries. It is said that, in effect, a council DLO can compete only for its own work in its own geographical area—and that if it loses a contract once, it will lose it for ever and the service in question will be closed down. No one can argue that that it is a fair way of asking council workers to compete against private sector workers.

As I said, for the moment Ipswich council is winning those battles, but the first battle that it loses will mean that a whole raft of jobs will be lost and the service will be transferred for ever from the public to the private sector. That is the Government's real agenda.

Ipswich council, as with councils of all political colours, has always attempted to work with the town's private sector, but has consistently found itself blocked in those efforts by Government regulations—though, to be fair, I suspect that many of them are Treasury driven. One example is Wherstead road in Ipswich, which became congested. There was a factory nearby surrounded by a large area of land which the factory did not need.

About six years ago, that factory had financial problems, so the council bought the land, which amounted to five and a half acres. Together with Conservative-controlled Suffolk county council, Ipswich council reached an agreement whereby, instead of knocking down half of Wherstead road, a new road would be taken through that open land. Agreement was then reached to have ownership of the land transferred to Wimpey, which would build a number of homes for sale, a number for transfer to housing associations to rent and a number to Ipswich council to include in a sheltered scheme.

That was a perfect example of co-operation between two authorities—one Labour and one Conservative, a housing association, and a private sector builder. The project was blocked by the Department of the Environment on the ground that it was a barter deal. Five years later, we still do not have all the homes that could have been built under that scheme. That is not an example of the Government helping, being a partner with local government, or aiding local government to work in partnership with the private sector.

I cite a more recent example. Ipswich council has a terrible homelessness problem. In line with Government thinking, the council decided to lease homes from private individuals to let, rather than put the homeless into bed-and-breakfast accommodation. It leased 100 homes for that purpose. There are a number of other homes that it wants but cannot lease because the owners want to lease them for much longer than three years. Why cannot Ipswich council lease them for more than three years? Because it runs counter to the Government's capital expenditure controls. The scheme, which would help the private sector, the council and the homeless, is blocked by the Government.

[Mr. Jamie Cann]

Ipswich council has a 10 per cent. stake in the Building Preservation Trust—not a big organisation which involves a group of people and the council. Every year it buys an old property of value to the town, does it up and resells it. The proceeds are then used to buy the next property—often with a profit. As that scheme involves the council, even though it is a minor party, it comes under Government capital expenditure controls, which makes it difficult for the trust to operate. All those factors show that the Government want to stop councils doing things, not encourage them to do things with the private sector.

Some 20 years ago, when I first became involved in local government, people who could not afford houses went on a council house waiting list and within a year or so they obtained one. Such houses were reasonably cheap, well maintained by the local authority and popular with the people. However, that is now a forgotten dream in Ipswich as the council has not been allowed to build homes for goodness knows how long.

We were told that the private sector would take up the slack, It did: it built many four-bedroom, two-bathroom, double-garage homes that people could not afford to buy or rent. It did not produce low-cost rental properties. The Government's housing programme is a total failure. At least they decided to transfer some resources from the councils to housing associations so that they could become the prime producer of low-cost rented homes, but that has not happened.

The homes are becoming more and more expensive, the Government grants are being reduced every year and housing association rents are starting to move out of the low-cost band. In Ipswich we are having great difficulty in allocating housing association properties. People would rather wait for council houses. The failure of the Government's housing programme has prevented us from working with the private sector to produce low-cost homes and is making the position for the housing associations even worse. It seems to many of us that when the Government talk about housing provision they believe that it is all right for the housing associations, private individuals and building firms to produce homes for sale, but never, in any circumstances, for the council to build homes for rent. Why not? We need homes and they are not being produced by anyone else.

The Government's care in the community policy has not yet come about. The Minister made great play of the fact that the Government have handed responsibility for care in the community to councils, as though that were an act of faith. In fact, they have handed care in the community to councils, but not allocated them sufficient money to do the job properly. I prophesy that in the next year our surgeries will be full of people whose needs have not been properly assessed because the council cannot afford to provide for them or whose needs simply will not be met. That will be the result of the budgetary shortfall of care in the community, which will affect hon. Members from both sides of the House. That is another example of the Government's talk about partnership proving to be nonsense.

I do not believe what the Government say about partnership. What happened in the 1980s and is still happening today is that Whitehall, quangos and the market are slowly but surely taking power away from elected local authorities. It is time to stop that.

12.15 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): Few things better illustrate the Conservatives' mastery of both the political and intellectual arguments of the 1980s than privatisation. In practical and philosophical terms, that policy has become irreversible. Once discussed only at the edges of political life, it is now firmly on centre stage. Privatisation and competitive tendering in local government form a vital part of it.

In the 1970s, there appeared to be certain unquestioned assumptions about the running of public services. It was generally believed that direct provision was the only effective way of operating, and that belief went more or less unchallenged. There was a resistance to change at both local and national level. Therefore, it might appear somewhat ironic—but when set against the lessons of history, it will be shown not to be so—that the Conservative party produced the radical changes of the past 10 to 15 years, spurred on by new thinkers such as my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities and Chris Chope, who regrettably is, temporarily, no longer a Member of Parliament.

In the meantime, the Labour party seems to have become frozen in the past—and not only in this sector of policy. It seems to be more afraid of vested interests and change itself, and has an antipathy to the private sector. Of those three reasons why, I suspect, the Labour party generally oppose the introduction of competitive tendering and private contracting in local government, the worst is the last—antipathy to the private sector. It is based purely on an ideological presumption that stems from years ago. However, it is belied by the facts revealed by any rational assessment of economic progress in the past 50 years.

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): The hon. Gentleman will be aware of Lewisham council's attempts to regenerate, improve, invigorate and sustain the future of Beckenham Place park, which adjoins his constituency and mine. It is a major scheme, not without flaws, largely based on a partnership between a private company—the David Lloyd clubs—and the council, which will benefit the facilities for the people in that part of the world.

It cannot be denied that the scheme needs much thought, but why have Lewisham council's attempts to promote the scheme been faced with unremitting hostility from Tory-controlled Bromley council? Will the hon. Gentleman condemn Bromley council for its blindness and antipathy towards the involvement of the private sector, and do what he can to ensure that residents' interests are protected and that extremely imaginative, innovative and beneficial scheme for the part of south London that we both represent goes ahead?

Mr. Merchant: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about Beckenham Place park, about which I was talking to representatives of Lewisham borough only yesterday. The management of the park has been put out to a private operator, which I wholeheartedly welcome. It shows that some local Labour authorities accept the advantages of private contracting. I only wish that that lesson was followed by many other local authorities.

The specific and separate issue of the development of Beckenham Place park involves a plan to change the park's nature and has nothing to do with the privatisation of services. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the opposition came specifically from local residents. It is not a matter of Bromley borough authority deciding to oppose a plan proposed by Lewisham borough. Bromley borough did so as a result of the major pressure that was brought to bear on it by local people.

If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the views of local people should not be fully taken into account and weighed in the balance, he is making a major error of judgment about planning policy. He will also know that the planning application has been called in by the Department. However, I am in danger of straying from the point and I shall return to my speech.

The Labour party's approach to competitive tendering and privatisation in local government is basically one of turning in the opposite direction, because it is locked in the past. Therefore, it has devolved upon Conservative-controlled local authorities to make all the running in this area, even though there has been some resistance to it, even in some Conservative-controlled authorities. That is understandable, for we are talking about innovative policies.

What has changed principally, though, during the past 10 to 15 years in this area? It can be typified in three phases. The first phase has been the voluntary pursuit of the various privatisation options by those particularly go-ahead local authorities which set the pace. The success in those areas led to phase 2: the compulsory application of compulsory competitive tendering, which has been necessary to overcome some of the ill-judged resistance. The third phase is that into which we are now moving—the much more wholehearted pursuit of the concept of the enabling authority, to which I shall return.

Apart from some specific earlier examples, the first major stride in this direction came in the Local Government Act 1980, which required compulsory competitive tendering to be introduced for new construction, building, maintenance and highways. Then, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) eloquently pointed out, the Local Government Act 1988 extended competition in local government services into six other major areas. What is the advantage of all that? People might say that that is purely ideologically driven. The answer to that question comes in the savings that have inevitably and indisputably flowed from these policies.

A recent Audit Commission report, "Realising the Benefits of Competition", showed that services such as refuse collection had produced savings of 12·4 per cent., and that building cleaning had produced savings of 20·6 per cent. These are not marginal savings: they are dramatic and major savings in areas of high public expenditure.

In the report "Competitive Tendering for Local Authority Services—Initial Experiences" a Labour-controlled local authority chief executive is quoted as saying:

"There is an awful lot that comes from CCT. There is much greater knowledge of particular service areas. It exposes an awful lot of inefficiencies formerly taken for granted. We are a more efficient, slimmer organisation. It has had real and definite benefits and not just in defined services."

As for the oft-quoted Jeremy Beecham, I know him well, so I can attach credibility to the quotation in the Municipal Journal, where he said:

"Compulsory competitive tendering has brought some cost effectiveness and genuine savings which might not otherwise have been achieved."

Knowing the difficulties that Jeremy Beecham has had over the years, struggling with the mammoth machinery of Newcastle city council, I am not at all surprised to see that he has been forced to admit that, by introducing compulsory competitive tendering, he can make considerable savings.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that the essence of that quotation is that it is the compulsory element which has forced Jeremy Beecham, and others like him, to go down that road and thus learn—not because of their desire to do so but because they have been forced to—that the reality is that there is a new world out there from which they can reap the benefit?

Mr. Merchant: Absolutely. There are some intelligent and enlightened leaders of Labour authorities who wish to go much further down this path, because they see the practical benefits that can flow to their authorities and to the citizens of their areas but who are prevented from doing so either by their groups, which fear that they cannot move in a new direction, or, unfortunately, by the local authority trade unions, which stick their feet in and can exercise far too great power within the local Labour party machine and therefore stop these reforms and changes taking place.

That was a specific problem in Newcastle, which Jeremy Beecham and his colleagues in the leadership of the council had to face. Although they might not be prepared to admit it publicly, I am sure that some of these Labour leaders privately very much welcome the compulsion that came with the Act, which has forced them to go down a road that they wanted to go down and therefore enabled them to defy the forces that tried to prevent them.

The local authority in the area that I represent, Bromley—the Minister has already been generous enough to refer to Bromley's leading role—has cast itself in the role of an enabling authority, with great success. I pay particular tribute to the excellent leader of the authority, Dennis Barkway, and his team of councillors and officers who have assiduously pursued this option with great success. They have pushed forward the boundaries in a quiet but effective way. They have not sought glory for themselves but have attempted to improve the quality and efficiency of public services for the citizens of Bromley.

The House may be interested in the list of public services that Bromley has been able to put out to the private sector. They are building maintenance, street cleaning, vehicle maintenance, refuse collection, ground maintenance, building cleaning, civic centre catering, public toilet cleaning, school meals, leisure centre management, highways maintenance, waste disposal, street lighting, social services homes, pest control.

Mr. Dowd: On the question of social services homes, will the hon. Gentleman be so kind as to tell the House how the fraud squad investigation is going into the conduct of the chair of social services in Bromley over the relationship between him and the American company that was hoping to take over those homes?

[Mr. Dowd]

Mr. Merchant: The hon. Gentleman will know that that matter is at present sub judice. If, however, he wishes me to go into local government corruption, he might do well to investigate the corruption that was spawned by the incestuous centralisation of power in those Labour-controlled local authorities that have been under Labour control for many years.

As someone who worked for many years as a journalist in the north-east of England, I know very well the history of local government corruption in the north-east. If the hon. Gentleman wanted to do so, we could debate it for hours on end. I am sure, however, that he would find that it was not in either his or his party's interests to do so.

Let me continue with my list. I was about to reach the more interesting services that Bromley has put out to private sector. I refer to the professional services that the Government are encouraging local authorities to look at, and which can, with a little more difficulty—because of the nature of the quality definitions that need to be laid down more thoroughly—be done successfully.

Bromley has proved this—I believe very effectively. I refer to the architects department, engineering services, computers, part of the youth service, printing and stationery, and at present—one of the most dramatic—the privatisation of the exchequer services, including the collection of council tax and payroll services, which will produce a cost saving of 25 per cent.

In addition, two other major areas of local government responsibility that have now passed, at the council's wish, out of the council's direct hands, are housing, now taken over by a housing association, Broomleigh, and many of the schools that have opted to go grant maintained. Bromley may shortly reach a threshold where the majority of—indeed, all—the secondary schools will move out of the local authority's direct control. That will achieve the objective of moving all those services into a more effective private sector. Some people might think that that is an exhaustive list, but Bromley council is still trying to find other services that can be contracted out and is examining a short list at the moment.

What about the savings? I am told that the authority has calculated that it is producing savings of almost £13 million a year. Those are not one-off savings, but savings which will recur year after year, of which about £6 million is direct saving from the contracting out of services and a further £7 million of interest which has accrued as a result principally of the sale of housing stock to a housing association. On each of those services, those are average savings of between 15 and 20 per cent.—considerable savings in cash and percentage terms, which go to the benefit of the people who live in the area.

What comes next? There is a need to continue to press for greater savings, efficiency and improved quality. Of course, there is still resistance from many local authorities —few have such a go-ahead approach as Bromley. That resistance was one of the principal reasons for the White Paper "Competing for Quality", to which my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford referred and which will continue to make inroads into the options that are available for further contracting out and competitive tendering. My hon. Friend said that there were problems in some areas as some local authorities have found ways of cheating on competitive tendering, so we must ensure a level playing field for the necessary disciplines.

The White Paper specifically stresses the need to look at the wide range of professional and technical services. I believe that the Government are aiming at figures of about 90 per cent. of construction-related services, 15 per cent. of corporate and administrative services, 33 per cent. of legal services, 25 per cent. of financial and personnel services, and about 80 per cent. of computing services being available for competitive tendering. Those all seem to be admirable objectives. They are areas which were not perhaps questioned before, but, as Bromley has shown, they are not only effective but can lead to great savings for local council tax payers.

I have talked about what has happened, what is happening and what should happen, but why is it necessary? The alternative argument—that local authorities should run services directly themselves through their own departments—might at first sound quite persuasive. It is argued, first, that that is in the public good, because local authorities operate in the public good; secondly, that there is no element of profit or possibly exploitation; and, thirdly, that it enables easy long-term plananing with no uncertainty about who will provide the service and how, that it can be centrally organised and, therefore, that all the economies of scale flow from that.

Those arguments look fine on paper and no doubt appeal to tidy bureaucratic minds who see the world in terms of intricate planning. Like the Soviet central planning system, which operated in a macro-economic sense, local government planning in such an intricate form is also doomed to failure. It is no coincidence that Soviet central planning failed so spectacularly because the structure of any rigid arrangement bears within it the seeds of its own destruction. That is true of local government set-ups in Liverpool, Lewisham, Newcastle or anywhere else.

My experience in Newcastle convinced me that the overriding objective of a huge local government machine that runs a big city council becomes running the machine; the machine runs for its own benefit, not for anyone else's. The reality is that, without the pressure of a commercial ethos, competition and some division between purchasers and providers, there is no incentive to stay trim and efficient and to provide quality. Inefficiency, overmanning, poor quality and bad practices creep in. The machine ends up operating as a suppliers' monopoly dream, veering increasingly towards operating only in the interests of the machine and its staff, rather than the people for whom it should operate—the forgotten consumers and citizens of the area.

I do not want to be misinterpreted and I am not casting aspersions on individual local government officers. Perhaps not all my colleagues will agree with me, but, in my experience over the years in dealing with local government officers, I have usually found them dedicated, helpful and very efficient. The problem lies with the machine as a whole. The size and nature of the machine mean that it is not designed to ensure maximum efficiency, because there is no competitive element, no testing, no pressure and no commercial application. That is why the system has failed and is unable to provide what the public require at the cost they are prepared to pay.

Therefore, I believe that it is in the interests of local government itself, of its officers and, above all, of the ordinary citizen to press ahead with contracting out and enabling authorities, not only as best practice but as universal practice.

12.35 pm

Mr. Colin Pickthall (Lancashire, West): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) left the Chamber immediately after his intervention on the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith). The hon. Gentleman waxed lyrical about the qualities of the late and unlamented Conservative council in Blackpool, which was in fact notorious for its financial inefficiency and horrible planning mistakes. He should consider why, at the previous local elections in Blackpool, there was the biggest swing to Labour in the entire county. There can be only two answers and perhaps both are right. The first is that the hon. Gentleman's assessment of what people thought about the services that they were not getting from the Conservatives was entirely different from that of the electorate. The second is that the electorate in Blackpool were voting against the service that they had been getting from the Government in the previous few years. I think that both answers were true in that instance.

I begin by picking up a couple of things that the Minister said. He made a side swipe at Lancashire, as Ministers generally do whenever they get the opportunity—perhaps not so frequently as against Derbyshire, but we are still high on the list. He said that Lancashire was one of the main culprits in setting a high council tax, but I agree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) in this connection. If we take the average precept—what people will have to pay—Lancashire comes 10th in the league of 30 or so counties. People there will pay £393·37. Of the nine counties that are charging more than that, four are Conservative controlled: in Buckinghamshire people will pay £416, in Hertfordshire £419, in Somerset £450 and in Surrey £444. Incidentally, Derbyshire is lower down the list.

The Minister also poked fun at leaders of local authorities, specifically Labour leaders, who come to London to lobby Ministers for more money. It seems an obvious thing to do if one believes that one is not getting enough money. I have been involved at least twice in lobbying directly on behalf of my authority.

Mr. Bayley: It is indeed a sensible thing to do. In my part of the country, on the other side of the Penines, Labour-controlled Humberside county council lobbied for more money and got a better settlement as a result. Conservative-controlled North Yorkshire county council did not make representations to the Department of the Environment because it did not want to rock the boat in its own party and therefore did not receive a better settlement. As a consequence, the average precept in Humberside is lower than it is in Conservative-controlled North Yorkshire.

Mr. Pickthall: That is a very instructive parable. I have been trying to point out not only the common sense of doing what my hon. Friend the Member for York describes, but the fact that Lancashire, with many other authorities, was down here to talk not about more money as a slice of the national economy, but about the way in which the settlement was calculated and the way in which it was distributed. We were arguing about the area cost adjustment, which we believe works to the disbenefit of Lancashire. We were arguing about the money that had been taken out——

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman should remember that what I said was that every year Labour leaders say that they have been given additional statutory functions by the House and by the Government. I was replying to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), who claimed that councils were always losing functions. I said that Labour leaders pointed out, often correctly, that they had increased functions from Government. I was not ridiculing them or saying that they should not make that point. On the council tax, Lancashire's band C charge is £472. The shire average is £406 and Hampshire's is £328. That shows that Lancashire is a high-taxing authority.

Mr. Pickthall: The figures that I gave were for the average precept. I understand that one can pick a band or a different way in which to calculate and come up with different league tables. The figures that I used were from the Public Finance and Accountancy journal of 12 March 1993 and were based on Department of the Environment data. My point was that the deputations in which we were involved were concerned about the distribution and about what we believed to be a corruption in the way in which the global sum of revenue support grant was distributed—a corruption embodied in the structure of the standard spending assessments, to which I shall refer later.

Two or three weeks ago, the Audit Commission produced a draft report, which does not seem to have made much of a stir, although it should have done. The draft report says that the Government have taken such severe and detailed control of local government spending powers that local government powers are now "largely cosmetic". Coming from one of the Government's most powerful watchdogs, which was spoken of approvingly by the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant), that is a most salutary judgment and one which should make us shudder a little.

That judgment raises two important questions for me, for most of my hon. Friends and for those with a background in local government. First, why on earth does anyone remain a local councillor? Whether councillors are Labour, Tory, Liberal Democrat, nationalist or whatever, day by day and week by week they have to do the Government's dirty work. They are unpaid and take the flak for Government cuts. They preside over decisions that they cannot avoid because they have already been settled by the way in which the SSAs are distributed and they damage the interests of the people whom those councillors seek to defend and represent. It is hard to escape the conclusion that many councillors are motivated largely by a passionate desire to mitigate the Government's vindictiveness against the people among whom they live.

Secondly, and more importantly, there has been a fundamental shift of power since 1979 which was detailed graphically by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann). There has been a switch in power away from local democracy and towards central Government, and away from local democracy towards Government-appointed individuals and Government-appointed quangos responsible to no electorate. I recently saw an estimate of around 42,000 for the number of people that the Government have placed in quango positions of one kind or another. I do not know whether that is an accurate figure, but it would not surprise me if it were.

[Mr. Pickthall]

We must not underestimate the depth and significance of the process. I am not convinced—and I do not think that any of my hon. Friends are convinced—by the kinder words that the Government have spoken about local government recently. The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities is an embodiment of the old adage, "Speak softly and carry a big stick". I am convinced that the historic system of balance and shared power between central Government and local government is being destroyed. Personally, I have no problems with the notion of dismantling venerable structures that have outlived their purpose and replacing them with better structures which serve people more efficiently and democratically, but we must consider what is being put in the place of our local government structure—and the answer is increasing centralisation.

The hon. Member for Beckenham referred with understandable distaste to incestuous over-centralisation, but that is what is going on around us now. The hon. Gentleman spoke vigorously about the size of the local government machine and said that it was the machine that was out of control and not the individuals in it. Europe apart, what bigger machine is there than national Government? It is an enormous machine which cannot be stopped or altered, save by a general election. The test of the increasing centralisation that is taking place around us must be what Ministers and Conservative Members generally would be saying if a Labour Government were doing the same thing to local government. They would be howling blue murder and talking about the Soviet Union, the former East Germany and all the rest. It would be interesting to hear any one of them honestly comment on what is happening.

I read a report in this morning's paper about the Government's plan for the teaching of English—just one aspect of life which is being taken away from the control of local government and local people—which said that the Government propose to extend their power over how English is spoken in schools and to make children study a compulsory list of great authors. I do not have much problem with the latter proposal, but in relation to the first, the article says:

> "Understanding of regional dialects was not an essential part of English lessons, David Pascall, the head of the National Curriculum Council, said."

The fact that the Government are now trying to centralise control over the way in which we speak says volumes about their general philosophy in running the country. Almost all Opposition Members present have strong characteristic regional accents while virtually no Conservative Member present has. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), the Whip, is an honourable and welcome exception. The Conservatives talk alike and think alike and believe that the rest of us should be brought into line. Their attitude to local government is exactly the same.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) made a number of points about the whole business of the creation of quangos and the removal of elected members from one organisation after another and I shall try not to repeat them.

The subject of the debate—partnership between the public and private sectors in delivering local government services—sounds fine. No one could quarrel with the Minister's list of major projects between the private and public sectors. I am sure that they are all fine projects and that they are welcome. Partnership is a good and splendid word. However, in many quarters we are actually experiencing a series of forced separations and not partnership. Whatever one's view of the principle of compulsory competitive tendering, CCT would not be complusory in a partnership. It would not be controlled by centrally imposed rules and regulations which weight the whole game against local authorities. I am desperately trying to avoid using the phrase "level playing field" because it is a particularly appalling cliché.

Local authorities should certainly be allowed and encouraged to seek competitive tendering in their own ways. They should be able to search for the best combination in their own local authorities. A great deal will depend on the character of the local area, what is happening to the economy and whether the area is industrial or rural. In a partnership, local authority service units should be able to compete on equal terms with private sector groups for both public and private services. In many cases, I believe that they would win. On the other hand, in many cases of competitive tendering we have seen jobs, working conditions and the lives of the people working in those services destroyed in order to anticipate and undercut loss-leading bids from the private sector.

I am sure that I am not the only hon. Member who has met school cleaners and school caterers who have worked in schools for many years but who have suddenly had to give up their jobs because their hours have been cut and they can no longer afford to work. In some cases, wages have been cut. That has occurred in the hospital service. I have met school cleaners who were in tears because they felt that they were part of the schools in which they had worked. In some cases, they had worked in the schools for 20 years. They did much more than what they were paid for, but that service was wiped out by the system.

According to the line taken by the Association of County Councils, where a choice is to be made between public and private provision, there should be a context which gives no financial advantage either way. Government systems are set up in such a way as to make it impossible for the public sector to compete. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich dealt with that point. That process is a matter of dogma and it has nothing to do with the efficiency of delivering services.

The Government's campaign to emasculate local authorities has been extraordinarily consistent across a wide range of service provision. In fact, one must almost admire that consistency. For example, in education the opting-out system has seen the Government consistently changing the rules to weight the scales against the "no" votes even though—or perhaps because—the response has in most cases confirmed public confidence in the local education authorities. That is certainly the case in Lancashire, where the majority of the ballots have been against opt-outs. As we all know—is repeated on many occasions—most opt-outs occur in Conservative local authorities.

Public sector higher education was removed from local authority control in 1989 and the colleges were confiscated and given to gangs of business men—some of them, no doubt, very successfully, but the idea behind the move is the important point: the new governing bodies are hand picked by Tory Ministers and they have the power to re-elect themselves almost in perpetuity.

Now further education colleges and sixth form colleges have been removed and placed under the same kind of control. Governors are appointed in a similar way. For example, a sixth form college in Lancashire used to have among its governors two Labour and two Conservative representatives of the local education authority. That representation was a fair reflection of the situation in the authority. The two Labour governors were dismissed while the two Conservative governors were placed on the new governing body, to be joined by the local Conservative Member, the wife of the Conservative Member next door and the wife of the Conservative Member of the European Parliament. That is a small example of what is happening all over the place, and the appointments are made centrally. In both higher and further education, the funding mechanism has been placed in the hands of quangos which are not elected and do not even contain elected members. Those quangos specifically exclude LEAs.

We hear that the careers service is to be hived off from local democratic control and given to quangos. I cannot speak for careers services across the country, but in Lancashire the service is particularly successful and well regarded. Local authorities no longer have the right to appoint representatives to local health authorities. Again, we have been reduced to quangos which are appointed and paid by the Government whereas before the much abused and reviled councillors of all kinds did that job without payment.

For some time, local authorities have not had the right to appoint people to water authorities and water committees. Police authorities are to have their local authority representation cut. I was in a group of Conservative and Labour Members who met representatives of the Lancashire police committee a fortnight ago. The Conservatives, magistrates representatives, Labour representatives and the chief constable all said, "Don't do this: it is anti-democratic and six councillors cannot possibly represent an authority the size of Lancashire." Interestingly, the fiercest critic was the chief constable.

An environmental pollution agency is shortly to be established. It will remove responsibility for waste disposal from local authorities. Non-domestic rates are being removed from local control. Regional tribunals—quangos—have been set up to deal with special needs appeals. I have no problem about regional tribunals, but I have a tremendous problem about tribunals that are not democratically responsible to anyone being able to impose on local authorities vast charges for special needs which the authorities may not be able to meet because they have not had the central Government money to do so.

Above all, the use and abuse of SSAs and capping has put local authorities to the sword. The cynical manipulation of the area cost adjustment has redirected billions of pounds to Tory authorities in the south-east and away from the provinces, if I may call them that. In Lancashire alone, that amounts to a Government fine of £100 on every council tax bill and it will not be much different in other northern and western counties. That range of powers destroys the democratic functioning of local government—Conservative as well as Labour. The Government are about the destruction of democratic local government and we must ask once again what their response would be if a Labour Government were the perpetrators.

The Government have become accustomed to latching on to a few local authorities that, over the years, have reacted to Government hostility. No doubt in some cases they have over-compensated with a ferocity equal to that of the Government. The Government have tried to smear all local government, no matter what the political control, and their agenda has been clear; people are told that if they vote Labour their local authority will be cut and, if possible, ruined. If electors insist on voting Labour, as they sometimes stubbornly do, the Government will destroy that Labour council. That was the campaign waged against the metropolitan authorities and it is now the function of the Local Government Commission for England to destroy many Labour shire counties.

The Government cannot cope with the reality that what might seem from London to be leafy and suburban shires elect Labour-controlled or Liberal authorities with no overall control. They will do almost anything to stifle those authorities. They have failed to realise that many of those shires, such as Cumbria, Northumberland, Lancashire, Cheshire and Derbyshire, have been fearfully damaged by Thatcherism in the past 14 years and are unlikely ever to be predominantly Tory again. Their heavy industry has been removed, their manufacturing has been decimated, the public transport infrastructure has been wrecked and when rail is privatised there will be even further damage. Now even rural and agricultural communities are being thrown into disarray and even penury.

Increasingly, shire counties, like other local authorities, have had to step in to generate economic activity to shore up the crumbling elements of the private sector, to bolster training, to help the unemployed. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) got quite worked up about the virtues of the market, which he described as the best system ever devised for delivering goods and services. I will not go into that argument with him, but he should recognise that the market is also a brutal system from which people at the bottom end of it suffer. Occasionally, and often when there is a recession, people have to be rescued from the market.

I am extremely proud to be a Lancashire county councillor, although I shall no longer be one after a couple of weeks, and to have been part of a successful and popular authority. In the Thatcher years, Lancashire trebled nursery places, despite a funding system which militates against it. All children are admitted to school at the start of the year in which they will be five. It has the best governor information service and governor support service for schools in the United Kingdom. Until Government cuts last year, it had by far the highest level of discretionary awards for students. It is the fifth lowest spender on education administration—less than 3 per cent. of its total budget. It has made a 50 per cent. increase in youth provision and has an unrivalled system of welfare rights and public information networks in every town and almost every community in Lancashire. All the key advances in public transport, such as they have been, have been to the credit of the local authority. In particular, I wish to mention Lancashire's green audit, which reached the final of the United Nation's conference in Rio and is nationally recognised as a major venture in environmental protection.

[Mr. Pickthall]

Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. is closely associated with the county council and has secured more than 20,000 jobs in the past 10 years. It has a huge programme of work with public and private sectors alike. It is involved in Europe, in training and in developing industrial premises. When the Government dumped Leyland DAF and said, "No intervention", Lancashire county council and Lancashire Enterprises got stuck in and promoted a management buy-out. Lancashire Enterprises will, we hope, be taking over much of the land—there are about 200 acres—to develop it as an industrial park. That has all been achieved despite the desperate financial situation in which Lancashire, along with all other authorities, has been put in recent years.

When I am out on doorsteps canvassing for the county elections, as I shall be doing again tomorrow, I shall be trying to persuade the electors to vote Labour and keep Lancashire Labour, but I will also be doing something that I hope Tory supporters will be doing: I will be trying to persuade people to vote for democracy, to say that the Government are instituting a Whitehall Conservative central office tyranny and that we, the electorate, will not put up with it.

1.3 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): One would sometimes think that those who reported on political matters outside this place discovered my constituency only after the events of 9 April last year. They got the events of last year wrong, and I regret the way that they have concentrated on reporting, still inaccurately, the events in my constituency since then.

Many of the reports come from quarters that I hold in great esteem. Only recently an article appeared in a Sunday newspaper all about my constituency. It seems to be the vogue to say that 10,000 people are out of work in Basildon. There have never been 10,000 people unemployed in my constituency. The figure is 6,500. That is far too many, but I am delighted to say that we had the largest drop in unemployment in the south-east last month. I hope that, with a sensible partnership between the private and public sectors in local government, that trend will continue.

The article allowed a socialist to comment on my election last year and my political future. In the middle of the article was a picture purporting to be the Conservative Member of Parliament for Basildon. I looked closely at the picture and found that it certainly did not resemble myself. It turned out to be the Liberal parliamentary candidate. So the scandal goes on. I hope that the television companies will allow me to have a half-hour slot in which I can broadcast to the nation about all the good things that have happened in Basildon since the general election and the local elections last year.

Until 11 May last year, I had to come to the House each year to talk about the capping measures and to criticise the awful, rotten socialist council that we had to put up with in Basildon. That socialist council was a disgrace and the Labour Front-Bench team knew it. Labour spokesmen and women, by sleight of hand, tried to distance themselves from that council.

Mr. Tony Banks: No.

Mr. Amess: The only thing that the socialists knew how to do in Basildon was to spend money. They cruelly deceived people into believing that they could provide services at no cost whatever to the local taxpayer.

Mr. Banks: No.

Mr. Amess: I shall deal with Newham in a moment, if the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will contain himself.

It has been left to the Conservative council elected on 11 May last year to cope with the legacy of the socialist council. In that election, 15 Conservatives stood and 15 were elected. Every socialist was defeated because the residents of the district wanted a change. Why did they want a change? It was because the local socialists were hostile to private sector involvement in local government.

To the socialists in Basildon, the very word "profit" was a dirty word. One could not possibly make a profit. Everything had to be done by collecting local and national taxes. That is why we had the highest community charge in the country. Our standard spending assessment was 198 per cent. above the rest of the country. For those reasons, every year I had to come to the House during the one-and-a-half or three-hour debate to speak about the capping orders until the events of 11 May last year when local residents voted for a change.

The legacy that has been handed to the Conservatives is a local and national scandal. A large sum of money was borrowed. Now local residents are having to pay back that money at ridiculous charges, presumably because incompetent advice was given to councillors by certain individuals.

The socialists talked only about Basildon. The council that I represent is shared with my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). It was not only Basildon council: it covered Billericay, Wickford and Basildon. But the socialists' mentality disfranchised everyone in my hon. Friend's constituency because those people had money. So the socialists talked only about Basildon. Even the council logo, such as it was, never mentioned Billericay and Wickford. That is why I am delighted to tell the House that the nuclear-free zone signs in Basildon have been taken down. Of course, my defeated Labour opponent is such a bad loser that he has spent the past year trying to take out a prosecution—

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Can my hon. Friend assure the House that his constituents do not feel any less safe for not having those signs?

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend knows only too well that, when the signs were erected, it was said that the Labour leader of the council telephoned Mikhail Gorbachev and asked, "In the event of a nuclear conflict, can you ensure that the raid avoids Basildon?" It is ridiculous. It is insulting that one of the signs was placed outside GEC Avionics, which employs 2,800 men and women who are trying to defend our country.

My bitter, defeated Labour opponent has wasted local and national taxpayers' money trying to take out a prosecution against me and Conservative councillors because we had the cheek to take down the signs. He tried to persuade the local police that we had stolen them. I do not know where we were supposed to have hidden them, but he went to the police and accused us of theft. The police asked the council whether the signs had been stolen, and the council said that they had not. Yet my opponent insisted that the matter be referred to the Crown prosecution service. That has cost a huge amount of money and wasted the time of both the police and the CPS.

Never let me again hear a socialist in Basildon talking about law and order and about having more police on the streets. My bitter, defeated Labour opponent wasted time and money in the most extraordinary way.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): Does the hon. Gentleman recall that the former Greater London council declared London a nuclear-free zone, and that three months later the Gallup poll in The Daily Telegraph showed that 54 per cent. of Conservative voters in London thought it a good idea? Does he think that they were secret lefties, or were they people whom he would not want in the Tory party?

Mr. Amess: I assume that that must have been the same Gallup poll that last year predicted that I would lose my seat and that the socialists would form the next Government. At that time, I was living in the constituency of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, but I did not feel any safer by having the nuclear-free zone signs.

Mr. Denham: On the point about wasting public resources on police investigations, will the hon. Gentleman extend his remarks to cover the costs of the spurious allegations about election expenses made by my defeated Conservative opponent, but which led to no police prosecution? They did, however, lead to the prosecution of the Conservative agent for fraud.

Mr. Amess: I would not wish to intrude on private grief in Itchen. However, I know Christopher Chope extremely well and I should be very surprised if he behaved in an ungallant way towards the person who defeated him in the general election.

I am delighted that this week in Basildon we have unveiled new signs. They signal a new era—a partnership in local government between the private and public sectors. The signs say "Welcome to Basildon" and they have been placed on the A127 and the A13. Above them is the new council logo, which incorporates the districts of Laindon, Wickford, Billericay and Basildon.

Unlike the awful former socialist council, we welcome the private sector in Basildon. That is why yesterday, in the House, we launched the "buy competitive British goods from Basildon campaign". Basildon district council and Conservative-controlled Essex county council will together encourage business men and women to invest in the area, so that goods and services may be traded together in partnership.

The only employment that Basildon socialists understood was district council employment. That is what they thought jobs were all about. The former socialist Basildon district council employed 1,200 people—not to give advice on housing or to ensure that pavements were level so that elderly ladies did not trip over or that lamp posts were properly lit, but to guarantee that socialist propaganda was put out every day, every week and every month.

The socialists' message was crude—"Aren't the Conservatives awful? They are to blame for everything. Aren't the socialists marvellous?" On 11 May last year, the socialists had their answer. That is why an historic and wonderful change occurred.

Of course the past year has been difficult. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) mentioned the traditional position in respect of local government officers. I know only too well from my days as a Redbridge councillor how professional were that council's officers. I was horrified when it came to my attention that the former socialist Basildon district council would on occasion appoint only officers who pledged themselves to supporting their fellow brothers and sisters. Those people spent all their time, while being paid by myself and other rates and community charge payers, putting out their vile and vicious propaganda.

When the Conservatives took over on 11 May last year, obscene telephone calls were made to Conservative councillors, which was an absolute disgrace. Somehow, my own private telephone number was given out to some lady council officers. The telephone would ring at 10 pm, 11 pm, 1 am or 3 am. My wife and small children were not greatly amused by those telephone calls from people—who seemed to have had a little too much to drink—arguing about the awful Conservative council and the fact that they might lose their jobs.

Officers who said publicly beforehand that they would never again work under a Conservative-controlled council or a Conservative Government should behave honourably, examine their consciences, and decide whether they are right to remain local authority employees.

I pay tribute to the wonderful job that the Conservative council is doing in very difficult circumstances. Typical of the misreporting that has occurred is the case of the Town Gate theatre. That project's builders took it to 13 other local authorities, which all said no. In this day and age, who would think that a council could somehow find the money to build a huge theatre? As we all know, a theatre is used not just by local residents but is a regional facility.

There was no money to sustain the theatre—it was all borrowed. The interest charges to service the debt amount to £1·5 million a year. However, I am delighted to tell my hon. Friends the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who have both been to Basildon, that the council is now in serious negotiations with an interested party and hopes to make an announcement about the theatre.

Huge amounts of money were borrowed to meet the costs of sports and leisure facilities. Such projects would have been better realised in partnership with the private sector.

It has been misreported that there have been local authority by-elections in Basildon that the Conservative party has lost. That is untrue. There was one by-election two weeks ago, when a socialist councillor resigned, left the country and ended up in New Zealand. It is true that the socialists retained their seats, but what did not receive publicity was the fact that the Conservatives moved up from third to second place.

On the same day as the county council elections, there is a district council by-election, caused not by a Conservative throwing in the towel, but by another socialist doing so because, believe it or not, he says that he is too busy working for a housing association—although we all know that socialists are supposed to oppose housing associations. Not one Conservative councillor has thrown in the towel, but two socialist councillors have already done so.

[Mr. Amess]

I pay tribute to the work that the new Conservative council is now doing. The leader of the council has announced that from now all services will be tested in the market because we owe it to people to provide high quality services at a competitive price. As a result, in years to come, when people outside the House report on political matters, I trust that they will be able to state that the new Conservative-controlled Basildon district council has led the country in a successful and beneficial partnership between the public and private sectors.

1.22 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): The debate has been interesting, if only because we now know that the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has not put his telephone number in the telephone directory as I assume that the rest of us have done so that our constituents can ring us up without having to hunt to find the number.

The debate has, in many ways, been bizarre as the Government have set out their agenda in the belief that the central issue in the provision of local government services is the extent to which those services are privatised. The Government are following an agenda which, although it has important elements, does not include the central issue in the provision of local services by local, democratically controlled councils.

The myth has been constructed—although it has been shot down many times by Opposition contributions—that the idea of partnership between local government and the private sector is opposed and resisted by and alien to Labour local authorities. That is not true. Looking around my constituency, one sees a wide range of appropriate partnerships operating between Southampton city council and the city of Southampton. The waterfront has been opened up, and the town quay and Ocean Village have been created. That scheme involved co-operation between the private and public sector; private housing and commercial development have been carried out by the private sector, and social housing has been provided by the council with the housing associations.

The regional film theatre is to be provided by the council, the private sector and other public bodies. An agreement will soon be signed by a private sector company for a new development with an ice rink and a swimming pool. The finest art gallery outside London, certainly in the south-east of England, has been refurbished as a result of a public sector partnership between the city council and the county council as it is not a profit-making exercise. Partnerships with housing associations and in some cases with private developers have meant that in the past year some projects that I set in train as chair of the housing committee will result in the creation of 250 new family homes.

Those are just a few examples. Since 1985, Southampton Labour council has been acting in a way that is far more typical of the far-sighted and forward-looking role of local authorities than the myths produced by Conservative Members today. The council chooses whether it is more appropriate for the private sector or the public sector to provide a service. The one issue that strongly divides us is the idea that wage cutting should be a basic element in the approach to the delivery of local government services. When I was the chair of housing in Southampton, I was pleased that the vast majority of building maintenance work in council housing was won by the in-house bid, but I was not pleased with the fact that for skilled tradesmen in those services it was likely to lead to a loss in income and benefits worth about £1,500 a year in order to retain their jobs.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), who spoke earlier in the debate, came along with a walletful of consultancies. No doubt he believes that his reward for those consultancies is the right to reduce the income of craftsmen who work for Southampton city council by £1,500 a year. Some of us believe—this may be a fundamental divide—that a moral issue is involved: that it is not moral to drive down the level of wages to whatever can be undercut by the private sector. That aside, it is clear that Labour-controlled councils work well in partnership with the private sector.

I said at the outset, however, that I do not regard that as the fundamental issue when it comes to the provision of local government services. The consumers of those services do not care very much who provides the services. They care about the quality of the services provided. They also care about whether they have access to those services when they need them. The one issue that has not been mentioned by any Conservative Member is what sort of services people get and whether they can get access to them.

A ridiculous and ludicrous situation is developing, in which an elderly lady who goes to her local social services department to find out whether she can have the services of a home carer now finds that performance marks are set down as to how long she will have to wait before she is interviewed, how quickly her letter should be answered and how soon the interview should take place, but that no standards at all are set as to whether she should obtain the services of a home carer.

As for real access to services, we find that there are enormous differences when it comes to the provision of services by local authorities throughout the country. For convenience, I have chosen to compare the performance of the bleak coastland strip of southern England from Dorset to Kent—solidly Conservative controlled—with the Labour-controlled shire counties. What a remarkable picture it presents. We must assume that in those Tory-controlled authorities the Tory philosophy that we have heard about this morning is being pursued to its fullest extent, that the full economic benefit of that approach has been gained and that better services are provided. In fact, that is not so.

It is not that there are huge differences in need between the north and the south. Unemployment is marginally higher in the north, though not greatly. Income is somewhat lower in the Labour-controlled shire counties and there are more people on low incomes in the Labour-controlled shire counties. However, when one allows for the cost of living, which is generally higher in the south, the differences are not so great. Yet despite the similarities between those areas there are enormous differences in the spread and availability of services.

Let us take, for example, a basic grassroots service—the availability of home carers for the elderly. We find that in that bleak grey Tory coastland of southern England there are eight hours of home carer time per 1,000 elderly people per week, compared with 14·3 hours of home carer time per 1,000 elderly people per week in the Labour-controlled shire counties. Only 4 per cent. of pensioners in those Tory-controlled southern counties have any access to a home carer, while 10 per cent. in Labour-controlled local authorities have access to a home carer.

Mr. Carrington: In the borough of Hammersmith and Fulham in which my constituency is situated—a Labour-controlled council—the council has a policy that denies access to sheltered housing to elderly people, no matter how poor and with no matter how little equity, solely on the ground that they live in their own accommodation and are owner-occupiers. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that is the right policy for that council to pursue?

Mr. Denham: I would not presume to comment on an allegation made about a local authority of which I have no knowledge. I have given a straightforward comparison —like for like—between local authorities with similar numbers of elderly people. Some are Conservative controlled and some are Labour controlled. On that straightforward comparison, elderly people in Labour-controlled shire councils have more than twice the chance of receiving home carer support to enable them to live in their own homes than they have under Tory councils.

If the Government believe that they have the key to the delivery of local government services, those figures need to be explained. They are simply explained by saying that Labour councils care a good deal more about elderly people in their areas, which is also reflected in more economic comparisons. Figures that I was able to obtain 18 months or two years ago show that the price of meals on wheels in those Tory southern heartland councils was £1·36 and in the Labour-controlled shire councils it was 89p. The burden then falls heavily on Labour-controlled district councils such as Southampton, to compensate for the neglect and incompetence of Tory county councils, to reduce the price of meals on wheels.

I have been able to find no significant difference in the needs of mobility and accessibility between people living in the Labour-controlled shire counties and those on the southern Tory strip. Yet in Labour-controlled authorities the average per capita support for public transport is £3·54 per head, while in the Tory-controlled area it is £2 per head. That is an example of public sector and private sector integration. Bus deregulation is now not a matter of looking after one's own bus service, but a matter of how much the public sector puts in to provide a decent transport system. There is far more commitment to public transport and mobility in Labour-controlled areas. That means that there are more buses and people are better able to travel and get around.

Another area where it is easy to measure need is the provision of nursery education. In the child neglect capital of the south, 5 per cent. of under-fives are in nursery education, but in Labour-controlled shire counties 35 per cent. are in nursery schools or nursery classes. What is the explanation for that appalling neglect of young children and their education in the Tory south of England? It has nothing to do with arguments about ideologies and public and private sector partnership. As the Minister said earlier, the Government determine the level of service. On service after service, Tory local councils offer a poor level of service and few young children and elderly people have access to a decent service. That issue is much more important than which local authority services are privatised.

I can find no evidence of the apparent savings from privatisation being fed back into the system. One would have expected that the authorities that have done the most to privatise would have fed the money back into extending services to more people who need them, but there is no evidence of that.

I am the first to accept that pupil-teacher ratios are not an accurate estimate of educational value—and neither is testing. The only question is value added in education. The Government provide no measure of value added in education, but the pupil-teacher ratio is better in the Labour-controlled shires than in the south.

I could go through many other issues, but I will not do so as I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. The point is clear, however: it is not sufficient to have an in-principle ideological discussion about the extent of privatisation of local government services. The only question that matters to people outside is whether they will have access to the service that they need and whether it will be well provided. All the evidence shows that the answer is more likley to be no in a Tory-run county than in a Labour-run county. That is what the May elections will be all about.

1.33 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I have listened with some interest to the hon. Members for Lancshire, West (Mr. Pickthall) and for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham). The hon. Member for Itchen talked about poor levels of service. One of the services that the parents, children and charge payers expect of a local authority is the provision of a decent and successful education. The hon. Gentleman could have told the House which local authorities produce good A-level results and which produce poor results. I was interested to hear that he objected to the fact that the Government do not produce tables of value added in education. However, they produce tables of school results, but the hon. Gentleman did not show much enthusiasm.

Mr. Denham: There is a great difference between the results of testing, which have built into them influences such as social class and parental income, and value added, which measures the extent to which a child gains from school. A-level results and results of other testing, which do not take value added into account, are very misleading.

Mr. Marshall: Parents want good GCSE and A-level results for their children because they provide the opportunity for their children to enter further, higher and university education. It is noticeable that the local authorities that produce good results are Conservative councils and those that produce bad results are Labour councils.

It is no use the hon. Gentleman saying that one local authority spends more than another on education, because we all know which local education authority spent more than any other; the late and unlamented Inner London education authority spent a great deal, but produced some of the worst examination results. It did not care a tinker's cuss for standards, allowed schools such as Highbury

[Mr. Marshall]

Grove school in Islington to go downhill, and forgot that parents sent children to school so that they could go on to higher and university education.

The hon. Member for Lancashire, West talked about the Government reducing local authorities' democratic control. The Conservative party should take no lessons from the Labour party. It was a Labour Government who imposed on local authorities the obligation to destroy grammar schools, regardless of the wishes of parents and teachers and of the standards achieved in those schools. Under the Shirley Williams Act, there were no parental ballots on getting rid of grammar schools; it was done by diktat of the Labour Government. The reason why there are still some grammar schools is that some courageous Conservative councillors were willing to cause delays because they knew that Baroness Thatcher would give them the freedom to retain those centres of educational excellence.

How dare a Labour Member talk about democratic control when the previous Labour Government restricted the right of local authorities to sell council houses? How can a Labour Member talk about creating greater economic activity when the Labour party is committed to reintroducing a Greater London council? The GLC was guilty of waste, extravagance, duplication and delay.

When the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) was leader of the GLC, the disagreement between it and the borough councils destroyed tens of thousands of jobs in London. When he was in control of the GLC, I was a local councillor in Ealing. My council applied to the GLC for permission to create a pedestrian crossing. It took the GLC 13 months to give us the permission and took us 13 days to create the crossing. No one should say that the GLC, or the son of GLC, would generate economic activity; it would generate only delay, waste and extravagance in London.

The hon. Member for Lancashire, West also spoke about the desirability of tendering but said that compulsory competitive tendering was wrong. That is absurd, because we all know what happened in the days before CCT. It was sometimes difficult to get Conservative councils to go out to tender and it was impossible to get Labour councils to go out to tender. Does the hon. Member for Lancashire, West believe that if there were no compulsory competitive tendering the good people of Haringey would go out to tender, that Camden council would go out to tender or that Islington council, of which you were once a distinguished member, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would go out to tender? Of course they would not. Competitive tendering is anathema to the socialists of those councils which just do not believe in it.

It is true that under CCT the hours that people work have sometimes been cut. Let us consider what happened before CCT. When I was chairman of the local services committee in Ealing, I went round to look at people at work. From midday onwards, although the workers knew that we were coming, we could not find them. The excuse given was that they must have gone on to the next job. If they had gone on to the next job, I suspect that it was being done in the private sector rather than in the local authority sector because we could not find them. We all know what happened. One did not see a refuse collector in London after midday before compulsory competitive tendering. There is no doubt that people were paid for a 38-hour week, but they certainly were not working one before CCT.

There has been a sea change in the attitude of local authorities to the private sector. In the 1960s and early 1970s, local authorities would say that they believed in the private sector, as shown by the fact that they rented out a kiosk in the park or on the beach in the summer. Local authorities were quite unwilling to do anything to generate savings through competitive tendering in their major activities. They always claimed that there could be no improvement in the quality of service. It was claimed by council after council that there could be no savings.

I heard, as I am sure the Minister heard, the odd Conservative councillor in the 1970s say, "We are not putting that out to tender because we shall not save any money." That is the arrogance of monopolies throughout the ages. It was believed that, because a particular service had been run in a particular way by a certain council for 20 years, there was no scope for providing a better service or a more economic service. Events have proved those absurd claims to be false.

I pay tribute first to Wandsworth council, the local authority in London which did most to popularise competitive tendering. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), because in his business career before he came to the House he was one of those who showed up the incompetence of direct labour organisations and the benefits that could come from compulsory competitive tendering. I also pay tribute to the former Prime Minister, Baroness Thatcher, because she was the national politician who did most to popularise competitive tendering and to point out that socialism did not work in the town hall, just as it did not work nationally or internationally.

All my experiences in local government in Aberdeen and in Ealing suggest that competitive tendering is the only way to get a decent service. I discovered that early on when I was a member of Aberdeen council and we managed to get a motion through our watch committee saying that we should go out to tender for a demolition job. We did so, having been told by Labour members on the council that we were wasting our time and that there would be no saving. When the tenders came in, we realised that the lowest tender, from an outside contractor, would lead to a saving of 40 per cent. What did Labour members of the city council do? Did they say, "Well done, we shall take that cheaper contract"? Of course they did not. They voted for the higher contract. As an Aberdeen ratepayer, I wrote to the then Secretary of State for Scotland, Willie Ross. I am glad to say that he wrote back saying that he had instructed the council to accept the lowest tender, showing that there were some sensible socialists even in those days.

I later became chairman of the finance committee in Ealing. We had two boasts in Ealing: that we had the lowest rates in west London, and that the quality of our services persuaded the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), to leave Liberal Richmond and to come to live in Conservative Ealing. We discovered that, whenever we went out to tender, there were dramatic savings to be made to the benefit of ratepayers. Compulsory competitive tendering has resulted in a huge reduction in costs. All the surveys show that, because of CCT, local government services are less expensive in real terms than they were five, six or seven years ago.

Moreover, a much better service is being provided for the benefit of charge payers. Penalty clauses are always attached when a service goes out to tender so that if the service is not carried out, the contractor does not get the money. Under the previous system, the direct labour department did not always deliver the goods or collect the refuse, but it still got paid. The refuse collector was paid however good or however poor the job he did and, all too often, the job was second rate. Private contractors are also more alert to the possibilities of using a facility for the benefit of individuals than the old local authority manager was.

I welcome some of the developments that have taken place in recent months. In Berkshire—a county which some of us may get to know somewhat better in the weeks to 6 May—compulsory competitive tendering is about to save ratepayers £1·3 million as a result of a £30 million deal that the authority has done with Baptis, the Glasgow civil engineering company. The Government have recognised that the most efficient way of providing gipsy sites is through private enterprise rather than through the public sector. I warmly welcome that and I also welcome the fact that the Government have recognised the validity of the claim that I have been making for a long time—that boroughs such as Barnet should not be compelled by Government diktat to provide a gipsy site. There is nowhere in the London borough of Barnet suitable for a gipsy site.

We have seen advice from the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy—a completely unbiased body—that private contractors are now obtaining a much higher percentage of new contracts. Some 68 per cent. of the local authority contracts going out to tender now go to private contractors rather than the direct labour department. Throughout the world, people are recognising that privatisation and competitive tendering are the real engines of economic progress. It is a great tragedy that there is one place in the world where that has not yet come home, and that is on the Labour Benches.

It is because of the different attitudes of political parties to private enterprise, standards and quality of service that there is such a discrepancy between the council tax in band G, at the higher end of the scale, in the London borough of Barnet, where it is £915, and in the London borough of Haringey, just over the road, where it is £1,211—nearly £300, or 30 per cent., more. Yet in the London borough of Barnet services are very much better because the council believes in co-operation with the private sector. In Brent Cross, it can boast the most modern shopping centre in London. It was developed in the 1970s by local government and the private sector in co-operation and, because it is managed by the private sector, it is popular, successful and profitable—three categories of service which the Labour party has never yet understood.

1.48 pm

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): Alhough I have been here since 9.30, I am sure that it will come as a relief to some hon. Members to learn that I propose to limit my remarks to 10 minutes so as to allow other hon. Members the opportunity to speak.

I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Pickthall) said about the damage that has been done to the relationship between local authorities and the private sector, and between local authorities and the Government, as a result of the almost irrational and certainly ideologically rooted hostility on the Conservative Benches towards local authorities and public sector undertakings in particular. The comments of the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) were as clear an example of that as one could possibly imagine.

It is almost like the Orwellian image of "public sector bad, private sector good", as though the Conservative Benches are staffed by pigs that have finally learnt to walk on their hind legs. The reality of co-operation between local authorities and the private sector—and the Government, as the debate relates to co-operation between the public and private sectors, and the relationship with the Government is a very important part of that—is as old as local authorities themselves.

The role of local authorities as contractors dates back many years. The introduction of a degree of compulsion, obsessively driven by the Conservative party in recent years, is merely another development of that. If that had been introduced in an even-handed and reasonable way, such great damage would not have been caused to local authorities. It was introduced with just one purpose in mind: to take services out of the control of local authorities. The idea was not to improve the level of service and value for money, but to remove the services from local authority control.

If we need evidence of that, we need only consider the comments of the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant), who recounted a list of the services that the London borough of Bromley had put out to the private sector. He wore that list as a badge of pride, but he did not reflect on the quality of those services. He did not say whether they were good, bad or indifferent. He believed that getting services out to the private sector was a good in and of itself. I believe that that serves the people of Bromley particularly badly. As I said to the hon. Member in an intervention, because of that ideologically blinded and dogmatic approach, the fraud squad has taken a deep interest in some of the manoeuvrings—I put it no higher than that—of elected Tory councillors in Bromley in attempting to discharge themselves of their responsibilities with regard to the provision of social services homes.

I wish to refer briefly to Lewisham, which is next door to Bromley. Lewisham is an inner London borough—unlike leafy Bromley, which is the richest local authority in Britain with the highest per capita income of any local authority. We to the north in Lewisham are not so fortunate, having a similar population in about one third of the area in which Bromley luxuriates. Bromley truly is a leafy suburb. I wish to make my position perfectly clear. Having been a member of Lewisham council for 19 years, I am not entirely objective in my assessment of what has happened in those years, but I believe that what I say will stand up to examination.

When the Institute of Local Government reviewed well-managed local authorities recently—I am sure that the Minister and his Department have a copy of the report—it identified Lewisham as the only London borough worthy of inclusion in the top 16 well-managed authorities. In fact, Lewisham was one of the top six well-managed authorities in Britain. In part, that is probably why in recent years the Labour majority in Lewisham has been higher than it has ever been. Lewisham council has the largest Labour group in London. We also have the largest political group of any kind. Conservative representation is down to a mere half dozen, and I believe that the borough council elections next year could erode that even further.

[Mr. Jim Dowd]

I look on that with one joyful eye and one tearful eye. I suppose that I am a "Pymist" in these matters. I believe that local authorities need a degree of balance. All democratic institutions require that balance. The fear of losing office keeps our politicians straight—or straightish, shall we say. I believe that what we are trying to do in political terms is often best examined through the eyes of those who do not agree with us. While we may never convert them, if we can at least substantiate in our own minds the validity of what we are doing, I believe that we are at least discharging our responsibilities properly.

Lewisham is committed to a lead role in urban regeneration in the borough and the partnership includes other public sector bodies, voluntary bodies and private sector interests. In an intervention in the speech by the hon. Member for Beckenham I mentioned one of those projects—Beckenham Place park. I accept that the issue is highly controversial, but there are many such issues to be resolved and I appreciate the strength of feeling in the area. The scheme was undertaken in the full knowledge that Lewisham council was obliged to secure the future of that park but did not have the resources to do so on its own. The expenditure over the coming years is immense and the only way to protect that valuable public asset was through a partnership with a private sector organisation. Whether that is the right path and whether the scheme will make progress remains to be seen, but the partnership with the private organisation was a responsible and reasonable action by the local authority.

Unfortunately, the partnership approach is undermined by the proliferation of central Government and arm's-length agencies. Inner London probably has more of those than any other area of the country. Their remit is prescribed by the Government irrespective of the needs of the locality, and that is a cause for concern. There is an apparent lack of central co-ordination of initiatives, which results in both gaps and overlaps between the agencies. That is also perceived as part of the attack on local democracy and the increasing centralisation of power about which my hon. Friends have spoken in detail.

Lewisham council, with its extensive knowledge of the economic, social and environmental profile and the needs and opportunities in its area, is the only body with the legitimacy to determine those priorities, co-ordinate the work of the agencies and decide how best to augment services and quality of life for people in the area. The plethora of initiatives for distinct topical issues such as community safety, employment and enterprise development in the borough and their high public profile could lead one to believe that they are the sum total of urban regeneration in the borough, but, in fact, they reflect just a small part of it.

I could go into detail about what is being attempted in Lewisham town centre, which is one of London's major regional and strategic centres. To a large extent, its future has been assured, despite the recession, largely due to the council's decision to dispose of its freeholding of the centre and go into partnership with a private company to secure the future of that centre. That raised a considerable amount of money which the council was able to redeploy through a sharp—and, I hasten to add, highly legal—manoeuvre. I use the word "sharp" in its prudent sense. We were able to build a new town hall on a site acquired in the mid-1960s for precisely that purpose. The net result is that without costing the poll tax payers of Lewisham a penny they are now saving £2 million in revenue because of the savings from rents and other costs that we do not need to pay for expensive office space. Even in an unfashionable corner of London such as Lewisham, office accommodation is extremely expensive.

We achieved much through Deptford city challenge, although city challenge is a double-edged sword. Lewisham was one of the pacemaker authorities in city challenge and one of only two authorities in London to secure the first wave partnership. It was not said then that that expenditure was instead of urban programme money—it was always trailed as being additional. Unfortunately, we are now losing out because all Lewisham's urban partnership bids have been lost. That is not supporting the partnership in the way that the local authority has a right to expect. In the first year, Deptford city challenge is over-programmed by about £300,000. We were originally told by the Minister's Department that that would be met from underspend in other city challenge enterprises, but we have now been told that the money will be taken from year five—if the city challenge programme reaches year five.

The local authority in Lewisham is undertaking many other aspects of development into which I will not go because of the time. It is not simply a question of deciding who does what. As hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, it is a question of seeing who does what best. That mixture is critical in providing value for money and the quality of life that all citizens in all local authority areas have every right to expect.

1.59 pm

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Underlining this morning's debate is a question about the fundamental role of local authorities—whether they should be enablers or providers of services. What is clearly emerging is that local authorities should be enablers of services because only then can they make sure that the quality, the value for money and the level of services given buy the providers reach what is deemed and needed by people living in their areas.

It is essential that local authorities recognise that their primary purpose is to ensure that the money that they get in, both from council tax payers and from central Government, is spent in the most effective manner, to provide the highest quality of service in the way required by those who live in the area. There is a fundamental contradiction, in that if councils provide services themselves, their ability to demand quality of that service is severely eroded. I should like to see compulsory competitive tendering moving the next stage forward—from some services to all services being contracted out—and the removal from councils of the power to provide any services, leaving them only with the power to commission services from outside bodies. Unless councils do that, they cannot demand the necessary quality and level of services, or get the value for money, that they require.

In many areas, we are moving towards a requirement that local authorities contract out. In many sectors, that contracting out could go one stage further. We are starting to see that happen in, for example, the accountancy function, which is a natural sector for which local authorities can buy in outside expertise and thereby give a higher quality of service. There are many other sectors.

The fact that what we are looking at is the level of services that local authorities provide and the level at which they do compulsory competitive tendering should not blind us to the great weakness of the present system. Some local authorities so skew the tendering process that they ensure that any realistic outside provider of services cannot conceivably comply with the contract conditions that they insist on setting.

Let me give at least one example—I could give many more, but time is short—from the borough of Hammersmith and Fulham, in which my constituency is situated. When it gave out the contract details for providing school meals within the education service, the specification for the quality of food was admirably, but also unreasonably, high. It defined such detail as the thickness of the skin of the lemons that were to be provided by the catering service and set out the criterion that the bananas to be provided were to have no brown marks on them. I dare say that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, regularly shop for bananas, as all of us do, and will recognise how difficult it is to purchase bananas that have no brown marks on their skin. Needless to say, no private contractors have felt able to meet the requirements of the contract conditions. Needless to say also, the in-house tender from the council won the contract.

That raises the next question, which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will already be asking as you are well ahead of me in the argument: how does the in-house council contractor meet the stringent conditions? The answer is that no one knows, because no one checks. The council would make detailed checks of any outside contractor's performance of his contract conditions, but, if it were checking its own work force to see whether it was complying with contract conditions, the tendency would be to be a little more tolerant and to consider that there are certain matters that need a certain time—six months, a year, two years, until the next election, perhaps well beyond it—to put right. So conditions will not be so toughly enforced for the in-house service. That also leads to fraud and corruption.

There are severe question marks over what is going on in the engineering and borough highways departments of Hammersmith and Fulham council. It may or may not be fraud. The departments are certainly loss making. But the council's toleration of a department making severe losses in providing services is much greater than it would be if an outside contractor said that it wanted to increase the price of the contract because it was making losses in providing the service.

When a council attempts to provide services and police them, it faces a conflict of interest which it is impossible to resolve. The only way round that conflict of interest is to make councils contract out all services. That cannot happen immediately because the private sector cannot provide those services immediately. However, in time it will be possible to provide those services. I hope that the Government and, in particular, my hon. Friend the Minister will look hard at encouraging and forcing councils to contract out more services. That is the only way in which, in time, we shall achieve a better, higher quality local government service.

2.6 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): As I may be the last Member to speak before the Front-Bench replies, I remind the House of the subject of today's debate: the partnership between the public and private sectors in delivering local government services. All the speeches that we have heard from the Conservative Benches have stressed not the need for partnership between the public and private sector but the notion that the private sector should take over from the public sector. Conservative Members said that enabling authorities should allow private bodies to operate in local areas. They said that compulsory competitive tendering should be used to push more services into private provision. They said that the boundaries of public provision should be pushed back even further.

There is a different approach, however. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) discussed developments in partnership between public and private sectors, but that has been missed by Conservative Members and particularly by the Minister, who gave us an ideological tour when he introduced the debate, stressing special examples of what was important about private provision and giving us all the pluses in the development of 19th and 20th century capitalism. The Minister spoke about the development of the railways and said how important that private development was. However, it was all one-sided. He told us what had been achieved by capitalism but nothing about the problems that had been created. The vast problems of exploitation, deprivation and unemployment had to be handled by the public sector, which had to come in to correct what unrestrained private enterprise had done. The Government's arguments push us all the time towards unrestrained private sector activity in which the role of local councillors is limited. Their role is not to be involved in the running of services or in co-operating with the private sector.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman heard only half of my speech. I made it clear that there was a vital role for local and central government. I made it clear that some people need protecting. They need services and help from the Government against the background of market capitalism. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would recognise that there was balance in my speech. I identified the role of both the government and the private sector.

Mr. Barnes: I listened to all of the speeches from the Conservative Benches, including that of the Minister. Apart from a discussion about bananas and Basildon, all the stress was placed on the importance of the private sector coming into local government. Thatcherism has produced the notion that anything can be privatised because public money will be made available for private services in what was previously the public sphere.

Indeed, the importance of such markets is stressed continuously by Conservative Members—except when it comes to the markets in ideas, discussions and arguments with the electorate, which are pushed to one side. In the argument about the opting out of schools, local authorities, trade unions and others are constrained in what they can say because otherwise it is held to be misleading information. The Government want to put only one side of the argument when people are making up their minds.

[Mr. Barnes]

The stress on the private replacing the public is wrong. Public services were introduced to correct the results of unrestrained private enterprise. That even happened under the Tory party with education legislation in the 19th century. Old age pensions were introduced by the then Liberal party early in this century, and the welfare state was introduced by the Labour party. None of that was done with the aim of entirely changing the basis of society or doing away with markets; it was done because it was recognised that other elements had to be included and that there had to be a measure of public responsibility.

There is considerable scope for public provision supplementing private provision. There is a problem with dioxin at Stanton plc in the Staveley area of my constituency—it spills over from the problem in Bolsover. We need a public body, perhaps an environmental protection agency, to draw together all the different threads and to assist the company from which we assume the dioxin comes. There needs also to be assistance for the farmers in the area whose future prospects have been threatened. There are plenty of opportunities for the public sector to work with the private sector to ensure the protection both of jobs and of the community.

The whole notion of civic service, civic duty and civic pride has been hit hard by a mass of Government legislation. We had reached the stage where we almost believed that the Government could not go any further in hammering local authorities. They introduced the poll tax, which was the unfairest tax system ever introduced into a western democratic system. They introduced the nonsense of standard spending assessments, which are still in operation. We thought that that was the end of the road in terms of what the Government could do to local authorities and many of us began to wonder about the role of authorities, which basically were becoming agents carrying out policies determined by central Government, but now it seems that we are to go even further down that road with the notion of enabling authorities.

In Derbyshire, there has been an examination of local authority boundaries, areas and functions, and much of the discussion has centred on what the boundaries should be. The really important discussion, however, is whether local authorities will become just enabling authorities and local councillors will have less and less input into decisions about their areas and thus become less accountable to their electorate. We should be talking about extending democratic provision. Where there are shortcomings in the work of councils, we should insist on improving the democratic arrangements so that people are drawn into the work of the local authority and can influence its decisions. It should not be a matter of the private sector coming into authorities to correct any problems.

I want to deal with the problems being faced in Derbyshire and the terrible system of standard spending assessments. Since that system was introduced, Derbyshire county council has received smaller increases to compensate for inflation than any other shire county. It has received only 60 per cent. of the provision for Berkshire or Hertfordshire. The Minister argues that the reason is that Derbyshire's population has declined while Hertfordshire's has increased, but that is incorrect. Derbyshire's population has grown by a larger percentage than Hertfordshire's over the last two or three years and bigger increases are projected. The authorities in my constituency—including Chesterfield borough council and North-East Derbyshire district council—are at the bottom end of standard spending assessment and grant provision. There is no reason for that. North-East Derbyshire is 365th out of the 366 district councils in England and Wales.

We know the system is fiddled and we want it altered. It is nonsense to go on as we are when provision needs to be made for that area. No one could describe the authorities concerned as profligate, but they are seriously hit by the present arrangements. Councils in some areas receive two or three times more in standard spending assessment and grant than does Derbyshire. How is any authority expected to manage in those circumstances?

2.16 pm

Mr. Henderson: With the leave of the House, I will comment on some of the arguments made in this interesting debate on a number of important issues affecting communities throughout the country. It is understandable that some hon. Members have had to leave early, and I thank those who informed me that they could not stay for the end of the debate.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) fell short of convincing the House that he was objective in his assessment of the delivery of local authority services. If he had paid more attention to the old axiom that people who live in glasshouses should not throw stones, he might have convinced the House of his objectivity. He missed the whole point about local authority services by not paying any attention to the views of communities that are dependent on them.

The hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) also fell into that trap, believing that compulsory competitive tendering could solve all the problems of delivering local authority services when it is clear that even the Audit Commission does not acknowledge that point. Its recent report indicated that some costs increased when compulsory competitive tendering was introduced. If I had more time, I might be tempted to give more details.

I contrast those hon. Gentlemen's remarks with those of my hon. Friends the Members for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) and for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd), who have no objection to the delivery of various local government services but want to see even-handedness, quality being brought to the fore, and efficiency improvements not being made at the expense of exploiting many workers who are already low paid.

The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) attempted to admit that ideology had sometimes played more of a part in the argument than might be wise. That was demonstrated in the speech of the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), and even more so in that of the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess).

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) emphasised the damage done to democracy by the establishment of unelected quangos operating in areas affecting local authorities. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) recounted sitting on his grandfather's knee. He tried to persuade us that he was a generous character who could have appeared in a Hovis commercial, but he only convinced us that he had already played a part in "All Muck and Brass". Certainly the conciliatory approach that the Minister sometimes attempted to adopt was completely missed by his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough.

In their excellent speeches, my hon. Friends the Members for York (Mr. Bayley) and for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) gave prominence to people's choice. The key question in the delivery of local government services is: are people being given the chance to receive what they want at the price that they are prepared to pay? The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that compulsory capping had often intervened to prevent that.

My argument with the Government is that they tried to use the delivery mechanism as a smokescreen to avoid real debate about the other local government issues. There is no major disagreement on delivery mechanism between the various political parties that have participated in the debate. We all recognise that, in our economy, partnership is crucial in the development of local government services.

Tendering has always taken place and local authorities up and down the country have for many years been involved in tendering services where they believe that they can be better provided on a contracted-out basis than a direct basis. There is every suggestion that that will continue to be so. On a number of occasions, Opposition Members said that tendering itself does not guarantee an improvement in efficiency. I said that good management, whether of direct provision or contracting out, was important for local authorities.

The real issue concerns democracy and local people having the right to determine what happens to them in their communities. It involves local people having the right to determine what level of services they want and how they should be provided. The main issue involves local people having access to what is happening and the results of auditing procedures undertaken on their behalf, and a say in the way in which services are delivered. It involves stressing the importance of community provision, and enhancing individual liberty and opportunity.

Those issues are central to local government and will be to the fore in the campaign between now and the county council elections on 6 May. Those arguments and priorities will ultimately have the support of the British people, which will be shown in the county council elections on 6 May.

2.22 pm

Mr. Redwood: With the leave of the House, may I say that I am grateful to all those whose contributions have produced a good debate on the vital subject of the range of local authority responsibilities and services, and the best means of delivering them.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) challenged me on whether I stood by the things that I had written 16 years ago. I was flattered and not a little surprised that the Labour party researches its future policies in my articles written in 1977. I repeat what I said then. The community land legislation was wrong and the Conservative Administration were right to repeal it. Having both a structure and a local plan can be wasteful, which was why we moved to urban development plans in big urban areas and why we are asking whether each shire area needs one or two councils and whether it needs one or two plans. The answer will depend on local circumstances.

I said that housing could often be better provided by institutions and people rather than councils, which has been shown to be true. Most rented housing is made available through housing associations with a mixture of private and public finance. Some councils have stopped owning houses, but they still have excellent housing policies in their areas—often better than those of councils that have clung to the old, outmoded ideas that I was beginning to question as long ago as 1977.

Better recreational facilities can often be provided by using private expense. Local councils may wish to buy season tickets or offer help to individuals or groups who need access to those facilities. They may do better by their local communities organising it in that way than by buying and owning the facility.

Mr. Henderson: Does the Minister stand by his comment in 1977 that all swimming pools should be privatised?

Mr. Redwood: Swimming pools are often better run by the private sector. I hope that many will contract out or market-test the facilities. Many new facilities can be well provided by the private sector. I am keen to encourage it, unlike the hon. Gentleman, who seems to be saying that if something is not provided by the public sector it does not count and it is not a public facility. Those facilities that are provided at private expense are every bit as much public facilities, if open to the public, as are the others. The hon. Gentleman may want all golf courses to be municipally owned. I am happy to have a lot of private sector golf courses open to those who wish to use them.

The hon. Gentleman said that he and his party are still not in sympathy with standard spending assessments. However, both he and his party will, I believe, agree that there needs to be a method of calculating exactly how much grant each local authority receives. I do not think that the Labour party would argue the case that we should just send a fixed amount per head for every person in the country to the different local authority areas. They want a more sophisticated system than that, as well they might, because it tends to be their councils that receive far bigger grants as a result of the sophistication that we have introduced into the system.

I say both to the hon. Gentleman and to his hon. Friends who raised the standard spending assessment issue, and also to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), representing the Liberal Democrats, that we are now reviewing again this year the principles and the figures used in the SSA calculations. I should be delighted if the Labour party—even, perhaps, the Labour-Liberal alliance, or the Liberal party on its own—could come to an agreed view about how the SSAs should be calculated. We should be prepared to take that view fully into account in our considerations.

I have asked local government, of all parties and of none, to give the Department their best views. Again, I would hope that the local authority associations would try to bring their views closer together. I fear, however, that this year, as in past years, the interests of urban authorities will often be seen to be different from those of rural ones and that the interests of big towns will be seen to be different from those of villages and small towns. Sometimes, Labour authorities have a different view of their interests from Conservative ones, and so forth.

[Mr. Redwood]

It is not easy to bring it all together. Ultimately, only the Government and the House of Commons can decide exactly how the money is to be distributed. But it is a genuine consultation. I have not decided what the answer should be in advance; nor has the Secretary of State. We are open to discussion with all parties that are seriously interested in SSAs.

The House might like to know that I have not yet had a communication from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North, or from the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, setting out what Labour's view is. I shall, of course, keep the House posted if they come to an agreed view among themselves.

I fear also that the House did not receive a completely frank account today from the shadow spokesman on the Labour party's policy towards compulsory competitive tendering. I think that progress is being made. Many Opposition Members agreed that competitive tendering can be valuable. Some agreed that competitive tendering and market testing can produce improved quality. Many agreed that it can often produce lower costs. Many also agreed that they have often been doing it in Labour authorities. But on the crucial issue of what the Labour party would recommend doing if a local authority refused to market test anything and was demonstrably inefficient, we did not get quite the clarity that we seek. Perhaps another debate will be needed to tease out that point.

In advance of the local elections—important elections to elect people to make big decisions about local services and the expenditure of large sums of money—there is naturally some considerable interest in the cost of the services and the range of services provided by the authorities controlled by the different parties. It is a pity that today the Labour party has seen fit yet again to try to mislead the public about what exactly is the difference in the cost of the provision of services for taxpayers in Labour and Conservative areas.

It is necessary, therefore, once again to remind the House that it is nearly always dearer to live under Labour local government than under Conservative local government and that the gap is now more than £100 per household for band C and band D households throughout the country. In every case, the highest taxes are imposed by Labour authorities and the lowest by Conservative authorities. Among county councils, Northumberland is the highest and Hampshire the lowest, and the gap for a band C taxpayer is almost £150 between the two. Among metropolitan districts, Newcastle, which is well known to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North, sets the highest tax, and Trafford, which is Conservative controlled, sets the lowest. The gap is almost £250 between the two. Among London boroughs, Greenwich, which is Labour controlled, charges £550 for borough services, compared with Westminster, which is Conservative controlled, at £117—an enormous gap of more than £400. That is the truth.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Government fiddled the grant.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman says that we fiddled the grant——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

CONSOLIDATION, &c., BILLS

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Charities Bill [Lords], the Clean Air Bill [Lords] and the Rdioactive Substances Bill [Lords], notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bills have been read a second time.—[Mr. David Davis.]

A45 Development (Bourn)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David Davis.]

2.30 pm

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I am grateful for the opportunity to raised an issue that I have already raise once in the House. The area around the village of Bourn in my constituency and the 12 village communities in the area are delightful and are characteristic of Cambridgeshire and of the East Anglian countryside generally.

Given the fast growth of Cambridgeshire, it is essential to preserve the amenities and village character of the area. Otherwise, Cambrideshire will suffer the same fate as Greater London and parts of Middlesex and Surrey, which I knew before the war, which became long, ribbon-development concrete deserts. We must prevent that from happening again. If we get planning decisions wrong, the countryside and communities and the village character will be gone for ever.

I first raised this matter in the House on 28 November 1988. The original county structure plan came out in 1980. In July 1988, the then Secretary of State for the Environment, the late Lord Ridley, who, although he had many great virtues, was weak when confronted by developers, yielded to pressure for amendments to the structure plan, which therefore had to provide for a new settlement in south Cambridgeshire.

I want to quote from the reply of the then Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Christopher Chope, who said:

"It is essential that the policies contained in an approved plan are closely monitored and kept up to date to cater for the needs of the county." [Official Report, 28 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 557.]

I wholeheartedly agree with those important words.

Subsequently, planning applications were made for a number of settlements in the locality, all of which were rejected by the planning authority, so appeals were lodged. An extensive inquiry considered all the proposals of developers and speculators, including the one at Great Common farm, about which I am particularly concerned and which was the least favoured option of the planning authority, which turned them all down.

Eventually, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, rejected all the appeals, but, unlike the district council planning authority, he accepted the inspector's recommendation that the scheme most suitable was Great Common farm at Bourn airfield. I need hardly say that, naturally, this has been the cause of immense anxiety among my constituents in the area. Therefore, they were delighted—as I was—when, just before the general election last year, the Secretary of State issued guidance stating clearly that new settlements would gain support only if they did not go against the wishes of the local community.

In that connection, I refer to a letter I personally received from the Prime Minister, dated 16 March 1992. He said:

"The new guidance sets out clearly that new settlements are likely to gain support only when they come through the local plan making process. This will encourage housebuilders to work with local planners and not to seek to impose plans against the wishes of the local communities . . . we do not favour a free-for-all in housing land supply. I hope the publication of the guidance will help allay the fears of your constituents."

It certainly did. It also allayed my fears, and we went confidently into the general election on that basis.

Following all that, plans were subsequently submitted by developers—now called Stanhope but originally known as McAlpine—which modified the original plan in order to meet some of the criticisms of the Secretary of State and the inspector. However, the plans which have now been submitted and which we are now considering are still flawed and still fail to meet the fundamental objections that were prevalent at the time of the original debate.

Various problems have still not been dealt with, including that of flooding and the inadequacy of the road system. Regional trends in the county of Cambridgeshire have consistently shown that, whereas we have the lowest unemployment rate and the best health in the country, we have the worst record—it is a disgrace—of road accidents in the whole of the United Kingdom. The new development will do nothing to improve that; in fact, it will make it much worse.

The new plan does not consider the problem of overcrowding in schools which will occur. It does not deal with the fact that it will detract from the Papworth and Caldecote developments which are already approved. In the South Cambridgeshire district council area, sufficient planning permissions are already in the pipeline to deal with all housing needs. If the new settlement is approved, there will be an excess of planning permissions, which will be wholly undersirable and impossible to cope with. Perhaps there should be some further development in north Cambridgeshire, which has employment and housing problems, but not in south Cambridgeshire, which is entirely the wrong place for such a development. Above all, it would damage the amenities for ever.

The scheme is not only seriously flawed but already utterly out of date. The county council has produced a new structure plan which rejects the whole concept of such a settlement. It rightly argues that such a settlement would not conform with population housing forecasts for the area which have been revised in the light of regional planning guidance. In those circumstances, it would be plum crazy to go ahead with a scheme that can only result in the biggest concrete white elephant in the county of Cambridgeshire.

I have sought to impress these facts on a number of Ministers, but my pleas seem to have fallen on deaf ears. I am grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), for being here to reply to the debate. On 9 March this year, he sent me a confusing letter—it was so confusing that the district council had to seek counsel's opinion to find out what it meant. In effect, my hon. Friend threw the ball back to the district council and, what is more, appeared to reject the county council's proposals to dispose of the need for a new settlement. His Department issued a press statement, without, I must say, having the courtesy to inform me. The statement said that the county council had been told to delete reference to the new settlement in its structure plan because it wanted "to secure plans which are not out of step with national policy".

What on earth does that mean? I thought that national policy was to ensure that development accorded with local needs which local people were best able to judge. Are we back in the "gentlemen in Whitehall know best" world? If the Prime Minister's letter means anything, it means that Government policy is that local wishes should prevail. That is what my constituents thought when they voted for the Government last year, and so did I.

[Sir Anthony Grant]

I want my hon. Friend and the Government to be under no illusions: local people are passionately against the scheme. My postbag tells me that, and I know that the Minister's postbag does because I have seen copies of the many letters that have been sent to him. County councillor John Reynolds and district councillors Mrs. Daphne Spink and Mrs. Linda Tingey, all of whom are closely in touch with local opinion—far more so than I am—report how disastrous the settlement would be. They have consistently said so and have argued the case clearly in the forums in which they are concerned and in public.

It is no good the Minister saying that it is up to the district council planning authority to decide the matter when the Department hamstrings it with out-of-date restrictions which make it terrified of being sued by the speculators. There is a distinct danger of this being a case of Whitehall's Big Brother crushing local wishes with a vengeance.

Twelve parishes and their communities have formed the New Settlement Action Group. They are absolutely united against this folly. I consider that I and, more importantly, my constituents have been treated shabbily in the whole affair over a number of years. The settlement is not wanted and it is not needed by anyone. It is not wanted by the Standing Conference of East Anglian Local Authorities, and it is not wanted by the district council, by the county council, by the parishes or by the people. It is wanted only by greedy speculators who seem to terrorise the present Department as they did previous Departments. I ask the Minister to show more consideration and sympathy to my rightly concerned constituents than has hitherto been the case.

2.41 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): Before dealing with the substance of the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, South-West (Sir A. Grant), I shall deal with one matter he raised. It is important to consider how planning applications are dealt with in the House. There are frequently contentious planning matters, such as structure plans and district plans, which have to be dealt with by Ministers. We always seek to give parliamentary colleagues on both sides of the House the best possible warning of any decisions that might affect their constituencies. I did that in respect of my hon. Friend. My private office sought to fax to his office the contents of the press release well before it was made available. I hope, therefore, that he will recognise on reflection that no discourtesy to him was intended and that we made every effort to let him know the facts.

Sir Anthony Grant: I am sure that no discourtesy was intended. My point was simply that all the attempts to send faxes and messages failed.

Mr. Baldry: There is no profit in going into the matter further—I just wanted to make it clear to my hon. Friend that every effort was made to ensure that he was warned of the decision.

My hon. Friend has consistently opposed any new settlement west of Cambridge and he has expressed his concerns with clarity and force today, as he did to Mr. Chope, the Under-Secretary of State in 1988, when there was a very similar debate in which very similar sentiments were expressed. I hope that it will be helpful for me to set out the background to the decisions taken in the past few years which will enable us to understand the present position in respect of any new settlement in the A45 corridor.

Policies for a new settlement in both the A10 corridor to the north of Cambridge and the A45 corridor to the west and east of Cambridge were included in the Cambridgeshire structure plan, which was put forward by the county council and approved by the Secretary of State in March 1989. In approving the structure plan, however, the Secretary of State halved the size of a new settlement proposed for the A10 corridor from 3,000 to 1,500 homes and inserted—as he was entitled to—proposals for a new settlement of 3,000 homes in the A45 corridor. I fully appreciate that the county council has been consistently unhappy about the proposal and in fact rejected it before submitting the structure plan review to the Secretary of State. The background to the proposals was the regional need to ensure adequate housing provision in Cambridgeshire until the turn of the century.

Following the approval of the structure plan in 1989, three proposals were made for new settlements in the A10 corridor—two in south Cambridgeshire and one in east Cambridgeshire—and eight proposals for new settlement were made in the A45 corridor, six in south Cambridgeshire and two in east Cambridgeshire. My hon. Friend said that he thought that those applications were refused and that there were appeals. In fact, all the applications were called in by the Secretary of State for his determination. Clearly, he felt it important that all of them should be considered together, so that all the arguments could be heard together by an inspector and a view could be taken on their merits. As a consequence, major public inquiries were held during late 1990 and 1991.

In the event, all those specific proposals were rejected. Those on the A10 corridor were refused because all three failed to provide for the Department of Transport's requirement for a grade-separated junction together with 1 km of dual carriageway either side of that junction to give access to the A10. On the A45 corridor, which is of particular concern to my hon. Friend, the location at Great Common farm, which is west of Cambridge but south of the A45 in south Cambridgeshire, emerged as the clear preference of the inspector, but the specific proposals were rejected by the Secretary of State at that time because a business part associated with the proposal was considered, at 1 million sq ft, to be too large for that location.

That decision was reached at the end of a most careful consideration of the inspector's report prepared after many months of inquiry time. The public inquiry lasted 82 days—involving 74 sitting days and eight site visits—and heard evidence from 101 witnesses. No useful purpose would be served by yet a further inquiry into any site-specific proposals.

Since that decision was issued in March 1992, there have been further events which influence the possible siting of new settlements in south Cambridgeshire—including national planning policy guidance set out in planning policy guidance note 3, published in March 1992, two fresh planning applications, a consultation draft of the review to the structure plan, and the district council's own local plan.

The Government's policy on new settlements is set out in planning policy guidance note 3, published in March 1992 following the enactment of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. As my hon. Friend has made clear, in quoting my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, one criterion for any new settlement is that the proposal should have a clear expression of local preference supported by local planning authorities and should not go against the wishes of the local community. The guidance also states:

"The need to respect local preference means that specific proposals for new settlements should normally only be promoted through the district-wide local plan."

The south Cambridgeshire district-wide local plan being drawn up by the local council is the key to all these matters, and to my hon. Friend's concerns. That plan is well advanced and has reached the proposed modifications stage. It assumes that 3,000 new homes in its approved structure plan housing provision up to 2001 will be found in a new settlement in the A45 corridor. It also contains policies in respect of associated development, such as the 50 acres for business development.

Cambridgeshire county council has published the consultation draft of its review of the approved structure plan, extending the period covered up to 2006. It is clear that it takes a different view from that of the Secretary of State. In that draft it proposed, first, the deletion of the approved policy for a new settlement of 3,000 dwellings in the A45 corridor, whether west or east of Cambridge, but included the continuation of the policy for a new settlement in the A10 corridor, in either east or south Cambridgeshire, of 1,500 dwellings, but within the extended plan period to 2006.

The county council has clearly stated its opposition to an A45 new settlement. Also, by retaining the A10 new settlement at 1,500 dwellings rather than the 3,000 originally proposed, it is not giving any additional scope for any proposed development to pay for the infrastructure costs associated with the grade-separated junction to the A10, the expected contribution to the fen link road, water and drainage costs in this low-lying area, or to provide for a reasonable proportion of affordable housing. In short, the county council's proposals are unrealistic.

However, I am clear that PPG3 gives explicit guidance that it is the district-wide local plan which is the appropriate forum for making choices in respect of new settlements and that the Government's "plan-led" approach, as embodied in the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, should be seen to work through the decisions of the local district councils wherever possible.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has examined the south Cambridgeshire local plan very carefully. He and all Ministers concerned with planning matters in the Department are fully aware of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West. We have therefore considered the local plan carefully in relation to the new settlement proposals. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State is satisfied that its provisions are not such as to change significantly the circumstances in which these new settlement proposals are being considered since the decision letter of March 1992.

My hon. Friend is aware that our right hon. and learned Friend has come to the conclusion that there has not been a change in circumstances since March 1992, when his decision letter on the earlier proposals was issued, to justify his interventing in the present applications before South Cambridgeshire district council. My hon. Friend will, I am sure, appreciate that the Secretary of State could effectively intervene only by calling in those proposals and holding yet a further public inquiry. As I have already made clear, these matters have already been the subject of extensive, lengthy and detailed public inquiries and a further inquiry would have no significant benefits and would inevitably involve delay, uncertainty and costs.

Sir Anthony Grant: With regard to delay, a possible solution to the problem would be for the district council, as planning authority, to delay taking a decision on the matter until the county structure plan is resolved. I understand that that will occur next year. The matter has, admittedly, been going on for a long time. A little more delay might result in the district council concluding that the county is absolutely right, as I believe that it is, and the plan being rejected. We should not then have the absurd situation of an out-of-date planning permission being accepted.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend and I are absolutely at one in agreeing that it must be for South Cambridgeshire district council to take those decisions. I firmly believe that South Cambridgeshire district council is best placed to decide on whether there should be a new settlement, having particular regard to its own local plan policies, and to decide the best location for any such settlement.

My hon. Friend mentioned various elected members of the council. They are in a prime position to influence their authority's decision because it must be for the district council to judge whether the developer's proposals are satisfactory in all respects. It is not sufficient for a developer to say, "My development accords with various proposals by the Secretary of State in relation to the structure plan of some years ago." Many other issues must be considered—including many mentioned by my hon. Friend, such as flooding and road transport difficulties. The district council will quite properly have to take such matters into account.

The council is well placed to make such judgments. It has been closely involved in the philosophy of new settlements around Cambridge in recent years. It played a pivotal role during the public inquiries into the new settlement proposals and its own local plan is close to adoption. It would not be right for the council to postpone its local plan to await further modifications to the county structure plan. South Cambridgeshire councillors are well aware of all the options for satisfying the need for local housing, including those for affordable housing. Those councillors must take the necessary decisions.

[Mr. Baldry]

The Secretary of State is satisfied that South Cambridgeshire district council, as the local planning authority, is best placed to decide on these two outstanding planning applications. In so far as the council has raised queries with us about that approach, we have sought to answer in the fullest possible detail. I think that the council now has a full appreciation of the possibilities that are open to it. As I have said, it must be for the council to decide whether there should be a new settlement and the best location for it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 29 March 1993

TRANSPORT

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Norris: The details of the Department's market testing programme were published in the citizens charter —first report 1992. This programme is being carried forward by the Department and tendering is to commence shortly within the programme's current timetable.

The programme for the 12 months commencing in September 1993 will be announced within the time scales established with the Office of Public Services and Science; this is in common with other Departments.

The current market testing programme does not draw a distinction between professional services or otherwise.

Crossrail

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the new underground stations for the crossrail project will conform with the most recent safety standards for the Underground; what assessment he has made of the amount of land required to meet these standards other than that specified in the Bill as deposited; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: I am assured by the promoters that the new crossrail stations will all conform with up-to-date safety standards, and that the Bill specifies all land that is required to enable those standards to be met at those stations.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the original and subsequent forecasts used to evaluate the crossrail project were last updated; what assessment he has made of the cost-effectiveness of the project using the latest figures; and if they will be made public.

Mr. Norris: The most recently completed reappraisal of the original and subsequent analyses was that carried out in 1991. I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on 19 October 1992, Official Report, columns 210-11. A further reappraisal is in hand, and this will take into account the re-examination announced in the Budget on 16 March 1993.

Bus Deregulation (London)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the extension, the improvement and the reduction in price of bus services in London that would be gained by deregulation over and beyond the benefits of tendering and of the introduction of new services by London Buses.

Mr. Norris: We shall be setting out our views on the benefits of deregulating London's bus services compared with further route tendering in our memorandum to the Transport Select Committee, which will be submitted shortly.

Red Routes

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in implementing the red route network in London.

Mr. Norris: Following public consultation, the traffic director for London has today published his network plan, which provides the framework for the design and operation of the 315-mile priority red route network. Copies of the network plan have been placed in the Library.

Drivers, Vehicles and Operators Information Technology

Mr. Duncan-Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are his objectives for the privatisation of the DVOIT executive agency.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The key objectives for this sale are:

"1 To sell DVOIT as soon as is reasonably practicable.
2 To maximise the net receipts from the sale, subject to the achievement of the following other objectives:
(i) ensure that DOT and its agencies obtain, as part of the sale, contracts for the privision of IS/IT services appropriate to their business requirements, including vfm, quality, flexibility and security, at the lowest market price; and
(ii) to obtain reassurance that the purchaser should have the capacity to meet transferred liabilities and obligations."

Transport Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), of 18 March, Official Report, columns 339-40, what were the voting figures for each member state recorded in the meeting of the European Community Transport Council held on 15 March.

Mr. MacGregor: No formal votes were taken.

British Rail Pensions

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to ensure that full pension obligations are guaranteed by British Rail and any successors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: As I informed Standing Committee B on 23 March, I intend to introduce a new clause and schedule to the Railways Bill to cover pension arrangements after the privatisation of British Rail. This will provide the required security of pension rights for the members of British Rail's pension schemes.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding British Rail pension funds from (a) pensioners, (b) rail unions, (c) British Rail management and (d) prospective franchisees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: As I informed Standing Committee B on 23 March, we have received representations from many persons and bodies. We are still consulting on these issues, and we will announce the outcome once decisions have been taken.

Red Star Parcels

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to seek tenders for the sale of Red Star Parcels.

Mr. Freeman: The British Railways Board is handling the sale of Red Star Parcels. The sale will be advertised as soon as the relevant documentation has been completed.

British Rail

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received since 2 February concerning (a) the proposal for Railtrack to be independent of British Rail, (b) the principle of equal access by train operators to the rail infrastructure and (c) the numbers of different organisations working on the rail network under the privatisation proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on these matters.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he is considering concerning the lease or sale of rolling stock maintenance depots; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The options are still being considered and final conclusions have not yet been reached. The type of maintenance being carried out and the location of depots are important factors. Options under consideration include: independent sale; transfer of depots to franchisees; transfer to rolling stock companies.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what have been the results to date of British Rail's "organising for quality" initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that "organising for quality" has been valuable in establishing clear lines of responsibility and accountability within the larger BR organisation.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from (a) passengers' groups, (b) passenger transport authorities and (c) consumer groups since 2 February about the Railways Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have received a number of representations from various bodies, mainly in response to the consultation documents prepared by the Department. In addition, officials of my Department are engaged in a programme of meetings with representatives from the PTAs and PTEs in order to examine issues arising from the franchising of PTE-supported services.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what representations he has received from potential franchisees concerning proposals to allow Railtrack to own and control the railway network; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received concerning the future commercial development of rail stations; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what representations he has received concerning the likely length of franchises from (a) rolling stock companies and (b) potential operators; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have received various representations on these points, mainly in response to the consultation documents on franchising and on rolling stock which were issued to elicit views.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Mercer report concerning British Rail's freight operations will be published.

Mr. Freeman: The report contains much commercially sensitive information and will not be published, but the Government's conclusions based on Mercer's work, and incorporating its findings as appropriate, will be published as soon as the decisions have been taken.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to establish public sector leasing companies for rolling stock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: On 27 January, the Government issued a consultation document on the provision of rolling stock after privatisation. The document outlined a number of options, including the creation of public sector leasing companies which, in due course, would be offered for sale. These options are currently being discussed with the industry, financiers and other interested parties. I intend to make a policy statement after Easter in the light of these dicussions.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether Railtrack will still retain ownership of operational land if a rail station is sold or leased; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Railtrack will retain ownership of the freehold of stations. Stations may be leased by Railtrack to franchises or independent station operators.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who will be responsible for research and development, pursuant to his proposals in the Railways Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I hope to make an announcement after the Easter recess.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to protect land currently owned by British Rail and has potential for railway development, pursuant to his proposals in the Railways Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Land with a current or potential operational use will generally be transferred, on a freehold basis, to Railtrack. It is intended that non-operational land should remain with the Brtish Railways Board.

As at present, before any land is offered for disposal its potential future use for railway development will be fully explored.

Infrastructure Developments

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to secure private sector investment for major infrastructure developments in (a) the railway network and (b) roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We wish to open up new ways to make the best use of private sector skills, initiative and funds in the provision of transport infrastructure.

British Rail and the British Airports Authority have agreed in principle a joint venture to build a new rail express link between Paddington and Heathrow airport. The Department of Transport, with Samuel Montagu and Co and Union Railways, will be discussing with the private sector their participation in a joint venture on the channel tunnel rail link. In the case of crossrail, we are appointing consultants to advise us how best to ensure maximum private sector involvement.

The new Queen Elizabeth II bridge at Dartford, which opened in 1991 was privately financed. Construction of a privately financed second Severn bridge is under way and a concession agreement has been signed for the construction, using private finance, of the Birmingham northern relief road. My right hon. Friend plans to publish a Green Paper on the basis of charging for inter-urban roads and the scope for more private sector investment in their construction and operation.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, what recent representations he has received about eligibility for legal aid under his proposed changes to those just above income support level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have received a number of representations about various aspects of the changes to legal aid eligibility, including the position of those whose incomes are just above income support level. Assessments are based on disposable income and a generous range of allowances are offset against gross earnings.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the latest timetable for introduction of his proposed changes in eligibility for legal aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The regulations to introduce the changes have been laid before Parliament, and are due to come into effect on 12 April.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what has been the cost to the legal aid fund of providing assistance and representation in the four trials relating to alleged criminal activities concerning Guinness plc.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The legal aid cost to date of the Guinness trials is £1·7 million. The majority of this relates to the first trial, the costs of which are currently the subject of an appeal. The remainder consists of costs paid in respect of part of the second trial. The full costs of the second trial and the costs of the third and fourth trials have yet to be determined.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases have been brought before each convenient area of magistrates courts in the last available quarter, and for an equivalent period one and two years earlier.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

Information available centrally on persons prosecuted in magistrates courts during the last quarters of 1989 to 1991 by commission of the peace area and type of offence is given in the tables. Data for 1992 will not be available until autumn 1993.

Defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts for all offences by commission of the peace area and type of offence

1989 (quarter 4)

Commission of the peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Avon	2,152	2,574	4,044	8,770
Bedfordshire	1,073	1,758	2,058	4,889
Berkshire	900	1,523	2,298	4,621
Buckinghamshire	931	1,205	2,549	4,685
Cambridgeshire	1,311	1,367	2,390	5,068
Cheshire	2,004	1,946	4,241	8,191
Cleveland	1,464	2,093	1,783	5,340
Cornwall	568	362	1,121	2,051
Cumbria	1,126	1,791	2,497	5,414
Derbyshire	1,909	2,085	3,814	7,808
Devon	1,700	1,670	3,550	6,920
Dorset	1,198	967	2,493	4,658
Durham	1,389	1,765	2,369	5,523
Essex	2,700	3,801	6,313	12,814
Gloucestershire	1,093	1,247	2,376	4,716
Greater Manchester	7,053	7,945	11,914	26,912
Hampshire	3,148	3,104	5,981	12,233
Hereford and Worcester	1,220	945	3,589	5,754
Hertfordshire	1,657	1,882	3,586	7,125
Humberside	1,872	2,809	2,793	7,474

Commission of the peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Isle of Wight	190	158	355	703
Kent	1,604	2,310	4,236	8,150
Lancashire	3,278	3,808	6,139	13,225
Leicestershire	1,351	2,284	3,569	7,204
Lincolnshire	1,197	1,282	2,450	4,929
Inner London and City	7,713	12,310	11,241	31,264
London, North East	1,701	2,215	2,224	6,060
London, South East	636	1,119	1,312	3,067
London, South West	919	1,087	1,139	3,145
London, Middlesex	2,510	4,113	4,262	10,885
Merseyside	4,470	5,638	5,284	15,392
Norfolk	1,172	1,318	3,405	5,895
Northamptonshire	1,103	2,114	2,615	5,832
Northumberland	493	607	1,454	2,554
North Yorkshire	1,324	1,528	2,485	5,337
Nottinghamshire	3,184	2,847	3,158	9,189
Oxfordshire	757	883	1,984	3,624
Shropshire	688	971	1,287	2,946
Somerset	716	988	2,164	3,868
South Yorkshire	3,154	3,803	4,615	11,572
Staffordshire	2,146	3,000	5,051	10,197
Suffolk	1,111	1,310	2,565	4,986
Surrey	1,411	1,356	4,335	7,102
East Sussex	1,401	2,006	3,205	6,612
West Sussex	1,247	1,711	3,667	6,625
Tyne and Wear	3,212	4,339	2,873	10,424
Warwickshire	780	750	2,446	3,976
West Midlands	7,414	7,080	10,219	24,713
West Yorkshire	5,147	6,826	8,945	20,918
Wiltshire	875	1,359	2,437	4,671
England	99,372	123,779	182,880	406,031
Clwyd	970	902	2,044	3,916
Dyfed	588	1,072	1,181	2,841
Mid Glamorgan	1,405	1,810	2,038	5,253
South Glamorgan	1,516	1,790	1,380	4,686
West Glamorgan	1,064	1,592	1,696	4,352
Gwent	1,369	2,245	1,948	5,562
Gwynedd	590	490	1,124	2,204
Powys	209	305	534	1,048
Wales	7,711	10,206	11,945	29,862
ENGLAND AND WALES	107,083	133,985	194,825	435,893

Defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts for all offences by commission of the peace area and type of offence

1990 (quarter 4)

Commission of the peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Avon	2,103	2,890	4,174	9,167
Bedfordshire	1,182	1,740	2,565	5,487
Berkshire	1,454	1,614	2,940	6,008
Buckinghamshire	1,218	1,237	3,334	5,789
Cambridgeshire	1,429	1,789	2,684	5,902
Cheshire	1,950	1,924	4,387	8,261
Cleveland	1,509	1,959	1,977	5,445
Cornwall	562	485	1,353	2,400
Cumbria	1,172	1,603	2,616	5,391
Derbyshire	1,923	1,877	3,901	7,701
Devon	1,636	2,124	5,336	9,096
Dorset	1,255	1,025	2,537	4,817
Durham	1,474	1,789	2,030	5,293
Essex	2,926	3,312	7,133	13,371
Gloucestershire	1,006	1,133	2,477	4,616
Greater Manchester	6,887	8,173	12,902	27,962
Hampshire	3,170	3,216	7,504	13,890
Hereford and Worcester	1,298	1,292	3,054	5,644
Hertfordshire	1,530	2,022	3,467	7,019
Humberside	1,930	2,467	2,730	7,127
Isle of Wight	222	263	259	744
Kent	1,706	1,683	4,569	7,958

Commission of te peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Lancashire	3,527	3,984	8,429	15,940
Leicestershire	1,759	3,025	6,169	10,953
Lincolnshire	1,258	1,162	2,743	5,163
Inner London and City	7,961	11,005	12,053	31,019
London, North East	1,737	2,344	2,289	6,370
London, South East	777	677	1,164	2,618
London, South West	884	1,245	1,339	3,468
London, Middlesex	3,092	4,259	4,120	11,471
Merseyside	5,114	5,589	5,503	16,206
Norfolk	1,344	1,280	3,238	5,862
Northamptonshire	1,194	1,728	2,929	5,851
Northumberland	447	694	1,724	2,865
North Yorkshire	1,496	1,716	2,451	5,663
Nottinghamshire	3,399	3,522	3,406	10,327
Oxfordshire	862	1,060	2,722	4,644
Shropshire	784	1,144	1,175	3,103
Somerset	749	1,051	2,289	4,089
South Yorkshire	3,165	4,238	4,761	12,164
Staffordshire	2,517	2,704	4,974	10,195
Suffolk	1,206	1,285	2,482	4,973
Surrey	1,564	1,404	4,137	7,105
East Sussex	1,447	1,642	2,645	5,734
West Sussex	1,359	1,572	3,152	6,083
Tyne and Wear	3,060	4,485	3,236	10,781
Warwickshire	786	693	2,092	3,571
West Midlands	8,241	7,392	11,912	27,545
West Yorkshire	5,304	6,554	9,290	21,148
Wiltshire	1,073	1,632	4,189	6,894
England	105,648	124,703	200,542	430,893
Clwyd	994	1,016	2,108	4,118
Dyfed	769	1,037	1,205	3,011
Mid Glamorgan	1,642	1,896	2,318	5,856
South Glamorgan	1,701	2,443	1,583	5,727
West Glamorgan	1,093	1,487	1,655	4,245
Gwent	1,467	2,699	1,950	6,116
Gwynedd	596	445	1,270	2,311
Powys	240	325	511	1,076
Wales	8,502	11,348	12,610	32,460
Other (not recorded)	7	223	382	612
ENGLAND AND WALES	114,157	136,274	213,534	463,965

Defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts for all offences by commission of the peace area and type of offence

1991 (quarter 4)

Commission of the peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Avon	2,049	2,776	4,733	9,558
Bedfordshire	1,043	1,769	2,242	5,054
Berkshire	1,576	1,724	2,953	6,253
Buckinghamshire	1,083	1,119	2,797	4,999
Cambridgeshire	1,354	1,496	2,008	4,858
Cheshire	2,007	1,934	3,079	7,020
Cleveland	1,675	2,428	2,189	6,292
Cornwall	553	574	1,287	2,414
Cumbria	1,327	1,814	3,130	6,271
Derbyshire	1,903	2,310	3,684	7,897
Devon	1,869	2,359	5,178	9,406
Dorset	1,342	889	2,633	4,864
Durham	1,395	1,801	2,000	5,196
Essex	3,165	3,840	8,900	15,905
Gloucestershire	1,102	1,311	3,643	6,056
Greater Manchester	7,365	7,778	12,790	27,933
Hampshire	3,328	3,747	6,830	13,905
Hereford and Worcester	1,228	1,142	2,710	5,080
Hertfordshire	1,658	1,757	3,519	6,934
Humberside	2,000	2,690	2,632	7,322
Isle of Wight	252	168	323	743
Kent	1,101	461	4,045	5,607
Lancashire	3,253	3,229	6,866	13,348

Commission of te peace area	Indictable	Summary non-motoring	Summary motoring	All offences
Leicestershire	1,766	2,948	4,731	9,445
Lincolnshire	1,181	927	2,535	4,643
Inner London and City	8,121	12,599	18,581	39,301
London, North East	1,870	2,021	3,372	7,263
London, South East	574	172	1,510	2,256
London, South West	809	1,294	1,942	4,045
London, Middlesex	3,474	5,255	8,107	16,836
Merseyside	5,555	6,321	5,595	17,471
Norfolk	1,499	1,508	2,887	5,894
Northamptonshire	1,345	1,949	3,042	6,336
Northumberland	575	633	1,489	2,697
North Yorkshire	1,642	1,730	2,884	6,256
Nottinghamshire	3,428	4,632	2,819	10,879
Oxfordshire	860	1,070	2,504	4,434
Shropshire	752	1,300	1,404	3,456
Somerset	755	1,274	2,465	4,494
South Yorkshire	3,381	3,920	4,188	11,489
Staffordshire	2,553	2,791	5,208	10,552
Suffolk	1,328	1,326	2,814	5,468
Surrey	1,510	1,471	4,490	7,471
East Sussex	1,757	2,239	2,339	6,335
West Sussex	1,272	2,115	2,894	6,281
Tyne and Wear	3,559	4,537	3,184	11,280
Warwickshire	761	696	2,218	3,675
West Midlands	7,646	7,351	12,019	27,016
West Yorkshire	6,002	6,792	9,529	22,323
Wiltshire	1,168	1,475	2,547	5,190
England	108,771	129,462	207,468	445,701
Clwyd	1,030	1,096	2,083	4,209
Dyfed	809	1,178	1,436	3,423
Mid Glamorgan	1,663	1,610	1,674	4,947
South Glamorgan	1,822	2,126	1,850	5,798
West Glamorgan	1,214	1,782	1,846	4,842
Gwent	1,240	2,395	1,512	5,147
Gwynedd	385	227	1,185	1,797
Powys	194	346	524	1,064
Wales	8,357	10,760	12,110	31,227
Other (not recorded)	7	291	317	615
England and Wales	117,135	140,513	219,895	477,543

DEFENCE

Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence over which areas of his Department's land the Surrey Union hunt has a licence.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Surrey Union hunt has a licence to hunt over the Aldershot military lands and Surrey commons training areas.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the total receipts in 1991-92 from licences for fox hunts to hunt on his Department's land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Total receipts in 1991-92 from annual fox hunting licences were £729·85.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent Army personnel from mounted units are permitted to use Army horses and equipment to participate in (a) deer or stag hunting and (b) cub hunting in off-duty hours; whether a charge is made; and who is responsible for veterinary fees following an injury to a horse owned by his Department used for hunting by personnel in mounted units hunting in off-duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Personnel from mounted units are not permitted to use Army horses or equipment to hunt in off-duty hours.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances personnel from non-mounted units are permitted to hunt in duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Personnel from non-mounted units are not normally permitted to hunt in duty hours. In exceptional circumstances, however, and at the commanding officer's discretion, it may be permitted provided there is no detriment to military tasks.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Army personnel from the Royal Military College of Science are permitted to use his Department's equipment when hunting in duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is only one MOD horse stabled in the saddle club at the Royal Military College of Science and it is not used for hunting. No other MOD equipment is held by the saddle club.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provision is made for members of the armed forces from non-mounted units to use Army horses and equipment for fox hunting during duty or non-duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. When using Army horses, off-duty personnel from non-mounted units are required to pay for the hire of the horse, which covers the cost of veterinary services, and to take out comprehensive insurance. They would normally provide their own equipment.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details and dates of when the Household Cavalry participated in fox hunting, with which hunts and on how many occasions, since January 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information for the period October 1992 to February 1993 is set out in the table. No additional costs to public funds were incurred as a result of this activity.

Date	Number
The Belvoir Hunt
28 October 1992	1
31 October 1992	1
11 November 1992	1
14 November 1992	4
18 November 1992	1
21 November 1992	4
25 November 1992	4
2 December 1992	4
9 December 1992	3
12 December 1992	4
15 December 1992	2
19 December 1992	4
6 January 1993	1
9 January 1993	4
13 January 1993	3
16 January 1993	3
20 January 1993	3
23 January 1993	4
27 January 1993	3
30 January 1993	2
3 February 1993	2
6 February 1993	4
10 February 1993	3
13 February 1993	3
20 February 1993	4
24 February 1993	3
6 March 1993	4
The Quorn Hunt
16 November 1992	4
20 November 1992	4
23 November 1992	4
27 November 1992	2
30 November 1992	3
4 December 1992	2
7 December 1992	4
11 December 1992	4
14 December 1992	4
18 December 1992	4
21 December 1992	4
28 December 1992	2
8 January 1993	3
11 January 1993	4
15 January 1993	3
18 January 1993	3
22 January 1993	4
25 January 1993	2
29 January 1993	4
1 February 1993	3
5 February 1993	3
8 February 1993	2
12 February 1993	3
15 February 1993	4
19 February 1993	2
22 February 1993	3
26 February 1993	1
5 March 1993	4
8 March 1993	2
The Cottesmore Hunt
17 November 1992	1
24 November 1992	1
8 December 1992	1
15 December 1992	2
22 December 1992	2
29 December 1992	1
12 January 1993	2
19 January 1993	2
9 February 1993	2
23 February 1993	1

The remainder of the information requested is not immediately available, and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who meets the costs of the Army personnel attending the horses and driving horse boxes when the Household Cavalry attend hunts.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The salary costs of the Army personnel attending horses and driving horse boxes when the Household Cavalry attends hunts are met from public funds; however, they reflect the cost of maintaining mounted units in the Army and arise irrespective of whether soldiers and army horses take part in hunting. No additional costs to public funds are incurred.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in 1991 and 1992 the Royal Military Police have hunted; and with which hunts.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Royal Military Police do not hunt; but on three occasions in 1991 and three occasions in 1992, two non-commissioned officers and horses from the Royal Military Police mounted troop were deployed on duty at the request of and in support of the Surrey constabulary, who were policing hunts in Surrey which could have crossed Ministry of Defence land.

Shooting Rights

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the annual income received for the shooting seasons 1991-92 and 1992-93 from the sale of shooting days at the Bulford and Tidworth garrison shoot in Salisbury in Wiltshire.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department has granted a licence to the Bulford and Tidworth garrison shoot to shoot over land in Salisbury in Wiltshire, and does not sell individual shooting days.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what areas of his Department's land the HMS Heron sporting gun club has sport shooting rights; what charge is made for shooting rights; and which birds and mammals it is authorised to shoot.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The HMS Heron sporting gun club has licences to shoot over my Department's land at Merryfield airfield and Langport ranges. These licences authorise its members to shoot all unprotected birds and animals, including ground game, but excluding deer. The assessed charge is a matter of commercial confidentiality between my Department and the club.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers and men, and of what rank, took part in sport shooting at the Bulford and Tidworth garrison shoot in the 1991-92 and 1992-93 shooting season; and what was the total number of birds shot during these seasons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Ninety-one officers and 32 service men took part in the 1991-92 shoot, and 93 officers and 33 service men took part in the 1992-93 shoot. A breakdown of their ranks could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The total numbers of birds shot during these seasons were 3,223 and 2,871 respectively.

Belize

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom armed forces personnel are currently stationed in Belize; and what is the planned future level of deployment there.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Details of force levels in Belize were given in the House of Commons Defence Committee Eighth report, Session 1987-88. There have been no substantive changes since then. We keep all our commitments, and the associated force levels, under review.

United Arab Emirates

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military personnel are based in or seconded to the United Arab Emirates.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A number of personnel from Her Majesty's armed forces are currently providing military assistance to the United Arab Emirates. Details of the assistance provided and the number of personnel involved, are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United Arab Emirates.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether military personnel from the United Arab Emirates have undergone training in the United Kingdom in 1992 or 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Nationals from the United Arab Emirates are attending and have attended a range of developmental and technical training courses in British military establishments. Details of the training, including numbers involved, are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United Arab Emirates.

Falkland War (Troops' Behaviour)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on discussions he has had during his visit to the Falkland Islands on alleged misbehaviour of British troops in 1982.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend did not enter into any discussions on this subject during his recent trip to the Falkland Islands. He has referred the matter to the Attorney-General, and the allegations are currently being investigated by the Metropolitan police.

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make it his practice to publish the amount of payments which have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the United States Government in respect of each British nuclear weapons test since 1979.

Mr. Aitken: No. In accordance with the policy of successive Governments, it is not in the national interest to publish costs associated with the testing of British nuclear weapons.

Amphibious Helicopter Carrier

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the landing platform helicopter.

Mr. Aitken: The amphibious helicopter carrier (LPH) remains in the defence programme. We have now invited the tenderers to clarify their bids, which we will evaluate against our normal technical and value for money criteria. We expect to place an order later this year, subject to the results of the competition.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Executive Agencies

Mr. Bates: To ask the Attorney-General what further progress he has made towards establishing executive agencies in his Department under the Government's next steps initiative; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: On 18 February 1992, my predecessor informed the House, Official Report, columns 71-72, that the Treasury Solicitor's department property division had been selected as a candidate for executive agency status. I am pleased to announce that I shall be establishing the Government property lawyers as an Executive Agency on 1 April, as envisaged by my predecessor. I will ensure that the chief executive has clear responsibilities for improvements in efficiency, effectiveness and quality of service. These responsibilities will be set out in the agency's framework document, which will be published and copies placed in the Library.

Targets are set out in the agency's strategic plan and will form part of its annual business plans. An annual report and accounts will be produced, and copies also put in the Library.

The Government Property Lawyers Agency is at present the property division of the Treasury Solicitor's department. It has about 130 staff based in Taunton. The agency will continue to provide conveyancing and lands advisory services to Government Departments and other publicly funded bodies but on a more commercial basis. It will have to compete with private firms of solicitors for the services it provides. The establishment of the Government property lawyers as an executive agency will provide the appropriate structure and discipline to enhance its ability to supply a more efficient, economic and effective delivery of conveyancing and lands advisory services to its clients. I have approved the appointment of Mr. Anthony Osborne, the present head of the property division, to be the agency's first chief executive.

The key performance targets are as follows:

For 1993-94: to recover the full operating cost of the agency; to achieve 6,000 new instructions from its clients; to increase the number of completions effected to 5,910; to maintain and improve the quality of service, in particular by keeping the proportions of cases completed satisfactorily (ie without requiring rectification by reason of any fault of the agency) on or before the target date at or above the current rate of 99·5 per cent.

Over the three-year period of the strategic plan: to achieve a steady reduction in operating costs of an average of 2 per cent. per year in real terms.

I wish the chief executive and his staff every success for the future.

NATIONAL FINANCE

National Debt

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the outstanding aggregate national debt in 1979 and its lowest level between then and the present day, together with the current level and that envisaged at the end of the 1997-98 financial year under the estimates of table 1 of his leaflet, "The Budget in Brief".

Mr. Lamont: Chart 2·5 in the 1993-94 "Financial Statement and Budget Report" shows data and projections up to end 1997-98 for the ratio of net public sector debit to GDP. This ratio fell from 49½ per cent. at end 1978-79 to 27¼ per cent. at end 1990-91, but has since risen to an estimated 33¼ per cent. at end 1992-93. The PSBR projections in table 1 of "The Budget in Brief" imply a ratio of 49¾ per cent. at end 1997-98.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 767, if he will publish figures on the same basis showing expenditure on domestic fuel by region.

Mr. Nelson: The sample size used to derive the information given in my answer of 26 February in column 767 is not large enough to provide reliable regional estimates.

Departmental Courses

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by his Departments to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Nelson: I regret that this information is not held in the form requested and could be made available for a five-year period only at disproportionate expense.

Personal Tax Allowances

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of additional taxpayers in 1993-94 as a result of the freeze in personal tax allowances.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of people in each region brought into paying income tax as a consequence of the freeze in personal allowances.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates show that about 300,000 more people will pay tax in 1993-94 under Budget proposals compared with indexation of personal allowances. I regret that information is not available on a regional basis.

Family Expenditure Survey

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were interviewed in his Department's current family expenditure survey; and if he will break down the figures by social class.

Mr. Nelson: Processing of the second half of the current (1992) family expenditure survey is not yet complete. In the first half of 1992, 7,160 people were interviewed in 3,761 households. In 1991, 13,329 people were interviewed in 7,056 households. Figures of the social class of the head of these households are as follows:

	1992 Quarters 1 and 2	1991
Numbers of households interviewed	3,761	7,056
Social Class I (Professional, etc. occupations)	190	375
Social Class II (Managerial and Technical occupations)	657	1,309
Social Class III N (Skilled occupations—non-manual)	297	562
Social Class III M (Skilled occupations—manual)	676	1,296
Social Class IV (Partly skilled occupations)	335	567
Social Class V (Unskilled occupations)	117	189
Other Heads of Household (e.g. Armed Forces)	17	38
Unallocated (e.g. retired, unoccupied)	1,472	2,720

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what conclusions have been reached by the investigations to date into the collapse of BCCI on local authority investment practice.

Mr. Portillo: The scrutiny of local authorities' financial practices is the responsibility of statutory independent auditors appointed by the Audit Commission in England and Wales and the Accounts Commission in Scotland. The Government keep under review the general controls that they have upon local authorities' borrowing and investment activities.

Tax Havens

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Finance Act 1981 to prevent the use of company ownership transfers from the United Kingdom to tax havens as a means of avoiding liability for capital gains tax and maintaining the possibility of recovering outstanding tax on United Kingdom dividends at a later stage.

Mr. Dorrell: I have noted this suggestion. There are existing provisions in this area, which were strengthened in 1991, but I will be glad to review their effectiveness in the light of any particular transaction which the hon. Member has in mind.

Tax-immune Foreigners

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the estimated numbers of tax-immune foreigners in the United Kingdom for each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: On the assumption that this refers to individuals who are liable for tax in this country only on their overseas income and gains to the extent that they are remitted here, I am afraid that information is not available on which to base an estimate.

VAT

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he makes of the numbers of businesses in East Anglia which will be helped by the value added tax administrative changes he announced in the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The VAT administrative changes announced in the Budget are generally beneficial to businesses, especially small businesses, which have welcomed them warmly. They can be expected to help many of the 80,000 businesses registered for VAT in East Anglia.

Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect he expects his changes to petroleum revenue tax announced in the Budget to have on the gas and oil industries both onshore and offshore in the southern North sea sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: To the extent that existing production in the southern basin is within the charge to petroleum revenue tax, doubling the investors' marginal share of profit should encourage investment in, and extend the life of, fields. Removing the burden of PRT from fields currently without development consent will both increase after-tax costs and increase after-tax profits that would have been subject to PRT, so companies will have greater incentives to undertake commercially-viable investment.

The measure involving a small change to PRT, but principally ending liability to gas levy in certain circumstances, is a direct response to an industry request and should remove a disincentive to significant further production. Taken together, those measures clearly improve incentives for development investment, which should prove beneficial to the offshore industry and its onshore support.

ECOFIN

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Chelmsford of 18 March, Official Report, columns 327-8, what were the voting figures for each member state recorded in the meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council held on 15 March.

Sir John Cope: No formal votes were taken at the meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council on 15 March. There was no opposition to the agreements reported in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 18 March at column 327-8.

Paymaster General's Office

Sir Peter Hordern: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for the future of the Paymaster General's Office; and what key targets have been set for 1993-94.

Sir John Cope: The Paymaster General's Office will become a next steps agency with effect from 1 April 1993. Copies of the Paymaster General's office framework document and abridged versions of the corporate and business plans have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

I have set the Paymaster General's Office the following key targets for 1993-94:

1. Meeting customers' requirements
   - 1.1 Respond to 85 per cent. of pensions correspondence and process associated amendments within five working days of receipt and the remainder within 20 working days of receipt.
   - 1.2 Process 98 per cent. of pensions amendments without error.
   - 1.3 Meet the banking transaction timetable, agreed with customers, 95 per cent. of the time and never exceed the timetable by more than one day.
   - 1.4 Develop a quality indicator for the banking service by 31 March 1994.
   - 1.5 Meet the agreed timetable, for sending financial information to the Treasury, 95 per cent. of the time and never exceed the timetable by more than one day.

2. Recovery of full costs
   Recover the full costs of running the agency, except for banking and allied services.

3. Reduction in unit costs
   - 3.1 Reduce by 1 per cent., over the year, the average unit cost (in real terms) of paying a pension.
   - 3.2 Obtain a 1 per cent. improvement, over the year, in the average unit costs index for processing banking transactions.

Council Tax

Mr. Straw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many changes to council tax banding valuations have so far been allowed by the Valuation Agency in advance of the general appeals period of 1 April to 30 November; what is the total number of such changes expected to have been processed by 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 23 March 1993]: The total number of changes to the draft valuation lists since they were deposited with billing authorities in early December 1992 to the end of February 1993 is 174,236 in England and Wales. It is estimated that some 200,000 changes may have been made by 1 April 1993.

Amendments to the draft valuation lists result from both notification of the listing officers by the billing authorities of changes to existing, new or demolished dwellings, and from inquiries from the public following the publication of the draft valuation list.

No statistics are available to distinguish between the number of changes made following notification from billing authorities and inquiries from the public.

GDP

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide a table showing the gross domestic product of each region since 1987-88 (a) in cash terms and (b) in 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The latest available information was published in the December 1992 issue of "Economic Trends", a copy of which is available in the Library. Regional gross domestic product figures are calculated only at current prices, as there are no regional price deflators available.

Care Homes

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that the viability of registered care homes affording generalist provision for single homeless people is not put at risk by the implementation of the community care legislation on 1 April.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply.

From 1 April local social services authorities will be responsible for arranging residential care for people who need it, whether or not they have a settled way of life. The money that the Department of Social Security would have spent supporting single homeless people in residential care homes is included within the resources being transferred to local authorities. We have made clear in guidance authorities' responsibilities for this group of people. It is for authorities themselves to decide how they spend their resources.

HEALTH

Charitable Trust Funds

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 18 November 1992, Official Report, column 280, if she is now able to provide details from 1991-92 accounts of charity trust fund balances; and if she will state by health authority and health trust in England the charitable trust fund (a) income, (b) expenditure and (c) fund balances at 31 March 1992.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is shown in the table.

NHS charitable trust funds 1991-92

	Total income £	Total expenditure £	Total capital reserves as at 31 March 1992 £
Northern RHA	37,306	40,191	403,196
Hartlepool	106,680	93,092	218,955
North Tees	437,063	252,459	690,772
South Tees	1,361,321	540,624	1,660,114
East Cumbria	478,407	454,056	1,179,052
South Cumbria	419,508	594,992	610,198
West Cumbria	424,106	226,497	634,757
Darlington	303,816	224,549	1,424,155
Durham	157,483	164,286	328,469
North West Durham	134,721	103,750	213,704
South West Durham	285,780	310,688	444,080
Northumberland	501,013	851,363	1,353,052
Gateshead	154,080	159,520	314,886
North Tyneside	160,968	96,518	337,500
South Tyneside	224,749	145,990	246,296
Sunderland	856,824	781,244	1,193,623
Northern Region Total	6,043,625	5,017,799	11,252,807
Yorkshire RHA	207,883	152,013	947,645
Hull	558,608	442,629	1,256,433
East Yorkshire	392,129	372,860	463,235
Grimsby	161,957	146,860	301,702
Scunthorpe	228,647	255,250	359,127
Northallerton	192,221	141,542	426,904
York	573,691	443,939	1,212,757
Scarborough	468,155	364,286	757,150
Harrogate	356,752	470,425	1,451,158
Bradford	498,703	371,582	1,410,426
Airedale	394,097	316,628	709,376
Calderdale	133,615	83,650	497,277
Huddersfield	322,379	384,050	1,177,623
Dewsbury	230,202	282,470	217,642
Leeds	514,575	354,551	2,001,180
Wakefield	643,714	533,187	877,239
Pontefract	219,748	115,499	409,163
Yorkshire Region Total	6,097,076	5,211,421	14,476,039
Trent RHA	34,040	23,584	509,924
North Derbyshire	884,179	540,776	1,642,598
South Derbyshire	1,317,684	1,244,573	3,874,527
Leicestershire	2,385,040	2,101,954	6,596,662
North Lincolnshire	410,378	345,853	948,273

	Total income	Total expenditure	Total capital reserves as at 31 March 1992
	£	£	£
South Lincolnshire	348,645	210,604	987,781
Bassetlaw	161,202	143,261	234,439
Central Nottinghamshire	672,413	1,341,974	1,621,621
Nottingham	1,013,890	995,400	2,235,123
Barnsley	381,336	333,961	1,053,878
Doncaster	264,516	207,109	482,289
Rotherham	463,253	437,732	895,723
Sheffield	2,489,582	1,828,328	3,780,100
Trent Region Total	10,826,158	9,755,109	24,862,938
East Anglian RHA	86,399	49,407	171,291
Cambridge	1,656,888	1,745,798	4,259,125
Peterborough	1,480,153	593,730	1,902,037
West Suffolk	498,942	477,985	1,060,531
East Suffolk	913,719	920,221	1,477,756
Norwich	1,571,675	1,297,252	6,711,654
Great Yarmouth	669,315	731,857	1,631,660
West Norfolk and Wisbech	408,365	310,410	1,000,624
Huntingdon	1,093,261	1,076,424	1,498,515
East Anglian Region Total	8,378,717	7,203,084	19,713,193
North West Thames RHA	111,798	27,004	1,245,835
North Bedfordshire	249,713	217,778	802,777
South Bedfordshire	772,149	604,874	6,850,728
East Hertfordshire	193,381	180,722	294,380
North West Hertfordshire	583,005	558,499	1,680,343
South West Hertfordshire	411,023	372,809	1,497,304
Barnet	371,483	416,828	590,186
Barrow	699,846	548,051	1,135,659
Hillingdon	1,065,270	1,176,775	769,209
Hounslow and Spelthorne	519,201	572,708	1,027,077
Ealing	397,435	130,349	701,378
Riverside	204,175	319,226	252,854
Parkside	207,403	137,882	1,836,191
North West Thames Region Total	5,785,882	5,263,499	18,683,921
North East Thames RHA	75,159	16,131	504,163
Basildon	434,192	312,971	767,349
Mid Essex	396,138	295,402	843,785
North East Essex	402,591	307,383	1,766,061
West Essex	629,719	502,043	824,518
Southend	51,743	48,862	247,349
Barking/Havering/Brentwood	714,838	504,726	1,219,804
Hampstead	114,203	65,883	272,762
City and Hackney	573,430	308,745	993,951
Newham	245,627	215,530	853,704
Enfield	124,721	139,893	66,758
Haringey	44,900	29,207	149,748
Redbridge	409,154	472,264	513,256
Waltham Forest	553,165	566,247	1,065,486
Bloomsbury and Islington	695,909	621,839	4,904,533
North East Thames Region Total	5,465,489	4,507,126	14,993,227
South East Thames RHA	906,531	752,925	2,536,377
Brighton	1,442,387	1,362,934	2,786,429
Eastbourne	732,093	1,415,860	5,539,408
Hastings	369,551	257,679	625,829
South East Kent	506,903	460,096	669,241
Canterbury and Thanet	1,174,349	1,116,324	1,960,503
Dartford and Gravesham	280,085	229,967	763,769
Maidstone	289,108	261,487	859,826
Medway	311,436	407,419	1,045,818
Tunbridge Wells	522,351	480,926	1,312,682
Bexley	425,864	390,513	802,547
Greenwich	568,170	1,097,213	2,190,993
Bromley	828,636	675,352	831,991
Lewisham and Southwark	70,941	15,874	716,047
South East Thames Region Total	8,430,405	8,924,569	22,641,460
South West Thames RHA	80,459	143,490	515,738

	Total income	Total expenditure	Total capital reserves as at 31 March 1992
	£	£	£
North West Surrey	453,013	343,897	1,790,050
West Surrey/North East Hampshire	404,856	593,280	554,588
South West Surrey	570,403	515,087	1,577,867
Mid Surrey	210,262	181,868	494,854
East Surrey	804,419	712,467	1,239,190
Chichester	268,248	298,155	967,636
Mid Downs	326,388	243,763	1,280,200
Worthing	391,143	237,407	471,864
Croydon	311,344	195,399	1,506,654
Kingston & Esher	175,725	135,138	635,492
Richmond Twickenham & Roehampton	76,882	32,085	436,708
Wandsworth	242,218	215,462	1,770,282
Sutton & Merton	194,179	83,322	1,279,995
South West Region Total	4,509,539	3,930,821	14,501,118
Wessex RHA	89,580	40,802	1,054,546
East Dorset	1,422,407	1,224,539	3,590,101
West Dorset	32,592	—	351,629
Portsmouth & South East Hampshire	1,621,902	1,292,554	4,509,323
Southampton & South West Hampshire	3,174,357	2,130,265	2,837,002
Winchester	627,546	586,406	1,238,502
Basingstoke & North Hampshire	354,013	292,739	1,042,287
Salisbury	958,418	831,538	3,205,956
Swindon	845,234	600,982	1,957,911
Bath	1,133,723	1,190,861	1,406,638
Isle of Wight	661,296	392,068	1,297,421
Wessex Region Total	10,921,068	8,582,754	22,491,316
Oxford RHA	27,216	64,192	298,431
East Berkshire	426,456	299,798	691,493
West Berkshire	847,828	778,377	1,614,048
Aylesbury	1,411,488	1,058,712	1,579,347
Wycombe	763,232	564,361	868,238
Milton Keynes	304,841	220,298	426,241
Kettering	1,079,692	883,447	1,114,259
Northampton	892,045	805,532	2,477,647
Oxford	5,731,653	4,313,476	10,865,195
Oxford Region Total	11,484,451	8,988,193	19,934,899
South Western RHA	39,664	30,918	261,857
Bristol & District	1,616,399	1,504,247	3,960,984
Cornwall	616,791	555,687	927,229
Exeter	979,456	938,904	1,433,056
North Devon	18,397	46,721	83,350
Plymouth	983,032	893,916	1,723,576
Cheltenham	1,817	425	13,887
Gloucester	1,179,012	942,596	1,264,001
Somerset	604,312	639,672	1,375,488
South Western Region Total	6,038,880	5,553,086	11,043,428
West Midlands RHA	169,765	156,024	614,697
Bromsgrove	151,642	161,477	405,932
Hereford	1,195,477	531,675	1,671,876
Kidderminster	230,127	220,035	458,164
Worcester	338,387	387,657	766,632
Salop	1,471,418	1,317,795	2,142,910
Mid Staffordshire	580,959	865,940	1,067,287
North Staffordshire	961,983	787,667	3,432,627
South East Staffordshire	301,693	181,352	1,173,033
South Warwickshire	907,294	336,689	1,482,508
East Birmingham	1,303,629	1,113,730	2,020,685
North Birmingham	612,983	616,310	686,609
West Birmingham	1,378,453	1,182,094	2,374,635
Coventry	959,605	976,002	1,629,905
Dudley	798,466	882,845	1,536,450
Sandwell	345,526	352,015	612,673
Solihull	228,988	253,784	934,185
Walsall	80,158	92,877	161,436
Wolverhampton	480,452	617,537	1,358,510
North East Warwickshire	416,405	308,520	786,468
South Birmingham	1,222,234	853,961	1,926,344

	Total income	Total expenditure	Total capital reserves as at 31 March 1992
	£	£	£
West Midlands Region Total	14,131,744	11,695,766	27,243,566
Mersey RHA	1,125,689	52,744	1,470,317
Chester	258,632	213,431	632,182
Crewe	305,653	376,872	828,133
Halton	58,051	61,688	88,688
Macclesfield	219,557	230,881	582,909
Warrington	161,968	167,061	259,537
St. Helens and Knowsley	441,380	453,314	717,885
Southport and Formby	219,900	353,182	433,402
South Sefton	573,009	359,988	1,230,314
Wirral	1,186,835	616,349	2,399,798
Mersey Region Total	4,550,674	2,885,510	8,643,165
North Western RHA	56,201	10,042	600,220
Lancaster	497,805	453,060	683,320
Blackpool, Wyre and Fylde	930,311	959,527	1,362,766
Preston	732,498	369,563	1,457,944
Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley	456,047	404,571	2,165,241
Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale	363,963	299,096	711,806
West Lancashire	266,891	299,815	442,433
Chorley and South Ribble	66,625	81,190	102,901
Bolton	278,822	863,022	393,830
Bury	170,004	140,173	316,288
North Manchester	299,778	255,683	1,267,790
Central Manchester	149	152	(4)
South Manchester	3,162,853	2,993,118	4,318,515
Oldham	323,427	247,811	614,962
Rochdale	204,434	155,158	490,647
Salford	2,623,689	2,345,722	3,333,114
Stockport	472,128	430,431	886,384
Tameside and Glossop	395,682	387,403	1,031,041
Trafford	349,161	258,370	649,835
Wigan	327,395	360,824	666,380
North Western Region Total	11,977,863	10,814,731	21,495,399
St. Bartholomew's	8,745,436	9,326,739	61,594,568
London Hospital	4,472,814	3,844,624	17,657,547
Royal Free Hospital	4,367,877	3,989,874	10,900,046
University College Hospital	1,596,300	1,026,716	6,694,888
Middlesex Hospital	3,143,572	5,080,477	11,855,573
Charing Cross Hospital	1,415,906	1,433,516	6,762,681
St. George's Hospital	1,983,204	1,490,294	9,287,827
Westminster Hospital	1,366,459	1,176,170	9,793,011
St. Mary's Hospital	1,551,427	833,069	15,768,335
Guy's Hospital	12,517,034	16,917,995	47,308,026
King's College Hospital	1,942,221	2,189,175	8,897,575
St. Thomas's Hospital	16,782,339	11,651,260	69,882,489
Hammersmith Hospital	1,303,197	1,277,862	4,689,652
Leeds Teaching Hospital	860,062	993,816	4,754,133
Sheffield	895,600	1,015,691	8,141,192
Bristol	1,864,038	2,033,252	7,935,074
Birmingham	6,648,450	6,485,447	16,397,762
Newcastle University	1,102,572	560,816	8,745,826
Nottingham University	993,131	964,845	3,298,771
Royal National Throat/Nose/Ear Hospital	133,643	100,483	1,435,747
Moorfields	1,311,054	391,958	8,232,011
St. Peters	141,429	645,524	377,709
Hospital for Sick Children	15,372,597	8,004,541	28,309,099
Queen Charlottes	948,420	680,529	2,342,604
Special Trustees Total	91,458,762	82,094,673	371,062,144
National Hospital for Neurology and Neurosurgery	905,112	3,093,876	2,335,233
Bethlem Royal and Maudsley Hospital	2,179,543	2,627,744	20,682,594
Royal Brompton National Heart and Lung Hospital	3,084,856	6,654,076	3,876,225
Royal Marsden Hospital	5,468,010	5,219,346	17,275,264
Hammersmith and Queen Charlotte	14,032	5,011	137,897
Eastman Dental Hospital	23,706	609	46,335
Special Health Authority Total	11,675,259	17,600,662	44,333,548

	Total income £	Total expenditure £	Total capital reserves as at 31 March 1992 £
The Freeman group of hospitals NHS trust	815,564	577,970	1,504,696
Leeds General Infirmary and Associated hospitals trust	805,251	424,913	1,416,119
St. James' University hospital trust	985,479	402,819	2,724,866
Northern General hospital Sheffield NHS trust	741,109	571,535	980,324
Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Montagu hospital Mexborough trust	568,220	280,213	763,244
Anglian Harbours NHS trust	827,847	57,662	730,434
Southend Health Care Services trust	572,734	560,936	997,977
London hospital and associated community services trust	43,411	20,676	322,521
North Middlesex hospital NHS trust	76,905	90,424	265,962
North Hertfordshire NHS trust	668,885	134,004	1,868,972
Mount Vernon hospital NHS trust	482,593	457,437	637,833
Hillingdon hospital NHS trust	536,657	707,406	549,429
Central Middlesex hospital	352,216	338,864	599,298
Lifecare trust	35,807	50,012	123,751
Kingston hospital NHS trust	357,038	219,235	1,149,789
The Homewood NHS trust	92,225	64,431	141,540
St. Helier NHS trust	255,941	225,650	1,122,580
Croydon Community Health trust	6,722	8,080	12,018
Epsom Healthcare trust	295,058	190,118	389,057
Weston area health trust	346,859	463,648	696,249
East Gloucestershire NHS trust	593,435	479,897	1,284,136
Cornwall Community Healthcare trust	249,628	276,630	238,126
United Bristol Healthcare trust	154,329	292,353	935,645
Cornwall and Isles of Scilly mental handicap services trust	10,307	7,339	32,090
South Devon Healthcare NHS trust	728,297	1,125,933	933,802
The Royal National hospital for Rheumatic diseases trust	121,973	31,158	166,867
West Dorset mental health services trust	7,674	12,642	(4,968)
West Dorset community services trust	79,000	53,000	14,000
Nuffield orthopaedic centre NHS trust	79,054	80,721	260,320
First community health trust	19,710	7,411	39,393
Mid Staffordshire mental health trust	10,128	10,892	68,235
The Rugby NHS trust	77,294	50,932	274,617
The Walsall hospitals trust	341,324	287,489	642,080
St. Helens and Knowsley hospital services trust	415,097	421,530	618,762
Cheshire and Halton community trust	7,170	5,552	13,815
Central Manchester NHS trust	3,047,234	2,124,033	5,969,491
Christie hospital trust	10,190,119	9,622,729	11,293,851
Lincolnshire ambulance service and health transport service trust	15,033	2,158	26,359
North Devon Healthcare trust	580,872	701,992	1,604,685
NHS Trust Totals	24,889,781	21,040,204	41,407,965

Sources:

(a) 1991-92 annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England together with those of special trustees and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals.

(b) 1991-92 annual accounts of first wave NHS trusts in England.

Notes:

1. The figures are provisional in that they are subject to audit by the National Audit Office.
2. The figures of total income do not include gifts, donations and legacies of capital to be held in perpetuity. These receipts are, however, reflected in the total capital reserves which include the balances of funds to be held in perpetuity and represent the excess of the total assets (ie. property, investments, stock, debtors and cash) over the total liabilities (mainly creditors).
3. A number of health authorities do not include statements for NHS charitable trust funds within their annual accounts as their funds are separately managed and accounted for by special trustees. Similarly, during 1991-92 some district health authorities and first wave NHS trusts deferred the transfer of responsibility for manageing and accounting for relevant charitable funds.

Health Promotion Clinics

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health promotion clinics were functioning at 1 June 1992; and if she will list their cost and a breakdown of the various services and therapies being provided through those clinics at that time.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the number of clinics as at 1 June 1992 was not collected centrally. The number of claims made by partnerships in England for health promotion clinic sessions for the year ending 1 April 1992 was 1,331,277. The forecast total expenditure on health promotion clinics for the 1992-93 financial year is £74·448 million.

There is no central breakdown of the services and therapies provided through health promotion clinics.

Complementary Therapies

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the standards, qualifications and levels of competence of GPs providing extra services in the form of one or more of the non-conventional/complementary therapies are assessed and monitored; and by whom.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioners are required by their terms of service to render all necessary and appropriate medical services to their patients. When GPs provide services personally it is for them to ensure that they are appropriately qualified and competent to do so. GPs are responsible for the actions of staff they employ and their terms of service require them to be satisfied that employees are appropriately qualified and competent. GPs can obtain advice on qualifications and competence from their family health services authorities or the relevant associations which represent a particular complementary therapy.

Foot Surgery

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual cost to the national health service of providing foot surgery; and what assessment has been made of the effect on this of imposing value added tax on children's footwear.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Value added tax is not charged on young children's footwear.

Hepatitis B

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has about the cost to the NHS of screening a patient for hepatitis B.

Mr. Sackville: Such costs vary between laboratories. The cost of materials for a basic screen is about £4, and a final cost including overheads is likely to be between £10 and £20.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were found to be positive for hepatitis B antigen following screening as a result of being treated by the surgeon in Stafford.

Mr. Sackville: In addition to the original case at Stafford which led to the investigations, one further patient has been found at Stafford with evidence of recent hepatitis B infection, together with several others who show evidence of hepatitis B in their past history. Investigations are continuing to determine whether any of these infections can be shown to be linked to hospital treatment.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost of recall of patients for hepatitis B screening treated by the surgeon in Stafford, both at his current and previous hospitals of employment.

Mr. Sackville: I understand the estimated cost to date of screening patients from Stafford district general hospital is £1,100.

The cost of screening patients from the Crosshouse hospital in Kilmarnock and the Ayrshire central hospital in Irvine is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she has taken to offer compensation to patients who have acquired hepatitis from their surgeons.

Mr. Sackville: None. Compensation in relation to alleged failures in hospital treatment is a matter to be considered by the relevant health authority or trust.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has as to the number and percentage of surgeons who have been vaccinated against hepatitis B.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) on 24 March at column 619.

Angina

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the conclusion published in 1992 in her Department's "Health Trends" that waiting time of up to six months was acceptable for surgical treatment of angina remains Government policy; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The Department's policy is that provision of cardiac services is the responsibility of health authorities taking account of local health needs and it is the responsibility of clinicians to determine the priority of treatment for patients in their care. Articles in "Health Trends" represent the opinions of the authors and not necessarily those of the Department.

Eileen House

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 437, how many beds there are in the small flat at Eileen house; if she will list the other major items of furniture there; who is allowed access to the flat; and how much was spent refurbishing the flat.

Mr. Sackville: The flat is used as offices and contains office furniture: desks, seats and file storage units. It contains no beds. Departmental staff have access to these offices, which have not been refurbished.

London Implementation Group

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list a full timetable for the work of the London implementation group on (a) changes to acute services and (b) the review of individual specialities; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will make a statement on the progress being made by the London implementation group on the future of (a) the Royal Brompton hospital, (b) the Royal Marsden hospital, (c) the Charing Cross hospital, (d) Queen Charlotte's hospital, (e) the Royal National throat, nose and ear hospital and (f) the hospital for tropical diseases.

Dr. Mawhinney: The timetable for planning change in the inner-London acute sector was set out in our policy document "Making London Better". We have asked the London implementation group, working with the Thames regional health authorities and local purchasers and providers, to take forward the necessary studies, option appraisals and consultations according to this timetable.

Primary Care (London)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list a detailed breakdown of the distribution of the funds for 1993-94 proposed for the improvement of primary care in London in her document, "Making London Better"; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: £40 million is available for primary care capital and revenue developments in the London initiative zone 1993-94. Local proposals for using these funds have been developed under the guidance of the Thames regions and will be considered by the London implementation group's primary health care forum.

Applications have been invited against the sum of £7·5 million over three years available for voluntary sector developments in the LIZ area. Initial applications are expected by the end of April and will be considered by the Primary Health Care Forum. Further details of the arrangements for the London primary health care challenge fund will be published shortly.

Electoral Roll (Newbury)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 24 March, what are the district councils which cover part or all of the parliamentary constituency of Newbury; what are the latest available estimates from the Registrar General of Populations of those aged 17 years and over, plus 63 per cent. of those aged 16 years for those district council areas; and what are their equivalent electoral registration figures.

Mr. Sackville: The Newbury parliamentary constituency comprises most of Newbury district (with 81,106 of the total of 105,336 parliamentary electors on the 1993 registers) and a small part of Basingstoke and Deane district (with 833 of the 111,452 parliamentary electors in 1993), this information is shown in the table. The latest population estimates available relate to mid-1991. The estimates for residents aged 17 and over, plus 63 per cent. of those aged 16, at that date are 108,900 in the whole of Newbury district and 114,600 in the whole of Basingstoke and Deane district.

Parliamentary electors

	Ward electorates
	1991	1992	1993	Present constituency
Newbury district[1]	103,388	104,466	105,336
1. Aldermaston	725	719	716	Newbury CC
2. Basildon	1,820	1,859	1,848	Newbury CC
	167	166	163	Reading West CC
	1,987	2,025	2,011
3. Beenham	2,090	2,069	2,081	Newbury CC
4. Bradfield	1,749	1,776	1,814	Newbury CC
	65	80	89	Reading West CC
	1,814	1,856	1,903
5. Bucklebury	1,558	1,578	1,605	Newbury CC
6. Burghfield	5,026	5,077	5,107	Newbury CC
	6	6	7	Reading West CC
	5,032	5,083	5,114
7. Calcot	2,380	2,381	2,430	Reading West CC
8. Chieveley	2,123	2,265	2,383	Newbury CC
9. Cold Ash	3,018	3,049	3,076	Newbury CC
10. Compton	2,575	2,603	2,652	Newbury CC
11. Craven	4,261	4,307	4,400	Newbury CC
12. Downlands	1,797	1,783	1,788	Newbury CC
13. Falkland	4,561	4,577	4,563	Newbury CC
14. Greenham	1,617	1,607	1,584	Newbury CC
15. Hungerford	4,888	4,937	4,953	Newbury CC
16. Kintbury	2,584	2,612	2,643	Newbury CC
17. Lambourn Valley	4	3	3	Devizes CC
	3,966	4,104	4,164	Newbury CC
	3,970	4,107	4,167
18. Mortimer	219	207	220	Basingstoke CC
	3,604	3,616	3,643	Newbury CC
	3,823	3,823	3,863
19. Northcroft	1,925	2,027	2,019	Newbury CC
20. Pangbourne	4	5	5	Henley CC
	2,552	2,581	2,596	Reading West CC
	2,556	2,586	2,601
21. Purley	2,954	3,065	3,067	Reading West CC
22. St. John's	5,385	5,339	5,338	Newbury CC
23. Shaw-cum-Donnington	1,293	1,272	1,304	Newbury CC
24. Speen	2,525	2,548	2,585	Newbury CC
25. Thatcham North	3,479	3,464	3,524	Newbury CC

	Ward electorates 1991	1992	1993	Present constituency
26. Thatcham South	7,028	7,149	7,273	Newbury CC
27. Thatcham West	4,333	4,319	4,342	Newbury CC
28. Theale	0	15	16	Newbury CC
	7,224	7,406	7,407	Reading West CC
	7,224	7,421	7,423
29. Tilehurst	8,319	8,248	8,243	Reading West CC
30. Turnpike	2,459	2,530	2,555	Newbury CC
31. Winchcombe	3,105	3,117	3,130	Newbury CC
Basingstoke CC (pt)	219	207	220
Devizes CC (pt)	4	3	3
Henley CC (pt)	4	5	5
Newbury CC (pt)	79,494	80,318	81,106
Reading West CC (pt)	23,667	23,933	24,002
Basingstoke and Deane borough[2]	110,103	111,625	111,452
1. Basing	5,802	5,836	5,804	Basingstoke CC
2. Baughurst and Heath End	669	661	610	Newbury CC
	3,376	3,384	3,407	North West Hampshire CC
	4,045	4,045	4,017
3. Brighton Hill	6,221	6,367	6,310	Basingstoke CC
4. Brookvale	4,280	4,341	4,290	Basingstoke CC
5. Buckskin	4,552	4,375	4,304	Basingstoke CC
6. Burghclere	1,903	1,948	1,904	North West Hampshire CC
7. Calleva	6,120	6,382	6,437	Basingstoke CC
	237	232	223	Newbury CC
	6,357	6,614	6,660
8. Chineham	4,277	4,459	4,611	Basingstoke CC
9. Eastrop	3,593	3,574	3,601	Basingstoke CC
10. East Woodhay	1,924	1,970	1,964	North West Hampshire CC
11. Grove	4,451	4,403	4,356	Basingstoke CC
12. Hatch Warren	4,399	4,920	5,333	Basingstoke CC
13. Highclere and Bourne	2,286	2,300	2,295	North West Hampshire CC
14. Kempshott	5,671	5,725	5,666	Basingstoke CC
15. Kingsclere	3,934	3,963	3,949	North West Hampshire CC
16. Norden	5,339	5,457	5,377	Basingstoke CC
17. Oakley and North Waltham	5,790	5,811	5,793	Basingstoke CC
18. Overton and Laverstoke	3,234	3,283	3,294	North West Hampshire CC
19. Popley	6,661	6,605	6,507	Basingstoke CC
20. Sherborne St. John	1,846	2,017	2,011	Basingstoke CC
21. South Ham	5,849	5,756	5,671	Basingstoke CC
22. Tadley	6,230	6,374	6,368	North West Hampshire CC
23. Upton Grey	2,081	2,142	2,141	Basingstoke CC
24. Whitchurch	3,604	3,613	3,587	North West Hampshire CC
25. Winklebury	5,774	5,727	5,639	Basingstoke CC
Basingstoke CC (pt)	82,706	83,897	83,851
Newbury CC (pt)	906	893	833
North West Hampshire CC (pt)	26,491	26,835	26,768

[1] As altered by The Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hampshire, Oxfordshire and Surrey (County Boundaries) Order 1991 and The Newbury (Parishes) Order 1991.

[2] As altered by The Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hampshire, Oxfordshire and Surrey (County Boundaries) Order 1991 and the Borough of Basingstoke and Deane (Electoral Arrangements) Order 1992.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities existed in 1980-81, 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93; how many she expects to exist by the end of 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: District health authorities were established by the National Health Service (Determination of Districts) Order 1981 (SI 81/1837). The information is shown in the table.

Number of District Health Authorities in England

Date	Number
1981 (number established)	192
April 1990	190
April 1991	186
April 1992	178
March 1993 (current)	173

We cannot anticipate the outcome of merger proposals currently in hand, but if current proposals are agreed there will be 140 DHAs by March 1994.

We will continue to consider merger proposals where they are in the interests of patients.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will state for each district health authority in the four Thames regions (a) the revenue outturn for 1982-83, (b) the revenue outturn for 1991-92 in cash terms, (c) the revenue outturn for 1991-92 adjusted using the NHS pay and price index, (d) the 1992-93 revenue allocation including capital charge compensation, (e) the 1992-93 allocation excluding capital charge compensation and (f) the percentage difference between (a) and (e) adjusted using the NHS pay and price index.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 22 February 1993]: The tables give for each district in the Thames regions the revenue outturn for 1982-83 and 1991-92 (derived from the published accounts) and the 1991-92 outturn at 1982-83 prices using the GDP deflator. The national health service pay and price index for 1991-92 is not yet available.

Information on the 1992-93 allocations to districts, which will be the final cash limits for the financial year, is not held centrally.

	Revenue outturn 1982-83 (at 1982-83 cash)	Revenue outturn 1991-92 (at 1991-92 cash)	Revenue outturn 1991-92 (at 1982-83 cash)
North West Thames RHA	20,335,775	57,619,199	34,649,828
North Bedfordshire	29,878,953	71,656,022	43,090,999
South Bedfordshire	30,796,203	86,066,794	51,757,047
North Hertfordshire	19,771,127	59,288,222	35,653,510
East Hertfordshire	24,926,353	88,002,384	52,921,032
North West Hertfordshire	42,483,433	102,570,343	61,681,606
South West Hertfordshire	32,795,331	87,009,205	52,323,775
Barnet	59,776,548	130,730,177	78,615,778
Harrow	34,701,218	88,397,307	53,158,522
Hillingdon	46,374,090	83,518,302	50,224,489
Hounslow and Spelthorne	45,496,873	107,625,179	64,721,378
Ealing	34,522,021	103,110,478	62,006,421
Brent	44,982,791	—	—
Paddington	54,116,453	—	—
Hammersmith and Fulham	44,470,597	—	—
Victoria	67,787,606	—	—
Riverside	—	186,629,392	112,231,278
Parkside	—	238,303,679	143,306,079
North West Thames Regional Total	633,215,372	1,490,526,683	896,341,742
North East Thames RHA	22,442,080	189,715,331	114,087,035
Basildon and Thurrock	42,406,907	89,539,073	53,845,134
Mid Essex	35,554,483	93,892,755	56,463,260
North East Essex	48,242,241	103,239,520	62,084,022
West Essex	29,864,213	84,477,676	50,801,417
Southend	35,084,701	91,034,599	54,744,482
Barking, Havering and Brentwood	62,219,351	153,568,011	92,349,517
Hampstead	58,524,732	60,483,821	36,372,494
City and Hackney	70,790,662	107,363,560	64,564,051
Newham	30,612,895	99,756,200	59,989,296
Tower Hamlets	60,463,479	80,426,175	48,365,010
Enfield	30,392,333	96,196,452	57,848,609
Haringey	36,483,041	92,736,373	55,767,859
Redbridge	32,057,915	88,194,556	53,036,596
Waltham Forest	55,667,325	96,763,754	58,189,761
Bloomsbury	107,685,280	—	—
Islington	42,185,088	—	—
Bloomsbury and Islington	—	178,471,140	107,325,239
North East Thames Regional Total	800,676,726	1,705,858,996	1,025,833,782
South East Thames RHA	19,143,996	250,032,280	150,359,180
Brighton	45,101,687	104,263,976	62,700,088
Eastbourne	34,656,520	89,229,769	53,659,131
Hastings	23,460,289	58,655,280	35,272,885
South East Kent	28,198,300	83,818,882	50,405,245
Canterbury and Thanet	49,788,466	102,041,685	61,363,693
Dartford and Gravesham	39,709,671	74,250,536	44,651,233
Maidstone	29,480,820	60,676,123	36,488,137
Medway	36,446,695	92,556,936	55,659,953
Tunbridge Wells	38,849,110	60,611,414	36,449,224
Bexley	30,536,484	71,303,254	42,878,859
Greenwich	54,158,630	91,659,692	55,120,387
Bromley	47,947,516	110,819,831	66,642,511
West Lambeth	70,519,544	88,371,499	53,143,003
Camberwell	57,456,272	84,269,767	50,676,389
Lewisham and North Southwark	94,966,664	145,155,564	87,290,615
South East Thames Regional Total	700,420,664	1,567,716,488	942,760,533
South West Thames RHA	15,748,269	149,076,547	89,648,534
North West Surrey	32,060,211	72,956,823	43,873,247

	Revenue outturn 1982-83 (at 1982-83 cash)	Revenue outturn 1991-92 (at 1991-92 cash)	Revenue outturn 1991-92 (at 1982-83 cash)
West Surrey and North East Hants	31,626,605	75,794,712	45,579,838
South West Surrey	29,056,845	67,946,908	40,860,490
Mid Surrey	36,006,038	62,977,286	37,871,962
East Surrey	41,247,221	72,024,210	43,312,412
Chichester	25,000,995	60,116,349	36,151,512
Mid Downs	36,279,451	87,040,435	52,342,555
Worthing	26,365,689	82,473,837	49,596,390
Croydon	50,933,963	109,082,512	65,597,758
Kingston and Esher	35,913,579	68,653,248	41,285,253
Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton	30,778,431	96,517,808	58,041,859
Wandsworth	80,822,843	104,631,717	62,921,232
Sutton and Merton	58,552,912	132,302,204	79,561,131
South West Thames Regional Total	530,393,053	1,241,594,596	746,644,173

Radon Gas

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to assess the dangers arising from radon gas concentrations in dwellings; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The Government are advised on the risks of exposure to radon in the home by the National Radiological Protection Board, which has recommended action levels for exposure. The board's latest advice was endorsed by the independent advisory Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Envvironment, and has been accepted by Government. The Department is currently supporting a comprehensive case-control study of the incidence of lung cancer in the areas of the United Kingdom with the highest levels of radon in homes. The situation is being kept under close review.

NHS Administrators

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the numbers of administrators/ management employed in each regional health authority, district health authority and family health services authority, in England and Wales.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 10 March 1993]: The information requested for England is shown in the table. Sub-regional figures for 1991 are not available centrally. The figures for 1991 (the latest year for which figures are available) include staff in national health service trusts. Information on Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Administrative and clerical managerial grades, by regional health authority, England 1991

	Administrative and clerical	General and senior managers
Northern	7,240	720
Yorkshire	8,090	1,130
Trent	10,540	810
East Anglian	4,550	560
North West Thames	8,660	680
North East Thames	11,050	1,310
South East Thames	10,800	980
South West Thames	6,590	650
Wessex	6,190	850
Oxford	4,930	520
South Western	7,680	780
West Midlands	12,740	1,440
Mersey	6,160	730
North Western	11,220	990
SHAs	2,390	290
Others	8,560	910
ENGLAND	127,370	13,340

Administrative and clerical and managerial grades, by RHA and DHA, England 1990

	Administrative and clerical	General and senior managers
ENGLAND TOTAL	120,040	9,680
Northern RHA	6,940	550
Yorkshire RHA	7,870	930
Trent RHA	10,120	600
East Anglian RHA	4,070	480
North West Thames RHA	8,160	80
North East Thames RHA	10,450	1,030
South East Thames RHA	10,030	780
South West Thames RHA	6,340	520
Wessex RHA	5,840	610
Oxford RHA	5,150	420
South Western RHA	6,980	610
West Midlands RHA	11,950	1,060
Mersey RHA	5,810	500
North Western RHA	10,070	690
Special Health Authorities	1,840	130
FHSAs	4,350	640
London Ambulance Service	90	—
Other Statutory Authorities	3,960	40
Northern RHA	6,940	550
RHA HQ and HQ Units	470	40
Hartlepool	220	10
North Tees	340	30
South Tees	690	70
East Cumbria	320	40
South Cumbria	320	40
West Cumbria	260	—
Darlington	300	20
Durham	290	20
North West Durham	170	10
South West Durham	280	20
Northumberland	490	50
Gateshead	290	20
Newcastle	1,350	80
North Tyneside	270	20
South Tyneside	240	10
Sunderland	650	70
Yorkshire RHA	7,870	930
RHA HQ and HQ Units	500	140

	Administrative and clerical	General and senior managers
Hull	670	70
East Yorkshire	340	50
Grimsby	280	30
Scunthorpe	350	10
Northallerton	150	20
York	500	50
Scarborough	240	20
Harrogate	280	40
Bradford	690	110
Airedale	320	30
Calderdale	290	20
Huddersfield	420	40
Dewsbury	270	20
Leeds	1,820	210
Wakefield	440	40
Pontefract	290	30
Trent RHA	10,120	600
RHA HQ and HQ Units	740	110
North Derbyshire	540	0
Southern Derbyshire	1,030	50
Leicestershire	1,690	80
North Lincolnshire	540	40
South Lincolnshire	490	50
Bassetlaw	170	10
Central Nottinghamshire	510	60
Nottingham	1,520	30
Barnsley	380	50
Doncaster	480	30
Rotherham	390	30
Sheffield	1,640	70
East Anglian RHA	4,070	480
RHA HQ and HQ Units	270	60
Cambridge	680	100
Peterborough	470	40
West Suffolk	390	30
East Suffolk	580	60
Norwich	770	80
Great Yarmouth and Waveney	360	50
West Norfolk and Wisbech	320	30
Huntingdon	240	40
North West Thames RHA	8,160	80
RHA HQ and HQ Units	330	10
North Bedfordshire	430	10
South Bedfordshire	440	—
North Hertfordshire	270	—
East Hertfordshire	430	—
North West Hertfordshire	620	30
South West Hertfordshire	330	10
Barnet	750	—
Harrow	420	—
Hillingdon	600	10
Hounslow and Spelthorne	670	—
Ealing	420	10
Riverside	1,220	10
Parkside	1,190	10
North East Thames RHA	10,450	1,030
RHA HQ and HQ Units	670	160
Basildon and Thurrock	520	40
Mid Essex	480	60
North East Essex	680	30
West Essex	420	60
Southend	570	60
Barking Havering and Brentwood	750	70
Hampstead	700	50
Bloomsbury	1,070	80
Islington	530	50
City and Hackney	850	60
Newham	460	40
Tower Hamlets	840	60

	Administrative and clerical	General and senior managers
Enfield	390	40
Haringey	500	40
Redbridge	400	50
Waltham Forest	640	80
South East Thames RHA	10,030	780
RHA HQ and HQ Units	600	60
Brighton	730	50
Eastbourne	460	50
Hastings	360	40
South East Kent	480	40
Canterbury and Thanet	640	50
Dartford and Gravesham	450	40
Maidstone	370	30
Medway	570	60
Tunbridge Wells	450	50
Bexley	490	40
Greenwich	650	40
Bromley	560	50
West Lambeth	880	60
Camberwell	940	40
Lewisham and North Southwark	1,400	90
South West Thames RHA	6,340	520
RHA HQ and HQ Units	640	50
North West Surrey	410	40
West Surrey and North East Hampshire	390	40
South West Surrey	450	50
Mid Surrey	350	50
East Surrey	390	40
Chichester	370	30
Mid Downs	420	40
Worthing District	410	30
Croydon	530	60
Kingston and Esher	160	30
Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton	320	10
Wandsworth	870	60
Merton and Sutton	620	10
Wessex RHA	5,840	610
RHA HQ and HQ Units	240	60
East Dorset	840	70
West Dorset	320	40
Portsmouth and South East Hampshire	890	90
Southampton and South West Hampshire	1,050	90
Winchester	340	60
Basingstoke and North Hampshire	430	40
Salisbury	310	30
Swindon	460	50
Bath District	720	70
Isle of Wight	240	10
Oxford RHA	5,150	420
RHA HQ and HQ Units	570	50
East Berkshire	560	40
West Berkshire	770	30
Aylesbury Vale	370	30
Wycombe	380	30
Milton Keynes	320	30
Kettering	350	50
Northampton	580	60
Oxfordshire	1,240	110
South Western RHA	6,980	610
RHA HQ and HQ Units	450	40
Bristol and Weston	1,180	80
Frenchay	550	40
Southmead	490	50
Cornwall and Isles of Scilly	610	90

	Administrative and clerical	General and senior managers
Exeter	660	50
North Devon	270	30
Plymouth	700	40
Torbay	470	60
Cheltenham and District	350	30
Gloucester	590	60
Somerset	660	40
West Midlands RHA	11,950	1,060
RHA HQ and HQ Units	1,120	60
Bromsgrove and Redditch	300	30
Herefordshire	330	10
Kidderminster and District	230	30
Worcester and District	420	30
Shropshire	660	40
Mid Staffordshire	420	80
North Staffordshire	930	90
South East Staffordshire	440	50
Rugby	130	10
North Warwickshire	350	20
South Warwickshire	390	50
Central Birmingham	950	80
East Birmingham	490	40
North Birmingham	350	30
South Birmingham	750	50
West Birmingham	670	60
Coventry	640	80
Dudley	630	70
Sandwell	460	20
Solihull	280	50
Walsall	450	30
Wolverhampton	560	40
Mersey RHA	5,810	500
RHA HQ and HQ Units	510	50
Chester	420	30
Crewe	440	0
Halton	210	20
Macclesfield	350	20
Warrington	400	40
Liverpool	1,410	160
St Helens and Knowsley	570	50
Southport and Formby	260	40
South Sefton	560	40
Wirral	690	50
North Western RHA	10,070	690
RHA HQ and HQ Units	980	80
Lancaster	410	40
Blackpool, Wyre and Fylde	510	40
Preston	610	50
Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley	510	20
Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale	460	40
West Lancashire	270	30
Chorley and South Ribble	150	20
Bolton	450	30
Bury	280	20
North Manchester	640	30
Central Manchester	730	30
South Manchester	940	50
Oldham	380	20
Rochdale	310	10
Salford	700	70
Stockport	500	20
Tameside and Glossop	350	30
Trafford	370	30
Wigan	530	20
Special Health Authorities	1,840	130
Hospitals for Sick Children	290	30
Nat Hospital for Nervous Diseases	200	20
Moorfields Eye Hospital	170	—
Bethlem Royal and Maudsley Hospitals	160	10
National Heart and Chest	300	30
Royal Marsden Hospital	270	20
Hammersmith and Queen Charlotte's Hospital	380	10
Eastman Dental Hospital	60	—
FHSA	4,350	640
Northern RHA	290	30
Yorkshire RHA	350	60
Trent RHA	350	60
East Anglian RHA	180	30
North West Thames RHA	240	30
North East Thames RHA	340	40
South East Thames RHA	340	50
South West Thames RHA	340	50
Wessex RHA	230	40
Oxford RHA	260	50
South Western RHA	270	30
West Midlands RHA	590	90
Mersey RHA	150	20
North Western RHA	430	70
London Ambulance Service	90	—
Other Statutory Authorities	3,960	40

1. Figures are in whole-time equivalents and are rounded to the nearest 10.
2. —denotes less than 5.
3. Family Health Service Authority figures for 1990 are only available as regional totals.

PRIME MINISTER

Political Parties (Funding)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what plans he has to introduce new laws relating to the organisation or funding of political parties; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider legislation to require political parties to make public their financial supporters.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to introduce any such legislation.

Bill of Rights

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will consider the introduction of a Bill of Rights or a written constitution during the lifetime of this Parliament; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

Environment

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the speeches he has made on the environment since April 1992; and what commitments he has made to additional investment in the environment.

The Prime Minister: The Government consider that environmental concerns should be reflected across the whole spectrum of policy. The environment has accordingly figured frequently in the speeches which my colleagues and I have made. The environment was central in my speech to the Earth summit at Rio in June 1992, as it was when I spoke in Birmingham last week at the global technology partnership conference.

The Chancellor's autumn statement included figures for public investment in the environment, but investment by private enterprises and individuals is even more important. Accurate figures are hard to derive, but we estimate that about 2·5 per cent. of our gross domestic product is spent directly on environmental purposes.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister how many and what percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall in the Cabinet Office are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled people.

The Prime Minister: The figures for women employed in the Cabinet Office, including its executive agencies, are as follows:

Grades (and equivalents)	Women	Total	Percentage women
1	0	5	0
2	2	8	25
3	1	25	4
4	0	3	0
5	16	41	39
6	19	45	42
7	63	264	24
Overall	1,330	2,634	50

The ethnic monitoring programme was carried out on a voluntary basis and did not extend to the Cabinet Office's agencies. Of those who responded, 62 people (2·3 per cent. of the total) chose to register as non-white. One of these is at grade 7 level.

The Cabinet Office's figures on staff with disabilities include only those who have chosen to register as disabled. Twenty-eight people (1 per cent. of the total) are so registered. None is at grade 7 level or above. The Cabinet Office employs other staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register. The Cabinet Office is an equal opportunities employer, and emphasises this fact in its advertisements.

Full Employment

Mr. Soley: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 2 March, Official Report, column 138, what percentage of unemployment is consistent with his aim to seek full employment.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 8 March 1993 at column 392.

South Africa

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister when he was informed of the testing of nuclear devices by South Africa in the Kalahari.

The Prime Minister: We have no evidence that South Africa has conducted nuclear tests. We have noted President de Klerk's statement that South Africa never carried out a clandestine nuclear test.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister when he was informed of the existence of South Africa's nuclear bombs.

The Prime Minister: I was informed that South Africa had built six nuclear devices by President de Klerk's statement on 24 March.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 467, what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the resumption of negotiations towards a comprehensive test ban treaty during 1993.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the hon. Member on 22 March at column 467.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the possible contribution of the comprehensive test ban treaty towards the outcome of the non-proliferation treaty extension conference.

The Prime Minister: We believe the indefinite extension of the non-proliferation treaty is in the interests of all signatories. The case for its extension is strong regardless of progress towards a comprehensive test ban, and we believe it is wrong to see NPT extension as dependent on achieving a comprehensive test ban.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Scab

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will establish an independent public inquiry into effective strategies for sheep scab control in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many complaints he has received concerning the leaflet on sheep scab produced by his Department last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: A number of complaints have been received about an error regarding the application of the control of substances hazardous to health regulations to the dipping operation; this is being rectified.

Integrated Administration and Control

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what rights inspectors will have to enter on to farms and demand production of records to check the accuracy of information given in connection with the integrated administration and control system.

Mr. Curry: We shall shortly be laying before the House regulations which will provide the powers of entry to farms and access to records in connection with the integrated administration and control system necessary to undertake the control procedures required to meet EC obligations.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to raise with (a) the European Commission and (b) the other members of the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers the co-ordination of the integrated administration and control system for farms in each member state; and what steps he will take to ensure that British farmers are not subject to more rigorous requirements than farmers elsewhere in the EC.

Mr. Curry: At the March meeting of the Agriculture Council, my right hon. Friend emphasised that it was crucial for the European Commission to ensure that the integrated administration and control system was implemented fully and uniformly throughout the EC.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the appropriateness of the proposed penalties as outlined in the draft booklet RSAS 4 Dec. (1) issued by his Department for late and inaccurate forms submitted in connection with the integrated administration and control system.

Mr. Curry: The penalties for late and/or inaccurate forms in connection with IACS are laid down in Community legislation and consequently apply equally in all EC member states. The IACS is intended to help control CAP expenditure and penalties for infringements of the rules have to be set accordingly.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the procedure to appeal against his Department's decisions relating to forms submitted in accordance with the intregrated administration and control system.

Mr. Curry: It is open to any farmer to contact his regional service centre if he is dissatisfied.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ensure that deregulation is being applied to the forms required for the integrated administration and control system to keep them as simple as possible.

Mr. Curry: The forms have to reflect the requirements of the EC legislation. Subject to this, we have made the forms as simple as possible for farmers to understand.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he has given to the effect of the integrated administration and control system on the transfer of land from one occupier to another.

Mr. Curry: This mater is covered in the explanatory booklet on the integrated administration and control system.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what opportunities there will be to correct genuine errors on integrated administration and control system forms after 15 May.

Mr. Curry: The booklet on the integrated administration and control system will set out conditions for the correction of genuine errors.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the application forms for the integrated administration and control system to be published.

Mr. Curry: An explanatory booklet on the integrated administration and control system and area aid application forms will be dispatched to farmers in England and Wales on 2 April. Copies have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Mineral Hydrocarbons

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will take steps to enforce the ban on the use of mineral hydrocarbons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The results of studies of mineral hydrocarbons are currently being examined by the scientific committees that advise Ministers on food safety issues. No decisions will be taken until this independent expert assessment has been completed and the committees' recommendations have been received.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the food products which use mineral hydrocarbons in their manufacture.

Mr. Soames: I am aware that mineral hydrocarbons are used in the United Kingdom in the manufacture of base components for chewing gum and rind for whole pressed cheese. I am informed that certain other permitted uses have been discontinued. However, detailed information on remaining uses will be available when the independent expert committees that advise the Government on food safety have completed the examination of this subject on which they are currently engaged.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by his Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Curry: Consultancy fees totalling £429,037 were paid to KPMG Peat Marwick, Touche Ross and Price Waterhouse between the financial years 1987-88 and 1991-92. A further breakdown of figures cannot be given, as this information is classified commercial in confidence. These consultancy firms were involved in nine areas of work in my core Department. This answer excludes contracts made for IT work and those made by executive agencies. Information on the precise nature of the contracts and their duration is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Agricultural Tourism

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of farmers' revenue was derived from agricultural tourism in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is not available. A survey undertaken by the university of Exeter in 1989 and 1990 on a sample of 330 full-time farms which had diversified in England and Wales showed that income from the diversified activity contributed 11·4 per cent. on average to aggregate business income on the farm.

Lambs and Kids

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when he intends to act on the 1987 FAWC report on the welfare of animals at market, in respect of a ban on the sale of lambs and goat kids under four weeks old at market unless at the foot of their dams;

(2) what is the number of unaccompanied lambs that have been sold at livestock markets in the current year;

(3) what action he is taking to enforce the MAFF Code on the Welfare of Animals in Livestock Markets (1990) in relation to unaccompanied lambs and kids.

Mr. Soames: In respect of the marketing of orphan or unaccompanied lambs, the Welfare of Animals at Markets Order 1990 (S.I. No. 2628), together with the guidance set out in the MAFF code of practice on the welfare of animals in livestock markets, implement the recommendations made by FAWC in its report. The FAWC report made no recommendation about banning the sale of lambs and goat kids in markets. The code of practice, which provides guidance and advice, has been drawn to the attention of all concerned with enforcement of the legislation.

Information on the numbers of unaccompanied lambs sold at markets is not collected centrally.

Basking Sharks

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total number of basking sharks caught in the United Kingdom waters in each of the last three years.

Mr. Curry: Although, under an EC fishery agreement, Norway could take basking sharks in United Kingdom waters, between 1987 and 1990 no basking sharks were taken. Figures for later years are not yet available. In addition, there is a very small and sporadic United Kingdom fishery.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the recruitment of basking shark stocks in United Kingdom waters.

Mr. Curry: United Kingdom Fisheries Departments collect no data on the recruitment to the stocks of basking shark which move into our waters.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent research his Department has commissioned into the status, breeding success and wintering patterns of the basking shark.

Mr. Curry: In 1988, the marine laboratory, Aberdeen, published a survey of scientific knowledge of the basking shark. It concluded that this shark was not under threat. The fishery in recent years has been minimal. The MLA continues to monitor and collect data.

Grants and Subsidies

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each type of grant and subsidy and the amount provided for each for the 1993-94 budget, where the grants or subsidies are decided by his Department independent of CAP commitments.

Mr. Curry: Figures for the 1993-94 provision in respect of the main grants and subsidies can be found in the Ministry's February 1993 departmental report (Cm 2203), a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. Further details could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Industry

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total weekly cost of keeping open those British Coal collieries at which regular production has ceased.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Coal Imports

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the latest available figures for the sterling price per tonne of coal imported into the United Kingdom from Australia and China.

Mr. Eggar: The average costs of imported coal from Australia and China in 1992 were £32·73 and £31·40 per tonne respectively.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the president of the Board of Trade which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subject to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Eggar: In the last year, my Department has launched a number of market tests in areas which could be described as providing a professional service. The full list of tests was published in "The Citizen's Charter, First report: 1992"—Cm 2101. These tests are due to be completed by September 1993. Information on the forward market: testing programme is unavailable as it is still under preparation.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish an estimate of the return on investment in the THORP project based on (a) a 10 per cent. discount rate, (b) a 12 per cent. discount rate, (c) an 8 per cent. discount rate including interest during construction, (d) a 10 per cent. discount rate, including interest during construction and (e) a 12 per cent. discount rate, including interest during construction.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to what extent his Department will be using the Touche Ross report in its assessment of the future of THORP; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: [holding answer 25 March 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 17 December 1992, Official Report, column 477.

Drinks Measures

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards section 43 of the Weights and Measures Act 1985 relating to beer or cider and froth.

Mr. Leigh: As part of the Government's deregulation initiative, my Department is reassessing the costs and benefits of the implementation of section 43. Interested parties have been asked to provide information relevant to this reassessment and their replies are being considered.

Non-fossil Fuel Obligation

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what formal discussions he has had with the European Commission on the possible re-authorisation of the non-fossil fuel obligation, under article 92(3) of the EC treaty, in order to remove Electricité de France's non-leviable status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has placed in the Library of the House a summary of legal advice received on trade in electricity across the interconnector with France. As that indicated, EdF's non-leviable status could not be removed without giving EdF the benefit of levy payments. In view of this, my right hon. Friend does not propose to pursue this with the Commission.

Electricity

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department was first informed of the application by Rich and Co. for a licence to supply electricity; what steps were taken to interview its chairman; when his Department was first informed of Offer's decision to grant a licence to Rich and Co.; if he will give details of the involvement of his Department in the decision to grant the licence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The authority to grant second tier supply licences was delegated by the Secretary of State to the Director General of Electricity Supply at the time of vesting in March 1990. The Department is neither consulted not informed of applications for, or the award of, second tier supply licences as the approval of the Department is not required in such cases.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list his statutory duties, and those of the Director General of Electricity Supply, under the Electricity Act 1989 in respect of the award of licences.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The statutory duties of the President and of the Director General of Electricity Supply are set out in section 3 of the Electricity Act 1989, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Nuclear Review

Mr. Salmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when the Government's review of nuclear power will commence; and what will be the terms of reference;

(2) how far in advance of the Government's nuclear review the terms of reference will be published.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 March 1993]: My Department's White Paper on the prospects for coal was published on Thursday 25 March. The White Paper contains the following statement in paragraph 16.6:

"The Government will bring forward work on its review (of the future prospects for nuclear power) and will make a further announcement later this year."

Manufacturing, Planning and Implementation Scheme

Mr. Rowe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications have been received to date for the manufacturing, planning and implementation scheme.

Mr. Heseltine: To date, a total of 191 applications have been received. Fifty-two grants have been awarded, with a further 90 applications currently being processed. The scheme as announced on 19 February 1991 was for a three-year period to start on 1 June 1991 and end on 31 May 1994. To allow detailed appraisal no further applications will be considered after 31 May 1993.

Colliery Review

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give the contribution to the gross domestic product of each of the 31 pits in the colliery review process from each year since 1987-88 in (a) cash terms and (b) 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 26 March 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Member on 22 March, Official Report, column 454.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Dewar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the percentage of households in each region and in the United Kingdom who rely mainly on (a) oil, (b) piped gas, (c) cylinder gas, (d) electricity and (e) coal as as source of domestic fuel.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Department of Trade and Industry estimates that households main energy sources are as follows:

	Per cent.
(a) Oil	3
(b) Piped gas	74
(c) Cylinder gas	n.a.
(d) Electricity	12
(e) Coal	9

Source: DTI estimates, using Building Research Establishment data.
n.a. not available.

These estimates relate to Great Britain only; United Kingdom and regional data are unavailable. They are based on households' main heating fuel. Heating is the dominate use of energy in most households.

ENVIRONMENT

Bletchley Park Memorial

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his response to proposals to establish Bletchley Park as a memorial to those who worked there during world war II.

Mr. Howard: I have made it clear that I welcome the proposal to create at Bletchley Park a visible memorial to the war-time activities that took place there. The Bletchley Park Trust is at present reviewing its plans for such a development, including purchase of the site owned by the Government and BT once this becomes surplus to requirements later this year. I look forward to constructive discussions with the trust.

Radioactive Discharges

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), Official Report, 10 March, column 629, if he will list (a) the scope of the selective monitoring for radioactive pollution in private water supplies, (b) the consultants contracted and (c) the value of the contracts to which he makes reference.

Mr. Maclean: The monitoring provides for 100 samples from private water supplies in a given area of the United Kingdom to be taken and analysed each year. The areas covered by the current three-year contract, which is with ICI Tracerco, are: Beverley, East Yorkshire—1990; Dolgellau, north Wales—1991; Berwick-upon-Tweed, Northumberland—1992. The value of the contract over this three-year period is £143,299 excluding VAT.

Council Tax, Lambeth

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many households in Lambeth are liable to pay the council tax; and what number fall into each band.

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of dwellings in each valuation band on the proposed valuation list sent to the London borough of Lambeth in November 1992 was as follows:

Council tax band	Number of dwellings
A	3,556
B	30,838
C	34,126
D	24,328
E	11,647
F	8,985
G	4,596
H	244
TOTAL	118,320

The Department does not hold information about the number of households liable to pay the council tax. The number involved will be different from the number of dwellings shown above to the extent that there are more empty or exempt dwellings than dwellings which are occupied by more than one household.

Red Squirrels

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the organisation Red Alert about measures needed to preserve the indigenous red squirrels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I have had no discussions with Red Alert about the preservation of red squirrels. Research by Red Alert is supported by grant aid from English Nature, the Government's statutory advisers on nature conservation, and regular contact is maintained between the two organisations. I am very much aware of the threat to our indigenous red squirrels and will encourage all measures to help them.

Oil Pollution

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for further interim action to protect the United Kingdom coastline against oil pollution from merchant ships in advance of the report of the Donaldson inquiry.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport gave to the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Hague) on 26 February 1993 at column 696 on the interim measures that have been voluntarily agreed by the shipping industry pending Lord Donaldson's report. If further measures seem essential, we shall take them.

Environmental Action Fund

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all groups which have received funds from the environmental action fund for the 1993-94 financial year and the amounts granted to each group.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 15 March, Official Report, column 83.

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline his criteria for deciding which groups receive funding from the environmental action fund for the financial year 1993-94.

Mr. Maclean: Applications to the environmental action fund were assessed against the priorities I announced when launching the fund on 20 July 1992, the extent to which the proposals would produce tangible benefits to the environment, and the degree to which they would provide value for money.

Women and the Environment

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which environmental groups have been funded by his Department which deal specifically with women and the environment for the financial year 1993-94.

Mr. Maclean: No such groups were funded under our original invitation to apply, but the townswomen's guilds later sought funding for an environmental project, and I am looking sympathetically at their request.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action has been taken to clarify the application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 in respect of the definition of transferral of an economic entity with regard to the compulsory competitive tendering of public services;

(2) what are the reasons for the non-application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and the EC acquired rights directive with regard to a normal contract let under the compulsory competitive tendering legislation.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster announced on 11 March that he had issued and placed in the Library guidance on the application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment)—TUPE—Regulations 1981 to the market testing of public services, including the contracting-out of local authority services following compulsory competitive tendering—CCT—Official Report, column 648. As the guidance indicates, the contracted-out provision of a service is not affected by the TUPE regulations unless it involves the transfer of an undertaking in the terms of the regulations—that is to say, the transfer of an economic entity which is capable of operating as a going concern, and which retains its identity. Whether or not a particular case of contracting-out following CCT involves such a transfer will depend on the nature of the service in question, and the arrangements under which the contractor carries out the provision of the service.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to make regulations and issue guidance to ensure that local authorities seek competitive tenders for services in a fair manner.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland have today laid before the House regulations made under section 9 of the Local Government Act 1992. These come into force on 10 May, when guidance will be issued.

The regulations and guidance meet our commitment in the Government's Green Paper "Competing for Quality: Competition in Provision of Local Services" to establish a clear statutory framework for compulsory competitive tendering. They will ensure that competition for local services is fair, allowing local taxpayers to receive quality services which offer value for money.

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities in England which are to undergo a structural reorganisation following the Local Government Commission's recommendations will also be required to seek tenders for work under the compulsory competitive tendering legislation.

Mr. Robin Squire: This Government are committed to efficient, effective local government. The work of the Local Government Commission in England and the compulsory competitive tendering—CCT—regime both have an important part to play in achieving this aim.

Reorganisation of boundaries and responsibilities is bound to put extra pressures on local authorities. Moreover, existing arrangements for the provision of services will not necessarily be appropriate for the reorganised authority structure. We therefore intend that local authorities which, following a review by the Local Government Commission, are about to undergo a structural reorganisation, or have recently undergone such a reorganisation, will be exempt for a short period from the obligatory requirements of CCT. In doing so, we also intend to protect the interests of contractors engaged by the local authority.

For those services already subject to CCT under the Local Government Act 1988, local authorities will be seeking to retender work throughout the period over which the commission will be conducting reviews of English authorities. We intend that the local authority undergoing restructuring will be exempt from the statutory requirement to seek competitive tenders before the work can be awarded to their own direct services organisation—DSO. This exemption will start from the date at which Parliament approves the statutory instrument making the structural change. New authorities will then be required to start CCT tendering as soon as possible after their setting-up, so as to have new contracts in operation within 18 months of reorganisation, or sooner.

Similar exemption provisions will apply to services subject to CCT under the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980.

My right hon. and learned Friend announced on 10 November 1992 Official Report, column 743, the Government's intention to extend CCT to local authority construction-related and corporate services. We intend that these services will be brought into the CCT regime from 1995-96, and a detailed timetable will be announced shortly. The Government recognise that it is particularly important for the arrangements for the key corporate services to reflect the structural organisation of the authority concerned.

We therefore intend that, as with services already subject to CCT, any local authority which is undergoing a structural change will similarly be exempt, for the period immediately before and after reorganisation, from the statutory requirement to seek competitive tenders for these services before work can be awarded to their own DSO.

The provisions I have described will not apply to metropolitan districts and London boroughs. Nor will they apply to those authorities which, following review, are not subject to structural reorganisation.

My Department will give careful consideration to the position of authorities which do not fall to be considered by the Commission until after the date at which new services become subject to CCT. The general exemptions described above will not apply to these authorities, but it may nevertheless be inappropriate to introduce competition for new services where a reorganisation may shortly follow.

These general exemptions are intended to allow for a smooth transition to successor authorities and the continued effective operation of CCT thereafter. I anticipate they will affect only a relatively small proportion of the contracts let by English local authorities at any one time. They will relieve both local authorities and contractors tendering for this work from the uncertainties surrounding the reorganisation process.

While these arrangements remove the mandatory requirement on the authorities concerned, authorities will have the freedom to continue competitive tendering throughout the reorganisation period, where they judge this to be sensible, and with appropriate consultation with shadow successor authorities.

There are a number of technical issues relating to the reorganisation of DSOs and the protection of existing contractual arrangements. My Department will issue more detailed advice on the operation of CCT where local authorities are undergoing structural change in due course.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made within the Property Services Agency to deal with inquiries in respect of prospective buyers of the agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redmond: Inquiries in respect of prospective buyers of the PSA Building Management businesses are dealt with by the privatisation and strategy directorate within the Property Services Agency or by the press office as appropriate. Statements will be made when contracts have been exchanged with the preferred buyers of the different businesses, probably in early summer.

Building Regulations

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration his Department gave to global warming considerations when considering proposals to increase domestic roof, wall and floor insulation standards in the Building Regulations part L revision.

Mr. Baldry: As stated in the consultation letter covering the proposals to review part L of the Building Regulations, these have been brought forward now because of growing environmental concerns and the Government's commitment to return CO_2 emissions to 1990 levels by 2000.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish technical information supplied to his Department by the Building Research Establishment and the National House Building Council, which his Department has considered in reaching its proposal not to increase current United Kingdom insulation standards in domestic roofs, walls and floors in the current Building Regulations part L revision.

Mr. Baldry: The proposals for the revision of part L of the Building Regulations would increase significantly current insulation standards in domestic roofs, walls and floors by requiring more demanding calculation procedures, requiring improved insulation around window and door openings, and by not permitting lower standards of wall, floor and roof insulation where double-glazing is used. In addition, views are being invited on improving U-values for roof and floor insulation. Estimates made by the Building Research Establishment of the costs and savings of the proposals were included in the summary paper deposited in the Library of the House on 26 January 1993.

Defence Personnel (Housing)

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue a circular to local authority housing departments, regarding the requirement of military authority possession orders for ex-service families and other irregular occupants of Ministry of Defence garrison properties, seeking to prove their eligibility for social housing.

Mr. Baldry: Advice to local authorities about this is already given in paragraph 10·21 of the "Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities", (third edition). That advice will be included in the draft text of an updated circular on housing for ex-service personnel, on which we intend to shortly to consult the local authority associations and other interested parties.

Burghfield Base

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what considerations underlay the removal of Burghfield base, national grid ref. SU 6668, from the Ordnance Survey maps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The feature was removed from editions of maps published later than 1976 at the request of the owning authority; it is not considered to be in the national interest to publish details of the site. The need to impose restrictions on published material is regularly reviewed to ensure that detail is not unnecessarily withheld.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those commercial organisations which have placed contracts with the Building Research Establishment over the last three years for which figures are available; and what their contribution to the Building Research Establishment's income has been.

Mr. Baldry: The Building Research Establishment's list of firms and organisations for whom it has undertaken technical consultancy work is subject to normal client confidentiality. The total income earned from such clients over the last three financial years was:—

	£ million
1989-90	1·8
1990-91	2·9
1991-92	2·7

Planning Appeals (Costs)

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will announce the outcome of his review of the policy guidance, in his Department's circular 2/87, for the award costs to parties in appeals under town and country planning and other legislation.

Mr. Baldry: We have today issued a comprehensive circular, giving policy guidance on the criteria for awards of parties' costs in planning and other similar proceedings. This guidance replaces the present DOE circulars 2/87 and 23/91—Welsh Office Circulars 5/87 and 77/91. A copy of the circular has been placed in the parliamentary Libraries.

Council Tax

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to establish how many disabled people have been disqualified from receiving reductions in their council tax because their properties have been placed in band A; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of dwellings in band A which might qualify for a reduction could be determined only by asking residents of such properties to make applications. Such a request would be pointless, frustrating for the applicant and administratively costly.

Homeless Families (Cooking Facilities)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information local authorities are required to keep on the type and standard of cooking facilities available to homeless families placed in temporary accommodation.

Mr. Baldry: The "Homelessness Code of Guidance to Local Authorities" issued by my Department advises authorities to ensure that temporary accommodation meets acceptable standards; this would include the standard of cooking facilities. It is for each authority to decide what information to hold about this.

Mackmurdo Building

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has received about the demand by Cadogan Estates that their leaseholder, the John Lewis Partnership, demolish the listed Mackmurdo building.

Mr. Baldry: No formal information has been received by the Secretary of State.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications for opencast mining have been made and approved in each of the last five years; and what was the expected quantity of coal indicated.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 24 March 1993]: This information is not held centrally. According to statistics compiled by the County Planning Officers Society's Committee No. 3, however, the information requested is as shown in the table.

	Number of applications	Number approved	Tonnage (thousands)
1987-88	90	60	13,746
1988-89	100	66	28,389
1989-90	80	49	10,525
1990-91	118	79	12,722
1991-92	91	63	10,195

Water Quality (Norfolk)

Mr. Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the six beaches in Norfolk which failed tests for enteroviruses in 1991 were not tested for enteroviruses in 1992.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 25 March 1993]: National Rivers Authority policy is to test for enteroviruses where the coliform standards were not met the previous season. Two of the six were tested in 1992, the other four met the coliform standards in 1991.

Mr. Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many inland waters in Norfolk conform to the definition of bathing area in article 1 of the water quality directive EC 76/160.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The Department is not aware of any that fall within the definition.

Conservation Areas

Mr. Alnger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list United Kingdom-designated or candidate special protection areas under directive 79/409/EEC.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Sixty-nine special protection areas have now been designated in the United Kingdom and the Government are firmly committed to designating further sites. Details of designated and potential sites have been placed in the Library.

Polluted Land

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conditions are specified for standards to which ground stabilisation and chemical pollution are to be treated for land which is subject to Government grants for its redevelopment.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Department normally expects reclamation to be carried out in accordance with the current professional codes of practice applicable to the engineering operations involved, whether they be the stabilisation of ground or the treatment of contamination.

Hedgerows

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount has been allocated by his Department under the hedgerow incentive scheme for each year from 1992-93 to 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The following amounts have been made available to the Countryside Commission for this purpose:

Year	£ million
1992-93	0·55
1993-94	1·25
1994-95	1·75

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what monitoring his Department is carrying out with regard to the implementation of the hedgerow incentive scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 26 March 1993]: Consultants have been appointed to monitor the implementation of the scheme over its first three years. Agreements made under the scheme extend over a 10-year period, under which farmers and landowners are required not only to restore specific hedgerows, but to manage positively all the hedgerows on their land in an environmentally sympathetic way. The Countryside Commission has the means to ensure that works are properly carried out in accordance with the agreements made, and to recover grant where appropriate.

Services Resettlement

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the location of blocks of flats which have been transferred to housing associations under the arrangements set up for services resettlement giving the names of the housing associations involved.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

In line with the recommendations of the Ministry of Defence's housing task force, surplus married quarters which are not suitable for sale to service personnel at a discount are now being offered in the first instance to housing associations at a discount in return for nomination rights. To date the following sales have been completed:

108 flats at Stamshaw, Portsmouth; Portsmouth Housing Association.

12 flats Renown Gardens, Lovedean: Portsmouth Housing Association.
18 flats, Ashley Court and Hutfield Court, Gosport: Portsmouth Housing Association.
12 flats, Wyvern Villas, Bristol: Haig Homes.
32 houses at Shawbury: Bromford Corinthia Housing Association.

We also have deals in Chatham, Gosport and Plymouth which we hope to complete shortly. In addition, deals in Plymouth, Woolwich, Portsmouth and Finningley are under negotiation.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total quantity of toxic waste exported from Britain to non-Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992; and what it is expected to be in (i) 1993 and (ii) 1994.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

There is no generally accepted definition of toxic waste. The nearest equivalent would be hazardous waste defined by the OECD red and amber lists. The total amount exported from the United Kingdom to non-OECD countries was 15,000 tonnes in 1990, 16,300 tonnes in 1991 and 9,000 tonnes in 1992.

We could provide an estimate for 1993 and 1994 only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fair Employment

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to introduce a right of appeal for individuals against the issuing of section 42 certificates under the Fair Employment Acts 1976 and 1989; and what steps he is taking to ensure individuals can discover the nature of the allegations made.

Mr. Atkins: There are no plans to introduce a right of appeal. This question was considered in detail before and during the passage of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 and an undertaking was given that the matter would be kept under review. This remains the Government's position.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many section 42 certificates applying to Northern Ireland Electricity were issued under the Fair Employment Acts 1976 and 1989 in each year since their introduction; and what were the numbers for the various religious categories of complainants.

Mr. Atkins: Fourteen certificates relating to Northern Ireland Electricity have been issued under section 42 of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1976 (as amended). Three were issued in 1981, three in 1984, two in 1987, four in 1988, one in 1989 and one in 1990. Twelve of the complainants were Roman Catholics and two were Protestants.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of section 42 certificates issued each year under the Fair Employment Act 1976 and its equivalent under the Fair Employment Act 1989 by employer and by religious category for public and private concerns.

Mr. Atkins: I am informed by the chairman of the Fair Employment Commission that the number of certificates issued each year under section 42 of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1976, as amended, is as follows:

	Number
1977	—
1978	4
1979	—
1980	3
1981	3
1982	1
1983	1
1984	3
1985	2
1986	1
1987	2
1988	6
1989	1
1990	4
1991	—
1992	4
1993	—

Of the complainants, 30 were Roman Catholics and five were Protestants. In 20 cases the employer was a Government Department and in 15 cases the employer was a public body or a publicly owned company.

Hospital House Officers

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new house officer and senior house officer posts were created in the Belfast City and Royal Victoria hospitals in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The information is as follows:

Year	House officers		Senior House officers
	Belfast City hospital	Royal Victoria hospital	Belfast City hospital	Royal Victoria hospital
1983	—	—	—	4
1984	1	—	1	3
1985	—	5	3	3
1986	—	—	8	9
1987	7	—	—	—
1988	—	—	8	3
1989	—	—	5	2
1990	1	—	5	3
1991	1	—	—	1

Figures for 1992 are not yet available.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new house officer and senior house officer posts were created in the Downe hospital, Downpatrick and the Downpatrick maternity hospital in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 25 March 1993]: During the period 1983 to 1991, no new house officer posts were created in the Downe hospital or Downpatrick maternity hospital. One senior house officer post was created in Downe hospital in 1989. Figures for 1992 are not yet available.

House officer and senior house officer posts are primarily for training and should not be established solely to meet a service need. Where there is such a need, the appointment of a career grade doctor should be considered.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Children's Play Facilities

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his estimate of the amount spent annually per child on play facilities by national and local Government.

Mr. Key: This information is not held centrally.

Hospital Broadcasting

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what guidance he has given to the Radio Authority regarding the priority to be attached to applications for access to the FM spectrum for hospital broadcasting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I have not given any guidance. The Radio Authority is responsible for licensing and for its procedures and priorities.

SCOTLAND

Correspondence

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 24 February, Official Report, column 653, when the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow can expect to receive a full reply to his letter.

Sir Hector Monro: Within the next 10 days I expect to be in a position to reply to the hon. Member's letter of 23 December 1992 concerning the proposals submitted by Renfrewshire Enterprise for the East India harbour, Greenock.

EDUCATION

Classroom Practice

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made of the willingness of schools to improve classroom practice.

Mr. Forth: The Office for Standards in Education has a continued programme of school inspection and reports on all aspects of education in schools. The overall impression is that teachers and schools have made considerable efforts to improve classroom practice.

Disabled Students

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the financial allocation in real terms for students with disabilities to enter university nationwide in each year since 1985-86.

Mr. Boswell: The first table shows the value of the supplementary allowances available to disabled students on first degree and comparable courses at universities and other higher institutions under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations between 1985-86 and 1992-93.

The second table shows the total expenditure on these allowances by local education authorities in England and Wales between 1985-86 and 1990-91, the latest year for which this information is available. Assistance may also be available to disabled students from other sources.

Table 1

Academic year	General expenditure		Disabled student allowances for: Non-medical personal helper[2]		Specialist equipment[2]
	Cash £	1992-93 prices[1] £	Cash £	1992-93 prices[1] £	Cash £	1992-93 prices[1] £
1985-86	555	810	—	—	—	—
1986-87	565	800	—	—	—	—
1987-88	700	952	—	—	—	—
1988-89	730	938	—	—	—	—
1989-90	765	914	—	—	—	—
1990-91	1,000	1,077	4,000	4,307	3,000	3,230
1991-92	1,060	1,098	4,240	4,391	3,180	3,293
1992-93	1,110	1,110	4,430	4,430	3,325	3,325

[1] Using the retail prices index at September 1992 prices.
[2] Additional allowances introduced with effect from 1 September 1990.

Table 2
Total expenditure by local education authorities in England and Wales on disabled students' allowances in mandatory awards

Academic year	Cash £	1990-91 prices[1] £
1985-86	106,036	142,581
1986-87	192,123	250,287
1987-88	157,586	194,599
1988-89	189,775	218,444
1989-90	186,701	201,649
1990-91	969,621	969,621

[1] Using the Gross Domestic Product deflator.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the change in the number of disabled people admitted to universities since 1987.

Mr. Boswell: The Government aim to ensure that people with disabilities are able to benefit from the higher education opportunities available. My right hon. Friend asked the new Higher Education Funding Council for England to consider how access for such students can be facilitated, and the council announced recently that it will allocate £3 million in 1993-94 for a special initiative to improve access for these students. The Government have also substantially increased the value and scope of the disabled students' allowances payable with the mandatory award. Information on the number of students with disabilities in higher education is not held centrally.

Foreign Languages (Primary Schools)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many primary schools offer a foreign language to their pupils; and to what extent the numbers have varied over the last 10 years.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is not centrally recorded.

University Students

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the latest statistics on the number of (a) students from other EC countries and (b) non-EC students attending United Kingdom universities; and if he will estimate the income this brings to the universities.

Mr. Boswell: There were 19,500 students from other EC countries and 43,900 students from non EC countries studying in United Kingdom universities in the academic year 1991-92, when estimated fee income received by universities from these students was £274 million.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many grant-maintained schools have (a) fewer than 50 pupils; (b) 50 to 100 pupils, (c) 100 to 250 pupils, (d) 250 to 500 pupils, (e) 500 to 1,000 pupils, (f) 1,000 to 1,500 pupils and (g) more than 1,500 pupils.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is given in the table. This uses latest available pupil numbers and is based on the 337 self-governing (GM) schools currently operating.

	Number
Fewer than 50 pupils	1
50-100 pupils	8
100-250 pupils	29
250-500 pupils	68
500-1,000 pupils	162
1,000-1,500 pupils	65
1,500 pupils or over	4

Assisted Places

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many people are employed on the management of the assisted places scheme; at what cost; and what plans he has for placing the management of the assisted places scheme in private hands.

Mr. Forth: The full-time equivalent of 7·7 staff is directly engaged in the management of the assisted places scheme in the current financial year and the direct staff costs are some £130,000 per annum. My right hon. Friend currently has no plans to change the existing arrangements for the management of the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list for the academic year 1991-92 those schools involved in the assisted places scheme with (a) the total number of pupils on rolls, (b) the number of assisted pupils and the percentage which (b) represents of (a).

Mr. Forth: The information requested is given in the following table:

Numbers of pupils in assisted places scheme schools in Academic year 1991-92

School name	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage of assisted pupils to pupils on roll
Abbey School, Reading	1,053	46	4·37
Abingdon	747	91	12·18
Ackworth	494	15	3·04
Aldenham	328	27	8·23
Alice Ottley	711	83	11·67
Alleyns, Dulwich	926	201	21·71
Ardingly College	651	13	2·00
Arnold School, Blackpool	1,171	76	6·49
Ashford	668	41	6·14
Ashville College	672	6	0·89
Austin Friars	308	5	1·62
Bancrofts	965	80	8·29
Barnard Castle	618	9	1·46
Bath High GPDST	626	99	15·81
Batley Grammar	609	243	39·90
Bedales	682	10	1·47
Bedford	1,111	92	8·28
Bedford High	1,013	120	11·85
Bedford Modern	1,191	160	13·43
Belvedere GPDST	567	166	29·28
Berkhamsted Girls	603	16	2·65
Berkhamsted	773	24	3·10
Birkenhead	1,077	219	20·33
Birkenhead High GPDST	950	251	26·42
Bishop's Stortford College	604	45	7·45
Blackheath High GPDST	496	85	17·14
Bloxham, Banbury	360	13	3·61
Bolton School Boys	999	263	26·33
Bolton School Girls	1,125	253	22·49
Bootham, York	350	15	4·29
Bradfield College	587	4	0·68
Bradford Girls Grammar	870	55	6·32
Bradford Grammar School	1,168	220	18·84

School name	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage of assisted pupils to pupils on roll
Brentwood School	1,155	84	7·27
Brighton College	482	115	23·86
Brighton/Hove High GPDST	718	151	21·03
Bristol Cathedral	459	133	28·98
Bristol Grammar	1,193	256	21·46
Bromley High GPDST	716	83	11·59
Bromsgrove	1,166	15	1·29
Bruton Girls	558	127	22·76
Burgess Hill Girls	577	14	2·43
Bury Grammar Boys	783	199	25·42
Bury Grammar Girls	1,141	24	1·30
Canford	501	3	5·99
Carmel College	262	70	26·72
Casterton	351	42	11·97
Caterham	723	117	16·18
Central Newcastle High GPDST	825	115	13·94
Charterhouse	698	7	1·00
Cheadle Hulme	912	126	13·82
Cheltenham Ladies College	848	12	1·42
Chigwell	644	66	10·25
Christ's Hospital	804	16	1·99
Churchers College	514	118	22·96
City of London	818	139	16·99
City of London Freemans	673	6	0·89
City of London Girls	646	109	16·87
Clifton College, Bristol	1,196	68	5·69
Clifton High, Bristol	824	43	5·22
Colfes	869	176	20·75
Colston's Girls	587	166	28·28
Colston's Bristol	729	77	10·56
Coventry, Bablake	1,957	273	13·95
Cranleigh	724	30	4·14
Croham Hurst	556	15	2·70
Croydon High GPDST	1·047	82	7·83
Culford	645	48	7·44
Dame Alice Harpur	1,007	142	14·10
Dame Allans Boys	472	118	25·00
Dame Allans Girls	449	120	26·73
Dauntseys	622	57	9·16
Denstone College	300	112	37·33
Derby High	508	10	1·97
Douai, Reading	262	15	5·73
Dover College	267	14	5·24
Downe House, Newbury	470	6	1·28
Dulwich College	1,393	273	19·60
Durham	373	21	5·63
Edgbaston College Girls	405	16	3·95
Edgehill College	496	139	28·02
Ellerslie (to 1992)	174	15	8·62
Ellesmere College	374	6	1·60
Eltham College, London	726	94	12·95
Emanuel, London SW11	757	283	37·38
Epsom College	673	23	3·42
Exeter	818	170	20·78
Farnborough Hill	488	153	31·35
Felixstowe College	339	5	4·42
Felsted, Dunmow	562	44	7·83
Forest School	1,173	128	10·91
Framlington College	710	6	0·85
Francis Holland	369	15	4·07
Friends, Saffron Walden	273	74	27·11
Giggleswick, Settle	435	9	2·07
Godolphin & Latymer	699	156	2·32
Godolphin, Salisbury	353	14	3·97
Greshams	769	10	1·30
Guildford High Girls	598	10	1·67
Haberdashers Askes Boys	1,300	228	17·54
Haberdashers Askes Girls	1,125	105	9·33
Haileybury and ISC	615	10	1·63
Hampton	891	187	20·99
Harrogate College	389	17	4·37
Headington	723	7	0·97
Hereford Cathedral	595	229	38·49
Highgate	904	35	3·87
Hipperholme Grammar	378	6	1·59
Holy Child	335	10	2·99

School name	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage of assisted pupils to pupils on roll
Hulme Grammar Boys	840	202	24·05
Hulme Grammar Girls	631	178	28·21
Hurstpierpoint College	519	13	2·50
Hymers College	939	141	15·02
Ipswich	618	74	11·97
Ipswich High GPDST	575	100	17·39
James Allens Girls	948	161	16·98
John Lyons	506	91	17·98
Kent College	740	88	11·89
Kimbolton Schools	713	15	2·10
King Edward VI High	544	125	22·98
King Edward VI Norwich	761	116	15·24
King Edward VI Southampton	945	223	23·60
King Edwards VII Lytham	616	231	37·50
King Edwards at Bath	853	110	12·90
King Edwards Birmingham	829	233	28·11
King Edwards Witley	522	72	13·79
Kings College Wimbledon	1,070	65	6·07
Kings High Girls, Warwick	553	137	24·77
Kings Bruton	347	11	3·17
Kings, Chester	596	84	14·09
Kings, Macclesfield	1,026	152	14·81
Kings, Rochester	650	58	8·92
Kings, Tynemouth	915	10	1·09
Kings, Worcester	905	179	19·78
Kingsley	586	10	1·71
Kingston Grammar	584	150	25·68
Kingswood School, Bath	483	39	8·07
Kirkham Grammar	646	79	12·23
La Sagesse Convent	507	150	29·59
Lady Eleanor Holles	806	37	4·59
Latymer Upper	1,053	325	30·86
Laxton	184	2	1·09
Leeds Girls High	949	73	7·69
Leeds Grammar	1,129	187	16·56
Leicester Grammar	565	22	3·89
Leighton Park	343	15	4·37
Leys, Cambridge	379	37	9·76
Liverpool College	687	182	26·49
Lord Wandsworth College	761	81	10·64
Loreto Convent Grammar	812	54	6·65
Loughborough Grammar	921	125	13·57
Loughborough High	528	94	17·80
Magdalen College	473	126	26·64
Malvern College	555	71	12·79
Manchester Grammar	1,430	257	17·97
Manchester High	970	172	17·73
Marist Convent Senior	406	7	1·72
Maynard	557	159	28·55
Merchant Taylors Girls	888	182	20·50
Merchant Taylors, Liverpool	846	207	24·47
Merchant Taylors, Northwood	704	67	9·52
Mill Hill	565	60	10·62
Monkton Combe	600	41	6·83
Mount Carmel, Cheshire	572	15	2·62
Mount St. Mary's College	324	69	21·30
Mount, York	327	15	4·59
Newcastle Under Lyme	1,347	419	31·11
Newcastle-upon-Tyne Church High	626	15	2·40
North London Collegiate	900	96	10·67
Northampton High	787	152	19·31
Norwich High GPDST	829	166	20·02
Notting Hill/Ealing High	764	116	15·18
Nottingham Girls High GPDST	1,072	199	18·56
Nottingham High	825	150	18·18
Oakham	1,036	15	1·45
Old Palace, Croydon	761	197	25·89
Oxford High GPDST	648	79	12·19
Pangbourne College	408	14	3·43
Perse School for Boys	651	58	8·91
Perse School for Girls	701	68	9·70
Plymouth College	876	187	21·35
Pocklington	714	133	18·63
Polam Hall	483	21	4·35
Portsmouth Grammar	1,088	191	17·56

School name	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage of assisted pupils to pupils on roll
Portsmouth High GPDST	710	132	18·59
Prior Park College	440	14	3·18
Putney High School GPDST	832	84	10·10
Queen Elizabeth Hospital	484	166	34·30
Queen Elizabeth, Blackburn	1,225	248	20·24
Queen Elizabeth, Wakefield	740	141	19·05
Queen Mary, Lytham	660	233	35·30
Queens College, London	398	74	18·59
Queens College, Taunton	699	66	9·44
Queens School, Chester	613	75	12·23
Ratcliffe College	456	69	15·13
Red Maids, Bristol	578	158	27·34
Redland High, Bristol	663	88	13·27
Reed's School, Gobham	340	15	4·41
Reigate Grammar	852	107	12·56
Rendcomb College	244	15	6·15
Repton	553	51	9·22
Rossall	782	41	5·24
Royal Grammar, Guildford	810	111	13·70
Royal Grammar, Newcastle	1,117	263	23·55
Royal Grammar, Worcester	895	254	28·38
Ryde School	628	7	1·11
Salesian College	499	54	10·82
Scarborough College	430	15	3·49
Sedbergh	458	40	8·73
Sevenoaks, Kent	914	10	1·09
Sheffield High GPDST	707	91	12·87
Shrewsbury High GPDST	610	76	12·46
Silcoates	560	6	1·07
Sir William Perkins	504	87	17·26
Solihull	1,000	21	2·10
South Hampstead High GPDST	726	68	9·37
St. Albans	670	113	16·87
St. Albans High Girls	677	50	7·39
St. Ambrose College	782	64	8·18
St. Anselms College	853	204	23·92
St. Bede's College	1,120	220	19·64
St. Bees	332	82	24·70
St. Benedict's	599	78	13·02
St. Catherine's	596	34	5·70
St. Dunstan's College	788	154	19·54
St. Edmund's College	618	80	12·94
St. Edward's College	883	396	44·85
St. Felix, Southwold	367	11	3·00
St. George's College	630	26	4·13
St. Helen and St. Katherine	508	89	17·52
St. Helen's, Northwood	920	43	4·67
St. John's College, Southsea	847	173	20·43
St. John's, Leatherhead	439	8	1·82
St. Joseph's College, Ipswich	654	81	12·39
St. Joseph's College, Stoke	477	10	2·10
St. Joseph's Convent, Reading	458	111	24·24
St. Lawrence College, Ramsgate	380	15	3·95
St. Margaret's, Bushey	471	13	2·76
St. Margaret's, Exeter	456	13	2·85
St. Mary and St. Anne	267	10	3·75
St. Mary's College, Crosby	800	235	29·38
St. Mary's Convent, Cambridge	572	110	19·23
St. Mary's Hall, Brighton	367	59	16·08
St. Maurs Convent, Weybridge	713	52	7·29
St. Paul's Girls, Hammersmith	618	62	10·03
St. Paul's, Barnes	1,161	80	6·89
St. Peter's, York	768	126	16·41
St. Swithun's, Winchester	629	0	0·00
Stafford Grammar	292	10	3·42
Stamford	962	84	8·73
Stamford High	999	87	8·71
Stockport Grammar	1,259	230	18·27
Stoneyhurst College	421	30	7·13
Stowe	588	5	0·85
Streatham Hill/Clapham High	537	148	27·56
Surbiton High	704	14	1·99
Sutton High GPDST	802	59	7·36
Sutton Valence	384	62	16·15
Sydenham High GPDST	704	126	17·90
Talbot Heath	547	140	25·59

School name	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage of assisted pupils to pupils on roll
Taunton	1,026	52	5·07
Teesside High	541	10	1·85
Tonbridge	627	2	0·32
Tormead	522	8	1·53
Trent College	638	124	19·44
Trinity-of John Whitgift	834	141	16·91
Truro	907	117	12·90
Truro High	372	61	16·40
University College School	767	70	9·13
Upton Hall Convent	606	166	27·39
Ursuline Convent, Kent	285	15	5·26
Ursuline High, Ilford	401	144	35·91
Wakefield High	1,013	147	14·51
Walthamstow Hall	505	57	11·29
Warwick	981	141	14·37
Wellingborough	795	64	8·05
Wellington College	820	39	4·76
Wellington, Somerset	838	214	25·54
Wells Cathedral	815	78	9·57
West Buckland	566	85	15·02
Westholme	1,019	15	1·47
Westminster	610	53	8·69
Whitgift, Croydon	939	108	11·50
William Hulme Grammar	791	220	27·81
Wimbledon High GPDST	758	65	8·58
Winchester College	652	22	3·37
Wisbech Grammar	628	312	49·68
Withington Girls	569	71	12·48
Wolverhampton Grammar	653	261	39·97
Woodbridge	781	113	14·47
Woodhouse Grove	735	133	18·10
Worksop	374	15	4·01
Wrekin College	339	5	1·47
Wycliffe College	598	41	6·86
Yarm	560	21	3·75
	Average proportion		13·52

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will state for each year in which the assisted places scheme has been operating the number of places available and the number actually taken up, the amount budgeted each year for the scheme and the amount actually spent.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is given in the following table for each year up to 1991-92, the latest year for which complete figures are available:

Year	Places available[1]	Places taken up[1]	Budget estimate[2] £m	Actual outturn[2] £m
1981-82	5,446	4,185	3·3	3·0
1982-83	11,058	8,616	9·3	8·7
1983-84	15,866	13,102	16·5	15·0
1984-85	20,699	17,386	22·5	22·2
1985-86	25,210	21,412	31·1	29·6
1986-87	29,295	24,478	37·4	37·9
1987-88	33,228	26,899	47·8	46·0
1988-89	33,217	27,083	55·1	50·9
1989-90	33,280	27,008	57·0	56·5
1990-91	33,302	26,740	60·4	63·4
1991-92	33,312	27,641	64·9	75·7

The figures are for England only
[1] Academic year
[2] Financial year

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Benefits

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the full year cost of increasing all national insurance benefits by (a) 0·5 per cent. and (b) 0·3 per cent. in 1993-94.

Miss Widdecombe: The Government Actuary's Department estimates are in the table.

All national insurance benefits

Year	Percentage increase	Full year cost £ million
1993-94	0·5	198
1993-94	0·3	119

Over-60s (Benefits)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people aged 60 years or over receive (a) income support, (b) housing benefit and (c) community charge benefit in each of the standard regions in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Burt: The information requested is in the tables. Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Income support recipients aged 60 or over

Social security region	Number of claimants
South Western	121
London South	237
London North	249
Midlands	250
North Eastern	236
North Western	230
Wales	90
Scotland	155
Great Britain (Total)	1,567

Income Support Recipients Aged 60 or over

Social Security Region	Number of Claimants
	Housing benefit	Community charge benefit
South West	125	249
South East	283	493
London	261	357
East Anglia	72	130
West Midlands	212	403
East Midlands	122	227
North West	242	416
Yorkshire and Humberside	159	245
North	179	264
Wales	91	139
Scotland	263	353
Great Britain (Total)	2,010	3,277

Notes:

1. Figures are thousands rounded to the nearest thousand. The totals do not sum due to rounding.
2. Source: Income Support Statistics Annual Enquiry and the Housing Benefit and Community Charge Benefit Management Information System—May 1991.
3. Income support information is not available for the standard statistical regions; the nearest alternative is given for this benefit.

Repetitive Strain Injury

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidelines he has issued to local Department of social security offices concerning the health risks of repetitive strain injury in the workplace.

Mr. Scott: Repetitive strain injury is a condition commonly contracted by those who operate visual display units for unreasonably long continuous sessions and/or in an ergonomically incorrect environment.

Since 1987, the Department of Social Security has stipulated that all VDU operators must work in accordance with a departmental information technology agreement. This agreement between management and the trade unions paid particular regard, among other things, to health and safety issues surrounding VDU usage, including ergonomic issues, and restricts the period of continuous operation to safe levels.

Employees were also issued with proprietary literature in 1991 which was intended to increase general awareness of the means by which injury to the wrist, hand and finger can be avoided.

All of the Department's VDUs are being, or have been, assessed to confirm that they comply with the provisions of new health and safety regulations which are effective from 1 January 1993. VDU users are receiving, or have received, further training on practices which will prevent repetitive strain injury. They have also been invited to contribute to the assessment process to ensure that personal ergonomic needs are met.

Diability Living Allowance

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for the disability living allowance have come from Warrington, south; how many have been successful; and how many were successful on appeal.

Mr. Scott: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

VAT (Fuel and Power)

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if those in receipt of (a) housing benefit and (b) council tax rebates will be compensated for extending value-added tax to domestic fuel and power.

Mr. Burt: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 22 March 1993 at column 511.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the national average figure for processing housing benefit claims within 14 days.

Mr. Burt: The proportion of claims processed within 14 days of receipt of all the necessary information is 76 per cent.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will announce his response to the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's recommendations on chronic bronchitis and emphysema in coal miners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: We have considered the Council's report on chronic bronchitis and emphysema in coal miners and metal production workers very carefully and have accepted the recommendation that these diseases should be prescribed as industrial diseases in relation to underground coal miners. Regulations will be laid to give effect to this from 13 September 1993.

Under normal circumstances benefit claims in respect of industrial diseases can take several months to investigate, and in this case we anticipate very large numbers of claims from miners and ex-miners. We estimate that the number of claims dealt with over the next year or so under the industrial injuries scheme could be almost doubled.

We are concerned to ensure that claims are dealt with as quickly as possible and that unacceptable backlogs and delays do not arise. We consider that this can best be achieved by a two-stage take-on of claims. The regulations will provide for claims from older miners and ex-miners to be taken first, from 13 September 1993, and for claims from other miners and ex-miners from 1 March 1994. We are devising arrangements that will ensure that seriously ill miners and ex-miners will be able to submit a claim in the first period regardless of age. Payments will be backdated to 13 September 1993, if people claim at the appropriate time and satisfy the usual conditions for the award of benefit, so that no one will lose benefit as a result of the phased take-on. Precise details of how the take-on claims will be handled will be well publicised before implementation.

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence there is on the financial effects for landlords of bed-and-breakfast accommodation of an increase in the income support paid to homeless families living in such accommodation.

Mr. Burt: In the mid-1980s, benefit regulations and procedures relating to board and lodging were substantially re-appraised and tightened in response to widespread public criticism of abuse of the existing arrangements. The persistence of such abuse led to the subsequent abolition of the special treatment of boarders within income support in 1989. Retrieval of the evidence then available could now be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensions (Report)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by Watson Europe on pensions in Britain and Europe.

Miss Widdecombe: I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library shortly.

VAT (Heating Fuels)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners and others on low incomes he expects to receive special help in Waveney with meeting the VAT on heating fuels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Information in the form requested is not available. Overall, some 8 million recipients of income-related benefits will gain from extra help. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be considering the precise way in which to target this help and his conclusions will be announced in the normal way in the autumn.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the Chelmsford parliamentary constituency are in receipt of housing benefit.

Mr. Burt [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Information for the United Kingdom is not available. However, the latest available information for Great Britain is in "Social Security Statistics 1992", table A3.05, a copy of which is in the Library. Discrete information for Chelmsford borough council, or the parliamentary constituency, is not available.

Pensions (Payment Methods)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what saving in public expenditure or other financial benefit accrues to his Department by retirement pensions being paid through automated credit transfer; and what proportion of retirement pensions being paid at present are paid (a) through ACT, (b) through post offices and (c) in other ways;

(2) how many letters he has sent in the last year to those about to retire advising them about how their pension may be paid; if all such letters gave information about pension payment through (a) the Post Office, (b) automated credit transfer and (c) other methods; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration and payment of retirement pension is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Max Madden, dated 26 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking how many letters he has sent in the last year to those about to retire advising them about how their pension may be paid; if all such letters gave information about pension payment through (a) the Post Office, (b) automated credit transfer and (c) other means; and what saving in public expenditure or other financial benefit accrues to his Department by retirement pensions being paid through automated credit transfer: and what proportion of retirement pensions being paid at present are paid through ACT, (b) through post offices and (c) in other ways.

Information relating to methods of payment is contained in the retirement pension claim form. 527,383 retirement pension claim packs were issued in the year ending 16 March 1993. Information regarding the various methods of payment is available to all applicants.

Savings arise through reduced administration costs. The average administrative cost of paying retirement pensions by ACT is three pence per payment. The alternative methods of paying retirement pensions are order books and payable orders; each payment costs an average of forty four pence and fifty one pence respectively. Additionally, ACT is not as susceptible to fraud in the same way as other methods of payment and this means further savings in public expenditure.

At the end of January this year, 69·5 per cent. of pensioners were paid by order book at the Post Office, 26·7 per cent. were paid by ACT, which includes customers using Girobank at the Post Office, and 3·8 per cent. were paid by payable order.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by his Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Goodlad: The tables list the contracts awarded by the diplomatic and aid wings of the Department for each of the last four years, and for the diplomatic wing in 1988-89. Information on contracts awarded by the aid wing in 1988-89 is not centrally recorded and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Arthur Andersen

(a) Diplomatic Wing

No contracts awarded in last five years

(b) Aid Wing

One contract only, awarded in 1991-92

Project Finance and Development, Former Soviet Union

7 weeks duration; value £450,000

Andersen Consulting

(a) Diplomatic Wing
No contracts awarded in the last five years
(b) Aid Wing
No contracts awarded in 1989-90 and 1990-91
Two contracts awarded in 1991-92
(i) Feasibility study, bread distribution Moscow
3 weeks duration; value £48,000
(ii) Bread distribution, Moscow 22 weeks duration; value £998,000
One contract awarded in 1992-93

Moscow bread project Phase II
9 months duration; value £245,000

K.P.M.G. Peat Marwick McLintock
(a) Diplomatic Wing
One contract awarded in 1988-89
Review of IT project management in FCO
one months duration; value £5,000

One contract awarded in 1989-90
Review of Information Systems Division Training
one months duration; value £14,000

No contracts awarded in 1990-91

Three contracts awarded in 1991-92
(i) Review of Information Systems Division Training Two months duration; value £22,000
(ii) Scrutiny on Training 3 weeks duration; value £15,000
(iii) Review of Career Planning 8 months duration; value £350,000
No contracts awarded in 1992-93
(b) Aid Wing
No contracts awarded in 1988-89
Two contracts awarded in 1989-90
(i) Public Service Commission, Zimbabwe
15 weeks duration; value £52,000
(ii) Economic Recovery Programme, Tanzania
14 weeks duration; value £72,000

Four contracts awarded in 1990-91
(i) Privatisation of the Ceska Insurance Company, Czechoslovakia
5 months duration; value £185,000
(ii) Public Service Review Phase 2, Guyana
6 months duration; value £812,000
(iii) Audit and Strategic Analysis of State Insurance Company, Poland
11 months duration; value £295,000
(iv) British Council Fee Rates, ODA
3 months duration; value £12,750

Six contracts awarded in 1991-92
(i) Insurance Division, Ministry of Finance, Poland
12 weeks duration; value £163,000
(ii) Civil Service Reform, Uganda
13 weeks duration; £262,000
(iii) Country Studies, climatic change: Ghana and Kenya
8 months duration; value £320,000
(iv) Public Service Review Phase IIB, Guyana
6 months duration; value £232,000
(v) Debt Reconciliation, Tanzania
3 months duration; value £100,000
(vi) Privatisation Study, Senegal
4 weeks duration; value £22,000

Nine contracts in 1992-93
(i) Agricultural Development Fund, Poland
6 months duration; value £92,000
(ii) Offshore Financial Services, St Kitts
2 months duration; value £49,000
(iii) Review of Services in OACD, ODA
3 months duration; value of £46,000
(iv) Singareni Colliery Spares Management and Incentives, India
12 weeks duration; value £163,000
(v) Procurement advice for Information Systems, Romania
one weeks duration; value £4,500
(vi) Public Sector Reform Programme, Compensation Policy, Turks and Caicos Is
10 weeks duration; value £86,000
(vii) Public Sector Reform Programme: Training Review, Turks and Caicos Is
12 weeks duration; value £86,000
(viii) Market Testing, Natural Resources Institute
6 days duration; value £5,500
(ix) Development of Costing Module, Natural Resources Institute
6 days duration; value £5,500

Touche Ross
(a) Diplomatic Wing
No contracts awarded in the last five years
(b) Aid Wing
Two contracts awarded in 1989-90
(i) Assistance to Budapest Stock Exchange, Hungary
6 weeks duration; value £41,000
(ii) Environment—CFC Consultancy, India
3 months duration; value £165,000
Three contracts awarded in 1990-91
(i) Management plan for interim multilateral ozone fund
3 months duration; value £47,000
(ii) Budapest Stock Exchange, Hungary
6 weeks duration; value £41,000
(iii) Accountant, Privatisation Foundation, Poland
4 months duration; value £92,000
Five contracts awarded in 1991-92
(i) Economic Implications of Limiting CO^2 emissions, Zimbabwe
6 weeks duration; value £122,000
(ii) Climate Change Study, Romania
4 months duration; value £50,000
(iii) Privatisation of public enterprises, Zambia
8 months duration; value £36,000
(iv) New trading floor, Budapest Stock Exchange, Hungar
19 months duration; value £295,000
(v) Privatisation Adviser, Zambia
4 years duration; value £150,000
One contract awarded in 1992-93
Phasing out ozone depletion substances, Algeria
5 weeks duration; value £8,000

Ernst and Young
(a) Diplomatic Wing
One contract awarded 1988-89 to 1989-90
Administrative and executive work on China Claim Funds
2 years duration; value £2 million
One contract awarded in 1990-91 CRAMM Review
9 months duration; value £20,000
One contract awarded in 1991-92
Advice on Heavy Baggage contract
3 months duration; value £17,000
One contract awarded in 1992-93 Overseas Estate Procurement System
6 months duration; value £59,000
(b) Aid Wing
No contracts awarded in 1989-90

Three contracts awarded in 1990-91
(i) Diagnostic studies of commercial banks, Poland
13 weeks duration; value £393,000
(ii) Privatisation assistance, Poland
6 months duration; value £225,000
(iii) Privatisation assistance, Czechoslovakia
7 months duration; value £475,000

Four contracts awarded in 1991-92

(i) Voucher privatisation programme, Czechoslovakia
18 months duration; value £740,000
(ii) Voucher privatisation, secondary market study, Czechoslovakia
5 months duration; value £200,000
(iii) Privatisation Slovakia National Insurance Co., Czechoslovakia
11 months duration; value £223,000
(iv) Assistance with privatisation policy, Stage 2, Czechoslovakia
8 months duration; value £575,000

Two contracts awarded in 1992-93
(i) Voucher privatisation secondary market study, Phase 2, Czechoslovakia
5 months duration; value £175,000
(ii) Voucher privatisation, secondary market study, Czechoslovakia
5 months duration; value £200,000

Price Waterhouse
(a) Diplomatic Wing
Two contracts awarded in 1988-89
(i) Management of Finance IT Systems
12 months duration; value £513,000
(ii) Administrative and executive work on Russian Fund Claims
18 months duration; value £3 million

One contract awarded in 1989-90
Maintenance of Finance IT Systems
4 years duration, to March 1993; value £758,000

No contracts awarded in 1990-91 and 1991-92

One contract awarded in 1992-93
Baselining Posts' Overseas Accounts System
6 months duration; value £71,000
(b) Aid Wing
Five contracts awarded in 1989-90
(i) Budget and Official Development Studies, Ghana
21 weeks duration; value £159,000
(ii) Dead Sea Chemical, Economic and Financial Appraisal, Jordan
18 months duration; value £246,000
(iii) Customs and Excise Programme Improvement Study, Kenya
13 weeks duration; value £34,000
(iv) Lesotho Highlands Development Authority, Phase II, Lesotho
54 months duration; value £525,000
(v) Trade Investment Programme, Indonesia
100 weeks duration; value £137,000
Two contracts awarded in 1990-91
(i) Word Processing Equipment, UK
4 weeks duration; value £10,000
(ii) Institutional Review, Attorney General's Office, Zambia
3 months duration; value £71,000
One contract awarded in 1991-92
Organisation and Business Review, Agrobanka, Czechoslovakia2 months duration; value £39,000
Three contracts awarded in 1992-93
(i) Traffic Costing System, Kenya Railways
3 months duration; value £60,000
(ii) Department of Statutory Bodies, Malawi
20 months duration; value £250,000
(iii) Review of Pensions, Tanzania Railways
12 months duration; value £83,000

UNESCO

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the gross and net costs of rejoining UNESCO.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: At current rates of exchange, we estimate that our UNESCO assessed contribution for the remainder of 1993 would be about £5·8 million and that our advance payment to the organisation's working capital fund would be about £610,000.

We estimate our assessed contribution in 1994 would be about £10·6 million and the advance to working capital fund almost £200,000.

There would also be additional costs as a consequence of staff increases in London and Paris. We estimate these could amount to £250,000 a year. It is not possible to estimate any compensating financial benefits resulting from United Kingdom membership.

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to announce a decision on rejoining UNESCO.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are keeping under close review a possible resumption of our UNESCO membership, but are not able to say when a decision might be taken.

North Korea

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 432, what decisions were taken at the meetings of 17 and 18 March, respectively, to which he refers; what further developments, in regard to North Korea's withdrawal from the non-proliferation treaty, have taken place since the meetings in Vienna; and if he will place in the Library a copy of Her Majesty's Government's recent communication with North Korea on the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The non-proliferation treaty co-depositaries continue to co-ordinate closely their response to North Korea's announcement. On 18 March, the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors adopted a resolution approving the efforts of the secretariat to implement the request for inspections; reaffirming the board's confidence in the director general; confirming that North Korea's safeguards agreement remains in force and requesting the director general to report to a further meeting on 31 March. We have not been in direct communication with North Korea, other than receiving notification of the North Korean intention.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency put forward to the special session of the IAEA board of governors in Vienna called to evaluate the decision of North Korea to withdraw from the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and to prohibit IAEA nuclear safeguards inspectors' access to certain nuclear facilities in North Korea.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 19 March 1993]: At the IAEA board of governors meeting on 18 March, the British representative gave firm support to the resolution subsequently adopted by the board, which approved the efforts of the secretariat to implement the request for inspections; reaffirmed the board's confidence in the Director General; confirmed that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea's safeguards agreement remains in force; and requested the director general to report to a further meeting on 31 March.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Goodlad: The market testing programmes of the diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Offices for the 12 months to September 1993 were published on pages 61 and 63 of Command 2101 on 25 November 1992. Both wings are still considering their market testing plans for the following 12 months.

Cambodia

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the massacre on 10 March by the Khmer Rouge near Siem Reap in Cambodia and about what steps are being taken to apprehend the culprits.

Mr. Goodlad: According to the UN Transitional Authority in Cambodia, UNTAC, at approximately 8.30 pm on 10 March, a group of about 18 armed men entered the village of Chong Kneas in Siem Reap province killing 35 ethnic Vietnamese and wounding a further 24. It seems almost certain that the Khmer Rouge were responsible. The UNTAC special prosecutor has issued a warrant for the arrest of the alleged leader of the attack, Loeng Daru.

Belize

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Belize on the future maintenance of a British military presence in Belize.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We are in close touch with the Government of Belize on a wide range of issues. As with all our overseas defence commitments, the British military presence in Belize is kept under review.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for how long Her Majesty's Government are committed to maintaining a garrison in Belize; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: At the time of independence it was agreed that the garrison in Belize would remain for an appropriate period. That remains the case. As with all our overseas defence commitments, the British military presence in Belize is kept under review.

United Arab Emirates

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the British ambassador to the United Arab Emirates last met (a) the Head of State, (b) the Foreign Minister and (c) the Minister of the Interior or his equivalent.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Her Majesty's ambassador to the United Arab Emirates last met the President, Shaikh Zayed bin Sultan al Nahyan, and the Foreign Minister, Mr. Rashid Abdullah al Na'imi, on 23 March. He last met the Minister of the Interior, Lt. General Mohammed Saeed al Badi, on 14 February.

WALES

Economic Base

12. Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he is taking to diversify and strengthen the economic base in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: There has been a tremendous transformation in the Welsh economy since 1979. More than 800 new factories have opened and manufacturing output has increased by 25·4 per cent. Productivity per employee has increased from £8,677 to £30,698.

Patient Treatments

13. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many in-patients and day patients have been treated in Wales in the last 12 months.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In the year to June 1992, NHS Wales treated 482,789 in-patients and 138,216 day cases, excluding those in psychiatric specialties.

Coal Industry

14. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the coal industry in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The findings of the Government's coal review were published in a White Paper on 25 March.

Structural Funding

15. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met representatives of local authorities in Wales to discuss the availability of structural funding in the Principality.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales chaired a meeting of the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on 12 January at which European regional development fund funding was discussed. Welsh Office officials are in regular contact with local authorities about structural fund matters.

North Coast Main Line

16. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning services on the north Wales coast main railway line.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations over the last year.

Redundancies

17. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of redundancies declared in Wales since 1 March.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is not available.

European Regional Fund

18. Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the European Commission concerning additional resources for Wales from the European regional fund.

Mr. David Hunt: I met Commissioner Millan on 15 March to discuss this and other issues.

Source Wales

19. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list the future initiatives he intends to take under the Source Wales programme.

Mr. David Hunt: Source Wales has been managed and developed by the Welsh Development Agency since April 1992. Future activities will include a programme to identify companies' capabilities set against world class practice; assisting the development of innovation as a standard practice; and setting up a further six supplier clubs which will bring together groups of suppliers for development purposes.

Democracy

20. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new proposals he has to improve the quality of democracy in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: My proposals for the reorganisation of local government will create accountable unitary authorities responsive to the needs of local people.

Valleys Initiative

21. Mr. Jonathan Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he intends to build on the valleys initiative programme.

Mr. David Hunt: I recently announced my intention to launch a further five-year programme for the valleys. I will be giving further details shortly.

Inward Investment

22. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about inward investment in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Wales continues to attract high levels of inward investment—206 projects were recorded in 1992, an all-time record.

Local Government Legislation

23. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to introduce local government legislation.

Mr. David Hunt: As soon as the parliamentary timetable allows.

Disability

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current financial allocation from special central funding directly towards care for disabled people in the community in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: A total of £2·565 million was made available in 1992-93 to support the development of more flexible forms of community care for elderly people and people with physical or sensory disabilities. This grant scheme will continue in 1993-94 and applications from social services authorities are currently arriving for consideration.

A total of £27·5 million is being transferred from social security resources to local authorities in 1993-94, together with a supplementary sum of £8·4 million to support the general implementation of the community care reforms. A further £1·614 million has been allocated to social services authorities in recognition of their additional responsibilities arising from the new independent living fund arrangements for the support of disabled people in the community.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses specifically designed for disabled people have been built in each housing authority area in Wales in each year since 1986.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information is given in the table.

New dwellings completed for the disabled, by district

	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
Aberconwy	0	0	0	0	0	28	15
Alyn and Deeside	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Arfon	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Blaenau Gwent	0	40	0	0	0	0	0
Brecknock	0	2	0	0	0	0	0
Cardiff	28	5	6	34	0	0	0
Carmarthen	0	23	43	10	0	0	0
Ceredigion	2	1	15	0	6	4	0
Colwyn	0	0	0	0	0	11	0
Cynon Valley	0	34	0	0	0	0	0
Delyn	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Dinefwr	1	0	1	0	0	0	0
Dwyfor	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Glyndwr	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Islwyn	19	35	0	4	0	0	0
Llanelli	0	0	0	2	0	0	0
Lliw Valley	0	2	0	6	31	30	55
Meirionnydd	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Merthyr Tydfil	0	6	11	0	0	0	0
Monmouth	0	0	21	3	15	37	0
Montgomeryshire	23	4	0	4	2	1	0
Neath	0	36	34	0	0	0	0
Newport	0	0	0	10	21	0	0
Ogwr	0	0	0	0	4	1	13
Port Talbot (Afan)	0	27	0	0	0	0	32

	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
Preseli Pembrokeshire	0	33	0	0	0	8	8
Radnorshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Rhondda	0	4	0	0	1	0	1
Rhuddlan	0	0	0	5	0	0	0
Rhymney Valley	1	0	0	0	0	0	0
South Pembrokeshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Swansea	0	10	0	0	0	0	0
Taff-Ely	0	6	0	0	0	0	0
Torfaen	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Vale of Glamorgan	1	10	1	0	2	1	0
Wrexham Maelor	11	0	20	12	19	0	0
Ynys Mon	0	0	2	0	0	25	0

Source: Local authority returns.

Hepatitis B

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many patients were found to be positive for hepatitis B antigen following screening as a result of being treated by the surgeon in Wrexham.

Dr. Gwilym Jones: Two hundred patients were identified as being at possible risk of infection. Of the 170 patients who have been tested to date, four hepatitis B positive cases are thought to be connected with surgical treatment at Wrexham Maelor hospital.

Down's Syndrome

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what special facilities are available in primary and secondary schools for Down's syndrome children in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Local education authorities and school governing bodies have responsibilities to ensure that appropriate provision is made for children with special educational needs, including those with Down's syndrome. Provision will depend on the needs of the individual child.

The Education Bill proposes a duty on schools to develop and publish policies for the provision they make for all their children with special educational needs and to report annually to parents on the implementation of those policies.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total amount of regional assistance funds to industry allocated through his Department since 1986-87.

Mr. David Hunt: Since 1986-87 my Department has paid £584·8 million of regional assistance to industry in Wales.

Council Tax

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the amount of council tax transitional relief granted to each local authority in Wales; and what is the amount of transitional relief as a percentage of the total amount of transitional relief granted in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There is no council tax transitional relief scheme for Wales.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the names of the schools which have (a) achieved grant-maintained status, (b) been given permission to go ahead and (c) been refused permission to go ahead; and if he will express each category as a percentage of the total number of non-private schools in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Since my right hon. Friend's reply of 27 January, at column 743, we have approved a further three schools for grant-maintained status. They are Maelor comprehensive, Clwyd; Ysgol Caergeiliog primary, Gwynedd; and Stanwell comprehensive, South Glamorgan. All three will become grant-maintained on 1 April. No applications for grant-maintained status have been turned down in this period.

Bees Officers

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will appoint more bees officers for Gwent.

Mr. David Hunt: It is proposed to employ seven bees officers in Wales in 1993. I am aware of concerns about possible outbreaks of varroa in Wales, although there are at present no confirmed cases of the disease. The importance of disease prevention is fully appreciated, and if any cases of varroa or other notifiable bee diseases are confirmed, appropriate control measures will be implemented.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement regarding the future assisted area status of Cardiff, Neath, Newport, Wrexham and Shotton.

Mr. David Hunt: The representations received about the review of assisted areas are currently being considered. The Government hope to be able to make an announcement on the outcome of the review as soon as possible.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 514, if he will list the principal reasons for the Cardiff Bay development corporation quinquennial review not commencing in the financial year 1992-93 as indicated at paragraph 9.13 of Cm. 2215.

Mr. David Hunt: The review will begin as soon as a suitable officer has been identified and can be released to begin the work.

Toxic Waste Imports

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will meet representatives of Gwent county council and Torfaen borough council to discuss the proposed imports of toxic waste going from Germany to the ReChem plant at Pontypool;

(2) if he will meet representatives of the community of New Inn, Pontypool, to discuss the import of toxic waste from Germany going to the ReChem plant at Pontypool;

(3) if he will make representations to the European Commission concerning the transport of toxic waste going from Germany into Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I am aware of the concerns of local authorities and the local community. The Government have already asked the German Government to ban the proposed shipment of hazardous waste from Hamburg. Our policy of self-sufficiency in final disposal for developed countries has been incorporated into the EC waste shipments regulation which will come into operation in May 1994. In these circumstances, I do not think that a meeting would be appropriate.

Business Rate Relief

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which local authorities in Wales have used their powers under section 49 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 to give uniform business rate relief; and how much relief they have given in each year.

Mr. David Hunt: The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 are as follows:

	1990-91 £	1991-92 £
Llanelli BC	—	132
Newport BC	—	125
Cardiff CC	—	295
Lliw Valley BC	1,937	728
Total	1,937	1,280

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to encourage local authorities to use their powers under section 49 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 to grant relief from the uniform business rate and to promote awareness of their powers among businesses.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no plans to issue further guidance to local authorities. Decisions on whether to give relief are a matter for them.

Public Bodies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is (a) the number and (b) the proportion of the total of registered disabled he has appointed to nominated bodies.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not collected.

Radon Gas

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to assess the danger to the people of Wales caused by radon gas concentrations in dwellings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones; The first two phases of a survey to assess the extent of radon gas in Wales have been completed by the National Radiological Protection Board. The next phase of that survey will be undertaken shortly, with the results expected in spring 1994.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Citizens Charter

30. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to review the methods used in the preparation and amendment of citizens charters.

Mr. Waldegrave: We do not set down a central blueprint for preparing or amending charters. The important point is that both new and revised charters should set demanding but realistic targets for service delivery which reflect the expressed needs and priorities of their users.

Ministerial Responsibilities

32. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of his time he spends as Civil Service Minister, Science Minister, Minister responsible for the citizens charter and adviser to Her Majesty the Queen on the estate pertaining to the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Waldegrave: This varies from day to day, depending on the issues raised in each area.

Duchy Administration (Bolton)

34. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last visited Bolton to discuss the administration of the Duchy.

Mr. Waldegrave: I visited Bolton on 24 November last year and had discussions with the chairman of the Bolton justices, the convenor of my advisory committee and other senior magistrates. Afterwards I visited the Octagon theatre which the Duchy Benevolent Fund is helping with a donation towards its refurbishment. I will be visiting Bolton again tomorrow.

Secrecy in Government

35. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to reduce secrecy within Government.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have made progress on many fronts and will follow up with further proposals in a White Paper later this year.

Science (White Paper)

36. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to publish his White Paper on science.

Mr. Waldegrave: I intend to publish a White Paper on science and technology in the next few months.

Market Testing

37. Mr. Richards: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will indicate the value of the central Government services that were market tested in the last two years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: About £25 million worth of central Government services were market tested in each of the last four years. In 1993-94, there are plans to market test activities worth £1·5 billion.

This fiftyfold increase in market testing between these years is good news for the taxpayer, because it leads to real savings, allowing the Government to deliver more, at no extra cost.

Science (Public Awareness)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what efforts have been made in the past two years by research councils to develop public awareness of science; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robert Jackson: Research councils contribute to developing public awareness of science in a number of ways. These include publications, press briefings, displays and conferences publicising and explaining the councils' work; participation in the annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science; institute open days; links with schools; and research into public attitudes to science.

Specific council activities in the past two years have included:

Science and Engineering Research Council (SERC)
"Research Horizons"—a new type of conference, held for the first time in 1992, aimed at encouraging young scientists to present their work to the media and the public
A video presenting the Council's work, winner of two top awards.
Medical Research Council (MRC)
Training of scientists in communication techniques.
Involvement in planning Science Museum exhibitions.
Natural Environment Research Council (NERC)
Extensive press and media contacts leading to feature articles, for example on biodiversity and mid-ocean ridges.
Involvement of local schools in project work at NERC institutes.
Agricultural and Food Research Council (AFRC)
Exhibitions at the Royal Agricultural Show, the Royal Welsh Show, and the ASDA Festival of Food and Farming, Hyde Park.
An annual schools competition, and a survey of pupil attitudes to biotechnology and genetic engineering.
Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC)
Completion in 1991 of a major research programme on the public understanding of science and dissemination of the results, including a conference at the Science Museum.
The "Innovation Agenda"—a recent publicity campaign to highlight the role of science and technology in economic competitiveness.

The Government attach great importance to the development of public awareness of science and welcome the contribution of the research councils in this field.

EMPLOYMENT

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will introduce the principle of the joint liability of the transferor and the transferee, in respect of obligations arising from a contract of employment, into the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by her Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information in the precise form requested is available only at disproportionate cost. However, I am able to provide information relating to 1992-93.

Nature of Contract	Duration
Arthur Andersen
Revision of TEC Guidance update	1 month
Andersen Consulting
4 contracts for technical support for new computer systems for benefit payment	1 year, 6 months, 3 months and 2 months

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Employment Department's 1992-93 market testing programme, which runs up to September 1993, covers a range of activities of which the following may be regarded as falling within the definition of "professional services":

Research and Evaluation (Employment Service);
Psychologists supporting Placement, Assessment and Counselling Teams;
Occupational Psychologists.

None of these tests has yet been completed. The programme beyond September 1993 is still under consideration.

Jobcentres

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on the performance of the jobcentres in Suffolk and Norfolk in each of the past three years in placing people back to work.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Porter, dated March 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to her about the performance of the Jobcentres in Suffolk and Norfolk in each of the past three years in placing people back to work. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The numbers of people placed in work by Jobcentres in the Norfolk and Suffolk area in the last three years is as follows:

	Number
April 1990-March 1991	41,852
April 1991-March 1992	36,270
April 1992-5 February 1993[1]	32,394

[1] The latest date for which figures are available.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Business Start-ups

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of new job opportunities under the business start-up scheme expansion announced in the Budget for East Anglia; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department's regional directors will be in touch with individual training and enterprise councils in due course to discuss the number of new opportunities under the business start-up scheme for each TEC.

Workstart

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many pilot workstart schemes for employers to create jobs for long-term unemployed she expects to set up in East Anglia; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 23 March that workstart pilots will be run by Tyneside and Devon and Cornwall TECs, and by the Employment Service in east Kent and in south and south-west London. We also recently announced a pilot community work scheme. It will be run in north Norfolk and will get under way shortly.

Community Action

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on how many of the proposed community action opportunities announced in the Budget she expects to set up in Suffolk and Norfolk and how the projects will be implemented.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have asked the Employment Service to put in hand the necessary arrangements so that community action opportunities can be available from the summer. Announcements will be made in due course of the numbers of opportunities that will be available in each area and how they will be delivered.

Disallowance of Benefit

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will publish tables for cases of disallowances of benefit for each adjudication sector and administrative region since the third quarter of 1990 to the most convenient recent date for which statistics are available for each month or quarter.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Rhodri Morgan, dated March 1993

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about publishing tables for cases of disallowance of benefit. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

To ensure that the most effective use is made of our total adjudication resource, cases where there is a doubt about entitlement to benefit are transferred between regions to match workloads with handling capacity. It does not necessarily follow, therefore, that decisions made in an individual sector office relate to cases referred by my local offices in the same geographical area or region. Information about the number of decisions made is not therefore collated or published by sector office.

Reports on the volumes of adjudication decisions given both nationally and by originating geographical region are, however, collated and published. These reports, entitled Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions, contain details of the number and type of decisions given during the period, and have been recently revised to include information on the percentage of adverse decisions. At the time of writing, this information is available up to and including September 1992 and can be obtained from the House of Commons Library.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list the individuals and organisations retained by her Department as consultants in the current andeach of the preceding three years indicating, in each case, the nature of their work.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is not available except at disproportionate cost.

Disabled People

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) which local authorities employ fewer than the 3 per cent. employment quota of disabled people; and if she will make a statement;

(2) how many disabled people are employed by local authorities in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M E G Fogden to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 29 March 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to respond to your Parliamentary Questions about which local authorities employ fewer than the 3 per cent. quota of disabled people; and how many disabled people are employed by local authorities in the United Kingdom. These are matters which, in respect of Great Britain, fall within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Tables showing the number of registered disabled people employed by a wide range of public sector employers in Great Britain, including local authorities, and the percentage of total staff represented by those numbers, are published annually in the "Employment Gazette". The information is published with the agreement of the individual employers concerned. Only those disabled people who have chosen to register as disabled under the terms of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Acts 1944 and 1958 count towards the Quota.

The tables of figures are preceded by a short article. This explains how and when the information is collected, and the formula which has to be used by employers, for the purposes of the Quota Scheme, to calculate their number of registered disabled workers and their total workforce. Both are in terms of "staff unit" equivalents rather than people.

I enclose an extract from the February 1992 issue of "Employment Gazette" this includes data on the Quota positions of local authorities at 1 June 1991. The total number of registered disabled people (in terms of staff units) employed by local authorities was 17,910. This is the aggregate total for district and country councils in England and Wales, Scottish district and regional councils, Scottish island councils and London borough councils.

I expect the tables of figures for June 1992 to be in the April 1993 issue of "Employment Gazette", which is due to be published on 8 April. A copy will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

The extract from the "Employment Gazette" has been placed in the Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Forces (Wales)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of people employed, distinguishing between (a) professional and (b) lay personnel, in each of the police forces in Wales.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The numbers of police officers and civilian employees as at 31 December 1992 are given in the table.

Force	Police officers	Civilians
Dyfed-Powys	967	272
Gwent	1,000	319
North Wales	1,356	473
South Wales	3,164	1,079

Crime (Greater Manchester)

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of males between the ages of 15 and 30 years have been convicted of at least one indictable offence in the Greater Manchester area.

Mr. Jack: The information is not available in the form requested. Nationally, 24 per cent. of males born in 1953 have been estimated to have been convicted of at least one "standard list" offence between the ages of 15 and 30 years; 33 per cent. at age 30 or less. These estimates stem from a sample of some 8,500 offenders from the offenders index. More details are given in table 1 of HOSB 32/89 "Criminal and Custodial careers of those born in 1953, 1958 and 1963", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Citizenship

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those immigrants who have been granted settlement for five or more years have subsequently been granted British citizenship.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The statistics on persons granted British citizenship do not identify when the person was granted settlement.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the effect of the proposals to reduce section 11 funding under the Local Government Act 1966 on Barham primary school;

(2) how many representations he has received regarding the recent consultative document to reduce funding under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Up to 25 March, some 500 letters, and 6 petitions bearing some 1,200 signatures, had been received in response to the Home Office letter of 26 November to local authorities and other recipients of funding under section 11. Grant will continue to be available to support all projects approved for funding, but we have invited local authorities to let us have their views on how the reduced level of grant can be deployed most effectively. It is for local education authorities to assess the position of individual schools.

Cautions

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what records there are of the level of cautions administered in each police area for the last quarter and for a similiar period one and two years before; and what proportion these are of detected crime.

Mr. Jack: Figures for persons cautioned by the police for the fourth quarters of 1989,1990 and 1991 (the latest available period) are shown in the following tables.

Figures for the proportion of detected notifiable offences that were cleared up by means of a caution are provided separately as they relate to offences rather than offenders and to a different coverage of offences (broadly all indictable offences and some summary non-motoring offence).

Persons cautioned by police force area and offence type—1991 (Quarter 4)

	Indictable offences (excluding motoring)	Summary non-motoring offences	All offences (excluding motoring)
Avon and Somerset	710	35	745
Bedfordshire	605	105	710
Cambridgeshire	613	95	708
Cheshire	888	329	1,217
Cleveland	805	239	1,044
Cumbria	383	240	623
Derbyshire	780	277	1,057
Devon and Cornwall	1,212	467	1,679
Dorset	408	105	513
Durham	280	150	430
Essex	1,114	299	1,413
Gloucester	402	78	480
Greater Manchester	2,608	1,003	3,611
Hampshire	1,634	578	2,212
Hertfordshire	587	41	628
Humberside	1,244	402	1,646
Kent	1,549	231	1,780
Lancashire	1,238	425	1,663
Leicestershire	796	297	1,093
Lincolnshire	418	60	478
City of London	102	63	165
Merseyside	1,546	1,377	2,923
Metropolitan Police	7,639	10,631	18,270
Norfolk	624	264	888
Northamptonshire	358	245	603
Northumbria	1,336	492	1,828
North Yorkshire	815	160	975
Nottinghamshire	1,632	289	1,921
South Yorkshire	1,403	563	1,966
Staffordshire	1,058	381	1,439
Suffolk	717	194	911
Surrey	541	37	578
Sussex	1,043	338	1,381
Thames Valley	1,727	568	2,295
Warwickshire	520	117	637
West Mercia	1,206	429	1,635
West Midlands	3,377	1,391	4,768
West Yorkshire	1,997	546	2,543
Wiltshire	464	173	637
Dyfed Powys	438	82	520
Gwent	630	318	948
North Wales	517	125	642
South Wales	962	487	1,449
England	46,379	23,714	70,093
Wales	2,547	1,012	3,559
England and Wales	48,926	24,726	73,652

Persons cautioned by police force area and offence type—1990 (Quarter 4)

	Indictable offences (excluding motoring)	Summary non-motoring offences	All offences (excluding motoring)
Avon and Somerset	606	137	743
Bedfordshire	434	134	568
Cambridgeshire	488	172	660
Cheshire	929	483	1,412
Cleveland	607	280	887
Cumbria	314	219	533
Derbyshire	635	346	981
Devon and Cornwall	918	446	1,364
Dorset	304	177	481
Durham	208	168	376
Essex	944	362	1,306
Gloucester	433	111	544
Greater Manchester	2,638	1,212	3,850
Hampshire	2,569	1,133	3,702
Hertfordshire	614	56	670
Humberside	1,201	514	1,715
Kent	1,127	246	1,373
Lancashire	987	371	1,358
Leicestershire	605	253	858
Lincolnshire	323	128	451
City of London	74	68	142

	Indictable offences (excluding motoring)	Summary non-motoring offences	All offences (excluding motoring)
Merseyside	1,402	1,006	2,408
Metropolitan Police	7,167	11,504	18,671
Norfolk	516	227	743
Northamptonshire	346	229	575
Northumbria	1,113	525	1,638
North Yorkshire	316	118	434
Nottinghamshire	1,117	274	1,391
South Yorkshire	1,028	545	1,573
Staffordshire	900	143	1,043
Suffolk	270	201	471
Surrey	456	45	501
Sussex	867	170	1,037
Thames Valley	1,205	523	1,728
Warwickshire	271	67	338
West Mercia	960	371	1,331
West Midlands	2,140	572	2,712
West Yorkshire	1,936	686	2,622
Wiltshire	583	181	764
Dyfed Powys	266	69	335
Gwent	330	295	625
North Wales	439	120	559
South Wales	824	561	1,385
England	39,551	24,403	63,954
Wales	1,859	1,045	2,904
England and Wales	41,410	25,448	66,858

Persons cautioned by police force area and offence type—1989 (Quarter 4)

	Indictable offences (excluding motoring)	Summary non-motoring offences	All offences (excluding motoring)
Avon and Somerset	581	86	667
Bedfordshire	237	98	335
Cambridgeshire	370	218	588
Cheshire	77	25	102
Cleveland	923	391	1,314
Cumbria	337	255	592
Derbyshire	499	352	851
Devon and Cornwall	724	470	1,194
Dorset	436	168	604
Durham	356	139	495
Essex	884	314	1,198
Gloucester	285	75	360
Greater Manchester	2,408	1,423	3,831
Hampshire	396	264	660
Hertfordshire	328	74	402
Humberside	883	466	1,349
Kent	861	199	1,060
Lancashire	735	198	933
Leicestershire	527	196	723
Lincolnshire	273	182	455
City of London	75	77	152
Merseyside	1,204	915	2,119
Metropolitan Police	6,162	11,617	17,779
Norfolk	486	221	707
Northamptonshire	264	285	549
Northumbria	1,270	609	1,879
North Yorkshire	240	139	379
Nottinghamshire	1,033	329	1,362
South Yorkshire	1,252	601	1,853
Staffordshire	961	215	1,176
Suffolk	297	160	457
Surrey	330	60	390
Sussex	630	248	878
Thames Valley	1,062	564	1,626
Warwickshire	285	82	367
West Mercia	779	403	1,182
West Midlands	2,014	429	2,443
West Yorkshire	2,036	601	2,637
Wiltshire	435	177	612
Dyfed Powys	205	69	274
Gwent	316	319	635
North Wales	367	210	577
South Wales	743	514	1,257

	Indictable offences (excluding motoring)	Summary non-motoring offences	All offences (excluding motoring)
England	32,935	23,325	56,260
Wales	1,631	1,112	2,743
England and Wales	34,566	24,437	59,003

Cautions as a proportion of all notifiable offences cleared up by police force area

Percentages

Police force area	1989	1990	1991
Avon and Somerset	9	10	9
Bedfordshire	16	10	14
Cambridgeshire	11	15	13
Cheshire	5	10	11
Cleveland	16	21	14
Cumbria	14	15	16
Derbyshire	14	17	16
Devon and Cornwall	7	9	13
Dorset	7	7	8
Durham	7	7	6
Essex	13	15	12
Gloucestershire	10	13	12
Greater Manchester	10	10	9
Hampshire	15	15	18
Hertfordshire	12	17	13
Humberside	13	12	13
Kent	14	14	19
Lancashire	8	8	8
Leicestershire	16	15	17
Lincolnshire	20	13	13
London, City of	16	15	14
Merseyside	6	7	7
Metropolitan Police	9	9	9
Norfolk	9	10	9
Northamptonshire	9	9	10
Northumbria	14	11	9
North Yorkshire	13	10	11
Nottinghamshire	11	15	17
South Yorkshire	10	9	10
Staffordshire	13	12	12
Suffolk	15	14	19
Surrey	14	17	18
Sussex	11	13	13
Thames Valley	11	13	15
Warwickshire	10	9	13
West Mercia	14	15	14
West Midlands	8	8	10
West Yorkshire	12	11	11
Wiltshire	17	16	15
Dyfed-Powys	8	9	9
Gwent	2	3	8
North Wales	12	10	11
South Wales	7	7	6
England and Wales	11	11	11

Immigration

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applicants since 1990 have been allowed leave to remain indefinitely in the United Kingdom under (a) the 10-year concession and (b) the 14-year concession; over the same period, how many applications were refused in each category; and of those refused who went on to appeal, how many of these appeals were successful.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Under the long residence concession, a person who has 10 years or more continuous lawful residence in the United Kingdom, or 14 years continuous residence regardless of legality, may qualify for the grant of indefinite leave to remain depending on the circumstances of their particular case. The information we have does not distinguish those allowed to remain indefinitely after 14 years from those allowed to remain after 10; and information on refusals and on grants following appeal is not identifiable separately in the statistics. The information we have is as follows:

Acceptances for settlement under the long residence concession (excluding dependants)

	Number
1990	2,600
1991	2,200
1992	[1]2,100

[1]Provisional.

Domestic Violence

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives his Government have taken during the last three years to help women, with and without children, who are victims of domestic violence.

Mr. Jack: The Government take very seriously violence against women. A wide range of initiatives across Government has been taken in recent years to tackle domestic violence. These are directed towards ensuring that perpetrators are brought to justice; that victims receive the necessary material emotional support, and that steps are taken towards prevention in the long term. A new interdepartmental official group has been established to co-ordinate future work, and Ministers will take forward their proposals.

Action has been taken to improve the criminal justice response to domestic violence. In July 1990, guidance was issued to the police in England and Wales and Scotland to ensure a quick and effective response. The RUC issued a similar force order in 1991. A study is in hand to assess the effects of the guidance in England and Wales. The Crown prosecution service is updating its comprehensive guidance issued to staff for dealing with domestic violence cases. The Lord Chancellor is giving detailed consideration to the recommendations for action through the civil court contained in the Law Commission report on "Domestic Violence and the occupation of the Family Home".

An increasing number of schemes and projects are being developed to provide help and support for victims. Safer cities projects have between them funded over 100 schemes aimed at the problem of domestic violence. Derby, Hull, Islington, and Tower Hamlets are funding domestic violence workers. Multi-agency groups to tackle the issue have been established in many areas. The Leicester project has set up a major initiative to fit emergency alarms to the homes of women at risk from their partners. In Hammersmith and Fulham, a scheme has been funded to support the children of women experiencing domestic violence. In Northern Ireland, domestic violence forums were set up in Newtonabbey and Lisburn in 1992 under the safer cities initiative.

The Department of Health grant aids the Women's Aid Federation (England), which co-ordinates and supports the work of refuge groups nationally. Similar annual funding is made to Scottish Women's Aid, Welsh Women's Aid, and Northern Ireland Women's Aid respectively by the Scottish and Welsh Offices and Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland.

In addition, the Department of Health is funding a national domestic violence telephone helpline run by WAF(E). In 1992-93, an extra £438,000 was provided by the Welsh Office to support projects in individual refuges and advice centres. The third edition of the homelessness code of guidance issued by the Department of Environment in 1991 advised local authorities that victims of domestic violence should be considered homeless and in priority need.

A wide range of action is being undertaken to prevent domestic violence in the long-term. A women's safety package, which includes a section dealing with domestic violence, is currently being produced by the Scottish Office crime prevention unit. Two innovative projects in Scotland, the CHANGE project in Central region and the Lothian probation project, are aimed at changing the behaviour of men who abuse their partners. They are being evaluated in a three-year study, which began in 1991.

The Government will continue to support research to inform future policy development. The Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland has been involved in a major research project over the last year into domestic violence in Northern Ireland. A draft final report on the project is presently being considered by the Department. The Home Office programme development unit is funding several innovative projects over the next three years. A 24-hour civilian team has been attached to Islington police station to help provide specialised counselling, advice and referral alongside an enhanced criminal justice response to domestic violence.

The Leeds inter-agency project is supporting a number of schemes, including the attachment of counsellors to GP surgeries to deal with the particular needs of children affected by domestic violence. In Keighley, a programme of activities will be developed on gender issues and family violence for use in schools and youth clubs. My Department is also evaluating a Merseyside police pilot project which provides alarm systems for women at risk.

Transgenic Animals

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers he has in respect of transgenic animals.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The use of all vertebrate animals in scientific procedures which may result in pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm is controlled by the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. Under the Act, the Home Office regulates not only the development of transgenic animals, but also the breeding of any such animals which may suffer harmful effects as a result of their transgenic status.

Boundaries (Essex)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Boundary Commission is expected (a) to commence its inquiries in Essex and (b) to publish its provisional recommendations for Essex.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Boundary Commission for England will shortly start work on its review of Essex and expects to publish provisional recommendations during June of this year.

Falklands War (Troops' Behaviour)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources have been allotted to the Metropolitan police to enable it to investigate allegations concerning misbehaviour of troops during the Falklands war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No additional resources have been allotted.

United Arab Emirates

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers from the United Arab Emirates have undergone training in this country in the last 12 months.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Central records show that, in November 1992, two police officers from the United Arab Emirates attended a hostage negotiators course with the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British police officers are either currently seconded to the United Arab Emirates or have been in the last 12 months.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No British police officers are currently on secondment to the United Arab Emirates under the terms of the Overseas Development and Co-operation Act 1980, nor have there been any secondments there in the last 12 months.

Hong Kong

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been given British citizenship under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: As at 20 March 1993, 67,395.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 30 March 1993

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Jury Service (Teachers)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications have been received from primary school teachers undertaking standard assessment tasks to be exempt from jury service; and how many have been granted in each of the last two years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No statistics are collected on the number of applications for excusal from jury service made, the number of applications granted or the reasons for such applications. However, applications for deferral of jury service or excusal from jury service received from teachers summoned to serve during term time, and particularly during examination periods, are treated sympathetically.

EMPLOYMENT

Disability

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether people with disabilities will continue to have priority on her Department's main employment and training programmes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The inclusion of people with disabilities in the Department's aim group has meant, in effect, that they have had priority for a place on a suitable programme. At the same time as we introduce training for work, we are strengthening the priority that people with disabilities will have on these programmes. The effect will be that people with disabilities will have priority for a place not just on one suitable programme but on each one for which they are suitable. This represents a significant enhancement of the priority given at the moment to people with disabilities.

The programmes for which people with disabilities will have priority for a place from 1 April are: training for work, jobclub, job interview guarantee, work trial and business start-up.

In addition, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in his Budget statement, people with disabilities will be given priority on learning for work and community action.

Restart

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons have taken part in the restart scheme since its inception; of those how many went on to full time employment; and what has been the total cost of operating the scheme since it began.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 30 March 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about Restart Courses. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Since they were introduced in July 1986 to December 1992, 513,736 people attended Restart Courses at a cost of around £49 million.

We do not however collect regular information on the numbers of people who subsequently start jobs. However, a recent national survey showed that 9·4 per cent. of the respondents were either in a job or waiting to start one. Many more had, of course, gone on to join another programme such as Jobclub or training.

Restart Courses are not simply about applying for jobs. Research has shown that many people suffer a loss of confidence and motivation after a long spell of unemployment. The Restart Course, which normally lasts one week, aims to help such people set new and realistic goals for themselves, to feel confident about achieving them and to develop an action plan. This will help them apply for jobs or other employment or training opportunities to help them back to work. Indeed so far this year 90 per cent. of the people who completed courses went on to apply for an employment or other opportunity. Therefore a Restart Course should be seen as a stepping stone, often a very necessary one towards more help.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administrative Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this reply in the Library of the House.

Graduate Unemployment

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information she has on the number of persons with university degrees who have been unemployed for (a) six months, (b) one year and (c) more than one year.

Mr. McLoughlin: The latest estimates (not seasonally adjusted) from the Labour Force Survey for Great Britain relate to autumn 1992, and show that of those people with a degree or equivalent qualification who were unemployed on the ILO definition, 91,000 had been unemployed less than six months, 28,000 from six to 12 months and 48,000 unemployed for over one year.

Dismissals (Written Reasons)

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether she will take steps to ensure that employees can receive written statements of reasons for dismissal after six months of employment.

Mr. McLoughlin: No. The two-year qualifying period, in line with that for making a complaint of unfair dismissal, strikes the right balance between the interests of employers and employees.

Terms and Conditions of Employment

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to ensure that the written statement of terms and conditions received by employees working over eight hours a week includes details about redundancy selection procedures.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no such plans.

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence her Department has that employers are unilaterally changing their employees' terms and conditions.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have received a number of letters to this effect, but employers cannot with impunity breach their contracts of employment with their employees.

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to publicise the new right to a written statement of terms and conditions.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: When the relevant provisions of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill come into force, the Department will issue a revised booklet, free of charge, explaining the right to receive a written statement of main terms and conditions of employment.

Unfair Dismissal

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to amend the qualifying period for employees claiming unfair dismissal for (a) full-time workers and (b) part-time workers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, currently before Parliament, will enable all employees to complain of unfair dismissal, regardless of their length of service or hours of work, if they are dismissed on maternity-related grounds, or for taking certain types of action on health and safety grounds, or for seeking to enforce a statutory employment protection right.

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to amend the law to ensure that employees are protected from unfair dismissal when seeking to enforce a statutory right.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A Government amendment to the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, introducing a new clause which will make it automatically unfair for an employer to dismiss an employee, regardless of length of service or hours of work, if the reason or the principal reason for the dismissal was that the employee had sought in good faith to enforce a statutory employment protection right, was approved in Committee in another place on 25 March 1993.

Kilburn Skills

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations she has received from Chief Superintendent David Jarvis of Kilburn and Harlesden police, North London, on the level of funding to Kilburn Skills, a training centre in the London borough of Brent; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: We have received no representations from Chief Superintendent David Jarvis of Kilburn and Harlesden police, on the funding of Kilburn Skills training centre which receives funding from both Brent council and North West London training and enterprise council. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is therefore not in a position to make a statement.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will place in the Library a copy of the final version of the 1993-94 TEC operating agreement; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have arranged for a copy of the 1993-94 TEC operating agreement to be placed in the Library. Negotiations between the Department and the large majority of TECs on the 1993-94 contracting arrangements have been completed. We expect the remaining contracts to be signed shortly.

Industrial Tribunals

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many current applications to industrial tribunals are experiencing a period of delay due to employer's insolvency (a) in the northern region and (b) in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average period of delay experienced by applicants to industrial tribunals in gaining a judgment where the employer concerned is declared insolvent.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information on the time taken between lodging a complaint and the promulgation of the tribunal decision is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The promulgation of a decision after the hearing would not normally be delayed because of an employer's financial position, and the majority of decisions are promulgated within three to four weeks of the hearing.

Multinational Enterprises

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress is being made in the EC draft directive on information and consultation in multinational enterprises; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An explanatory memorandum dated 24 March, which describes progress on the proposal to date, has been submitted by this Department to the House of Commons Select Committee on European Legislation. The proposal is likely to be discussed a number of times under the Danish presidency.

Part-time Workers

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to increase the employment rights of part-time workers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, currently before Parliament, will further increase the already substantial range of statutory employment protection rights, including for part-timers.

The Bill will give all employees, regardless of their hours of work or length of service, the following new rights:

a right for pregnant women to take at least 14 weeks statutory maternity leave; comprehensive protection against being unfairly dismissed on maternity-related grounds; protection against being unfairly dismissed or otherwise victimised for taking certain specified types of action on health and safety grounds; and protection against being unfairly dismissed for having sought in good faith to enforce any statutory employment protection right.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Training Board (Secretary)

Mr. Conway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 314, what post inspection by his Department took place of the Agricultural Training Board area office secretary based in Builth Wells whose grade changed in November 1988.

Mr. Curry: No formal inspection of Agricultural Training Board secretarial posts at Builth Wells was undertaken by MAFF in 1988. Furthermore, we have no record of any grading change affecting a secretarial post at Builth Wells in November 1988.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Curry: In the past 12 months, within the definition of professional and specialist services given on page 13 of the "Competing for Quality" White Paper, the following professional services have been subjected to market testing: the purchase of books and journals for MAFF libraries; pesticide evaluations; staff training contracts; general recruitment contracts. In all cases, the result has been the award of contracts to the private sector.

Over the next 12 months, the following professional services will be, or are currently being, market tested: IT systems, services and development; investigation services; staff training services; research and development; work carried out on MAFF's behalf by the laboratory of the Government chemist, the food science laboratory, Norwich and the central science laboratory; central services supplied to MAFF's agencies by MAFF.

Integrated Administration and Control

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ask the European Commission to delay the implementation of the integrated administration and control system beyond 15 May.

Mr. Curry: The 15 May deadline for the lodging of area aid application forms is laid down in Community legislation. The European Commission insists that there can be no later date in order that detailed checks, including on-farm inspections, can be carried out while crops are still in the ground and before the end of the set-aside period, or in the case of forage areas during the period when the land is normally grazed. There is therefore no prospect of amending legislation to extend the deadline this year.

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of badger setts, by country, closed or otherwise, seriously interfered with by or under licence from his Department's officials between 18 January and 15 March.

Mr. Soames: I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested. A copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will issue to farmers the documentation needed for them to submit area claims under the CAP reform arrangements.

Mr. Gummer: As indicated in my hon. Friend the Minister of State's reply of 29 March to the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown), at column 47, the documents for the integrated administrative control system will be sent to farmers in England and Wales on 2 April 1993. We held a press conference this morning and met representatives of the industry this afternoon to explain in full the IACS requirements. We shall continue to do what we can to ensure that farmers and their representatives are clear what they have to do to complete their application forms accurately and on time.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Teachers (Jury Service)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to amend the current jury regulations to automatically exempt primary school teachers undertaking standard assessment tasks from jury service.

Mr. Jack: I have no such plans. It is, however, open to anyone summoned for jury service to apply for excusal or deferral if they have good reason for doing so.

Police Training

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department has taken to ensure that specific instruction concerning racial incidents is included in police training courses.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The issue of racial attacks is specifically addressed at the specialist support unit for community and race relations training, which has been funded by the Home Office since 1989 and which provides training for force trainers and training managers.

Trainers who have studied at the unit are used to provide training in community and race relations matters, within forces, as part of probationer training at district training centres, and as part of more advanced training at the central planning and training unit and the police staff college.

The second report of the interdepartmental racial attacks group noted that several forces used outside help, particularly racial equality councils, to contribute to such training, and that the majority of forces have reviewed or initiated race relations policies in relation to racial incidents.

Prison Education Staff

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the implications of the recent court ruling that the acquired rights directive does apply to prison education staff from 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The implications of the judgment of Mr. Justice Ogden of 24 March in the case of Kenny and Woodroffe v. South Manchester college are being considered. South Manchester college, which was the defendant to the proceedings, has been granted leave to appeal.

United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is intended for all existing staff employed by the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service to be retained by the successor body; and what is the position over the existing UKIAS offices.

Mr. Charles Wardle: As I announced on 16 March, in columns 170-171, my right hon. and learned Friend has accepted the proposals for a successor body to UKIAS set out in the Malins report, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. As indicated in the report, the plans for transferring staff to the successor body will be in line with the provisions of Council directive 77/187 (the acquired rights directive). The planning group envisages that a nationwide service will continue, with offices in the exsisting areas covered by UKIAS.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are in hand for the successor body to the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service to advertise and appoint a director and other senior staff.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Members of the planning group established by my right hon. and learned Friend are now taking steps to establish the successor body to the UKIAS, as announced on 16 March at cols. 170-171. The recruitment of a director will be the first priority of the new immigration appeals advisory service.

Police Discipline Procedures

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will issue his consultation document reviewing police discipline procedures.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am today issuing a paper which examines police discipline procedures in the light of the considerable changes which have been, and are being, made to personnel management in the police service. I believe that the existing procedures, which date from world war 1, fail to meet the requirement of the public for a swift response to minor failures in what is expected of police officers. The present procedures are also, in many respects, unfair to individual officers and yet, where there have been serious breaches of conduct, can prevent proper action from being taken quickly and sensibly.

I have invited comments on the paper by 14 May and shall welcome views from everyone with an interest in these issues. I hope that interested parties, particularly the police staff associations and the Police Complaints Authority, will respond quickly so that there may be early and constructive discussion on the way forward.

Copies of the paper are available to hon. Members in the Library and, as usual, in the Vote Office.

Immigration

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list changes to the rules for visitors to the United Kingdom from India since 1989;

(2) what further changes he is considering to the rules for visitors to the United Kingdom from India.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No changes in the immigration rules relating specifically to visitors from India have been made since 1989, and my right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to make any.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 448, how many of the 36 nationals of former Yugoslavia whose applications to extend their visits to the United Kingdom during 1992 were refused have been removed from the United Kingdom; to which countries they were sent; and how many have lodged appeals against refusal to extend their visits;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 448, how many of the 134 nationals of former Yugoslavia whose applications for extension of stay in the United Kingdom in 1992 were refused; how many were (a) students, (b) au pairs and (c) spouses; how many in each category have been removed from the United Kingdom; to which countries they were sent; and how many have lodged appeals against refusal to extend their stay.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: Information in respect of the refusals referred to is given in the table.

Refusals[1] of applications for extension of stay by nationals of the former Yugoslavia, by certain categories: 1992

	Number
Student	34
Au pair	13
Spouse[2]	20

[1] Excluding dependants.
[2] For probationary year.

Information about appeals against refusals of applications for extensions, and about removals after refusal is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

However, no national of the former Yugoslavia removed from the United Kingdom is being removed to a war zone.

Pornography

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to amend the obscenity laws so as to include a definition of pornography.

Mr. Jack: No. The term "pornography" has no legal significance, but the Obscene Publications Act 1959 already allows the courts to determine matters related to obscenity and pornography. Like our predecessors, the Government believe that any change in the definition of obscenity would be a matter of conscience for individual Members of Parliament and not a subject for Government legislation. However, as our record shows, the Government are prepared to offer their assistance and support to individual Members who have proposals for reform, provided that these appear to us to be workable, an improvement on the existing law and likely to command sufficient support in the House.

As I said in my reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on 5 February at column 350, we are currently considering what improvements can be made in the enforcement of the Obscene Publications Act 1959 and 1964, and other legislation relating to obscenity.

Wolds and Lindholme Prisons

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total cost per week of keeping a man in (a) HM prison Wolds and (b) HM prison Lindholme.

Mr. Jack: The average weekly cost of keeping a person in Wolds remand prison from April 1992, when the prison opened, until December 1992 was £626. Available figures for Lindholme prison, a category C training prison with dormitory accommodation, for the year ending March 1992, show that the average net operating cost per inmate per week was £336. This comparison is misleading, since unit costs are higher in the period during which a prison opens and is filling with prisoners, as Wolds was doing in 1992.

Offensive Weapons

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives he proposes to reduce the carrying and use of knives and guns in the Greater Manchester area.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has no power to intervene in operational matters. I understand from the chief constable of the Greater Manchester police that he has set up a new unit specifically to deal with major armed crime. The force held an amnesty for offensive weapons last year.

Strip Searching

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what security risks necessitate the use of strip searching in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: A person detained in police custody may be required to undergo a strip search only if the custody officer considers it to be necessary to remove an article which, under the terms of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, he would not be allowed to keep. This includes any item which the person might use to cause physical injury to himself or anyone else, to damage property, to interfere with evidence or to assist him to escape.

Prison officers in England and Wales may strip-search prisoners as a routine security measure for the purpose of detecting concealed weapons, drugs, explosives and other unauthorised items.

Officers of HM Customs and Excise have powers to strip-search a person in a prescribed area if there are reasonable grounds to suspect that he is carrying an article with respect to the importation or exportation of which any prohibition or restriction is in force. Suspected possession of weapons or explosives is covered by this category.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the rights of citizens to refuse to submit to official strip searching in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: A person in police detention has no right to refuse to submit to a strip search if one is authorised by the custody officer. Where consent is withheld, such searches may be conducted by the use of reasonable force.

Strip searching in prisons is considered to be an important feature of routine security checks, and is not subject to the consent of prisoners.

A person who is required to submit to a search by an officer of HM Customs and Excise under section 164 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 may appeal to a magistrate, or to the superior of the officer concerned.

A person who is not exempt from control under the Immigration Act 1971 and who is seeking admission to the United Kingdom has no right to refuse to submit to a search of their baggage or person for documents by an immigration officer exercising powers under the Act. The power to search the person for documents is used sparingly and only where the circumstances justify it.

Political Donations

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward legislation preventing privatised public utilities from making financial donations to political parties.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have no plans to do so.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by his Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Details of the contracts awarded by the Home Office during the last five years to the specified companies, are as follows:

Consultant	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	Total value £
Arthur Andersen	—	—	—	—	—	—
Andersen Consulting	—	—	—	—	—	—
KPMG Peat Marwick	Review of prison laundries (4 months) IND Relocation Study (1 year)	Training needs in Emergency Planning Department (6 months) Crime audit of Nottingham City Council (5 months)	Review of charging procedures (1 month)	Review of organisation of PNCO (4 months)	Market testing scoping study (on going)[1]	366,465
Touche Ross	Dtels management accounting system (12 months) PNC project support office (1 month) Statistics Department strategy study (3 months) Feasibility study for replacement MIS (3 months) preparation Preparation of model agreements (2 months) Study of Accountancy requirements (6 weeks)	Passport Agency study (2 months)	Review of catering service at Fire Service College (3 months)	Survey into motivation amongst police constables (3 months) Study into effective shift systems for the Police Service (3 months) Contracting out of Prison Service catering (10 months)	Immigration Service survey of staff attitudes (5 months) Review of shift working patterns in the Immigration Service (3 months) Radio Spectrum sizing study (6 months) Emergency Planning Department message handling system (2 weeks) ED5 asset valuation (2 weeks)	922,399
Ernst and Young		Revision of Operational requirement (2 months) Provision of support for marketing and sales activity (Arthur Young prior to Amalgamation) (3 years) Services of temporary marketing manager (Arthur Young) prior to Amalgamation (9 months)	Privatisation of the IBA Terrestrial Transmission Service (1 year) Validation of IT Strategy (3 months) Court escort area service (2 months) PROMIS/SPITS strategy study (3 months)	Consultancy assistance in ensuring VFM from the court escort service (1 month) Firearms Licensing Costs (1 month) Artificial intelligence feasibility study (2 months)	Market testing scoping study (on going)[1] Police roles and responsibilities (4 months) ICL domain review (2 months)	1,494,807
Price Waterhouse		Preliminary financial advice in privatisation of the IBA (2 months)	Advice on merits of computer programme (1 week)	Marketing strategy for Prison Service clothing and texture group (3 months)	Market testing consultancy support (6 months)	1,330,913

Consultant	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	Total value £
		Transmission Service (10 months)	Study into television licence fee (1 month)	Marketing survey (3 months)
		Provision of financial advice on the privatisation of the IBA transmission service (10 months)	Police activity sampling a pilot study (4 months)

[1] Where a fixed price contract has not been completed, duration is described as "on-going".

Prison Service Union

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on his policy concerning recognition of the Prison Service Union; and what progress has been made in granting recognition.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The director general of the prison service met representatives of the Prison Service Union on 2 March for a wide-ranging discussion on prison matters. He said at that meeting that their request for recognition was being considered, but that the issues were such that an early decision was unlikely.

Convictions

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of recorded crime in Cornwall and Devon has led to successful convictions in each of the last five years for which there are figures; what were the average figures for England and for the United Kingdom for the same years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what proportion of crimes led to successful convictions in each of the last five years for which figures are available for each county; what was the average figure (a) for England, (b) for Wales and (c) the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what proportion of recorded crimes have led to successful convictions in each of the last five years for which there are figures, in each county in England and Wales; what were the average figures for England, Wales and for the United Kingdom for the same years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack [holding answers 1 and 2 March 1993]: The information is not available. Information on recorded offences and court proceedings is compiled on different bases and a measure that combines the two therefore cannot be prepared. Figures for crimes cleared up by means of charge or summons were given in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) on 4 February at columns 291-92.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Zimbabwe

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Government of Zimbabwe concerning the proposed treaty on drought and desertification.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None.

Afghanistan

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, how he proposes to respond to the UN Secretary General's appeal for humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government will make an immediate pledge of £7·5 million. This sum will be allocated as follows:

£3 million for the UN High Commissioner for Refugees to support its programme of assistance to returning refugees from Pakistan and Iran;

£1 million for the International Committee of the Red Cross;

£1 million for the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan, for mine clearance;

£1·6 million to respond to requests from non-governmental organisations involved in relief, rehabilitation and development work;

£0·9 million food aid contribution through the World Food Programme.

This pledge is in addition to over £80 million of humanitarian aid provided by Britain for Afghanistan since 1980, of which £7·55 million has been disbursed in 1992-93 in response to an earlier UN appeal.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many and what percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall in his Department are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled people.

Mr. Key: The numbers and percentages of women in the Department of National Heritage and the Historic Royal Palaces Agency in grades 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 are as follows:

Grade	Number of Staff	Number of Women	Percentage of Women
1A	1	0	0
2	—	—	—
3	4	1	25
4	1	0	0
5	19	7	37
6	8	3	38
7	52	9	17

We are able to identify the number of women amongst our staff from our basic staff records. As a new Department, we will not, until 1 April 1993, have complete personnel records or a personnel database covering all our staff. It is our intention to carry out an ethnic origin survey and disability survey as soon as possible after that date.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps are currently taken by his Department to monitor the effectiveness of the equal opportunities provision within the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Mr. Brooke: Channel 3 and Channel 4 licences include conditions on equal opportunities for employment. The Independent Television Commission is responsible for monitoring licence conditions.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people respectively, in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Key: Recruits to the senior grades of the Department of National Heritage, as to any grade in the civil service, are selected on merit, on the basis of fair and open competition, unless one of the exceptions permitted under the Civil Service Order in Council 1991 applies. Various steps have been taken by the civil service commissioners to aid recruitment from all sectors of the community including: extending links with institutions of higher education; equal opportunities training for those involved in selection; using validated selection procedures.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when his Department last conducted surveys of (a) the ethnic origins and (b) women among its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: For women, there is no need for particular surveys, as the sex of employees is identified in our basic staff records. As a new Department, we will not, until 1 April 1993, have personnel records or a personnel database covering all our staff, and it is our intention to carry out an ethnic origin survey as soon as possible after that date.

Royal Armouries Museum

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to attract private sector funding for the proposed move of the royal armouries museum to Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The Department is contributing £20 million to the project, and further contributions are being made by Leeds development corporation and Leeds city council. Merchant bankers acting for the armouries have now circulated a briefing memorandum to potential investors, who will be invited to contribute the rest of the estimated cost of £42 million. The Government fully support this important project, which will bring significant benefits to Leeds.

Albert Memorial

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the condition of the fabric of the Albert memorial; and what plans he has to restore and conserve it.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 29 March 1993]: A condition survey carried out in 1991 identified the need for considerable repairs to the ironwork, leadwork, stonework, decorative tiling, statues and mosaics. A restoration scheme has therefore been prepared which addresses all these matters. The estimated cost of restoration is over £10 million. In view of the many demands on public resources at a time of very tight public expenditure control, I have had to postpone a start on this project. However, the Government remain committed to a worthy restoration of the Albert memorial. In the meantime, the protection and safety of the memorial is being assured.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall in his Department are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled people.

Mr. Goodlad: Figures for the Diplomatic wing are:

(a) Women:

Grade	Total staff		Number of women in grade		Women as a percentage of total in grade
1	7		—		—
2	33	149	1	5	3·0	3·4
3	109		4		3·7
4	1		—		—
5	303		13		4·3
6	91		6		6·6
7	492		74		15·0
Overall	6,400		2,265		35·4

(b) Ethnic minorities:

Grade	Total staff		Staff who have declared themselves to be of ethnic minority origin
			Number	As a percentage of total in grade[1]
1	7		—	—
2	33	149	—	—
3	109		—	—
4	1		—	—
5	303		—	—
6	91		—	—
7	492		4	0·8
Overall	6,400		170	2·7

[1] Response rate in voluntary ethnic survey: 89 per cent.

(c) The Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Diplomatic Wing) employs no registered disabled staff in grades 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 or 7. One officer at grade 5 is registered disabled (0·3 per cent. of the grade). Overall 26 staff (0·4 per cent. of the workforce) are registered disabled.

Figures for the aid wing are:

(a) Women

	Total staff	Women	Per cent.
Grades 1-3	12	0	(0)
Grade 5	51	8	(15·6)
Grade 6	87	11	(12·6)
Grade 7	249	40	(16)
Overall	1,932	830	(43)

These figures include the Natural Resources Institute.

(b) Ethnic minorities

	Total respondents	Ethnic minority staff	Per cent.
Grades 1-3	10	0	(0)
Grade 5	42	1	(2·4)
Grade 6	51	1	(2·0)
Grade 7	128	1	(0·8)
Overall	1,297	106	(8·2)

These figures exclude the Natural Resources Institute.

Disabled Staff

(c) No staff in grades 1 to 7 are disabled.
Overall 26 staff are disabled (1·34 per cent.) These figures include the Natural Resources Institute.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people respectively, in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Goodlad: Recruits to the senior grades, as to any grade in the civil service, are selected on merit on the basis of fair and open competition, unless one of the exceptions permitted under the Civil Service and Diplomatic Service Order in Council 1991 applies. Various steps have been taken by the civil service commissioners to aid recruitment from all sectors of the community, including: extending links with institutions of higher education; equal opportunities training for those involved in selection; using validated selection procedures.

All recruitment advertising and literature makes clear that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is an equal opportunities employer. This message is underlined at the numerous careers events across the country at which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is represented. The diplomatic wing has set up a cadre of volunteers from amongst its staff of ethnic minority origin to represent the Department at such events. Its recruitment brochure for the fast stream of the diplomatic service includes a positive action message for women.

In the aid wing, job advertisements for all vacancies for senior positions carry a statement confirming that the Overseas Development Administration is an equal opportunities employer. By the application of published criteria, the aid wing ensures that all suitably qualified candidates are considered objectively for appointment.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department last conducted surveys of (a) the ethnic origins and (b) women among its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office conducted their original surveys of ethnic origins in 1986. They have been continuously updated since then. The aid wing's agency, the Natural Resources Institute, is undertaking a major exercise to update its database. The gender of employees is identified in staff records. Statistics are updated at regular intervals.

Dietary Supplements

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the implications for the availability of vitamin, mineral and other dietary supplements of the agreements on subsidiarity reached at the Edinburgh summit.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Commission has not tabled proposals specifically aimed at controlling dietary supplements. Any such proposals would need to be judged against the subsidiarity criteria in the normal manner.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the European Commission has yet completed the review of its work programme commenced as a result of the agreements on subsidiarity reached at the Edinburgh summit; and what information he has about the possible inclusion within that programme of the production of a directive on dietary supplements.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No; work continues. Dietary supplements was not an area specified in the Commission's initial subsidiarity review. It is not clear whether or not the Commission intends to pursue an initiative on dietary supplements.

North Korea

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he possesses regarding the status of the Yongbyong nuclear facility in North Korea.

Mr. Douglas Hogg; International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors have conducted six inspections at the Yongbyon nuclear facility. They have since asked to inspect two further undeclared sites in Yongbyon, which the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea have refused, in breach of their safeguards agreement with the agency.

Indonesia

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with Indonesia.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom maintains friendly and constructive relations with Indonesia. We are contributing substantially to Indonesia's development in key industrial sectors, and the opportunities for British business are enormous. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is looking forward to his visit there later this week.

Pakistan (Chieftain Tanks)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Government of India concerning the sale of Chieftain tanks to Pakistan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There have been no representations to us by the Government of India about the possibility of the sale of Chieftain tanks to Pakistan.

Hong Kong

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if pensions earned by retired members of the Hong Kong Government now living outside Hong Kong are paid in Hong Kong dollars or in the local currency.

Mr. Goodlad: Hong Kong Government pensions are payable in Hong Kong dollars, irrespective of where the recipients reside. In the case of United Kingdom officers who have retired in the United Kingdom, they may be paid in pounds sterling by the Crown Agents at the prevailing rate of exchange.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what agreement has been reached with the Chinese Government regarding the payment of pensions to retired civil servants of the Hong Kong Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: We reached the following agreement with the Chinese Government in the Sino-British Joint declaration of 1984:

"The Hong Kong Special Administrative Region Government shall pay to such persons (public servants) who retire or complete their contracts, as well as to those who have retired before 1 July 1997, or to their dependants, all pensions, gratuities, allowances and benefits due to them on terms no less favourable than before, and irrespective of their nationality or place of residence."

This provision is repeated in the Basic Law, the Chinese constitution for Hong Kong after 1997.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the adequacy of pension arrangements of Hong Kong retired civil servants who now live outside the colony.

Mr. Goodlad: Hong Kong Government pensioners, wherever they reside, have the option of having their pensions paid directly by the Hong Kong Government or the Crown Agents in the United Kingdom. As far as we are aware, both methods of payments have proved to be satisfactory.

Commercial Attachés

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many commercial attachés are currently serving in British embassies and high commissions overseas; in what countries; and how many had worked in industry before their appointment to the diplomatic service.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Porter) on 10 March at column 602. Commercial work is part of the responsibility of all our bilateral ambassadors and high commissioners and all our senior diplomats overseas have an understanding of the importance of commercial diplomacy and trade promotion.

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs from which articles, their paragraphs or their parts, Denmark is excluded from the obligations contained in title V of the treaty on European union, quoting in each instance the relevant parts of the Edinburgh decision and related treaty article.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The decision on Denmark agreed at Edinburgh clarified, although it does not alter, either the text of the treaty on European union, or the obligations taken on by those who ratify the treaty. That applies to title V of the treaty as it does to other provisions. At Edinburgh, Heads of Government noted that Denmark does not participate in the elaboration and implementation of decisions and actions of the union which have defence implications.

EC Economic and Social Committee

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the members of the United Kingdom delegation to the European Community Economic and Social Committee.

Mr. Garel-Jones:

Mr. Neville Beale
Mr. Michael Bell
Mr. John Little
Mr. Kenneth Gardner
Dr. Felix Kafka
Mr. Michael Mobbs
Dr. Ann Robinson
Mr. John Whitworth
Mr. Campbell Christie
Mr. Peter Dawson
Mr. Tom Jenkins
Mr. John Lyons
Miss Ada Maddocks
Mr. William Morris
Mr. Roy Sanderson
Mr. Alexander Smith
Mr. Wilfred Aspinall
Mrs. Jocelyn Barrow
Professor William Black
Mrs. Angela Guillaume
Mr. Robert Moreland
Mr. Michael Strauss

Yugoslavia

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy regarding the acquisition of information on possible breaches of international conventions or treaties relating to the conduct of hostilities in the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is collecting substantiated information about violations of international humanitarian law which will be submitted to the UN commission of experts.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts relating to the acquisition of information on possible breaches of international conventions or treaties relating to the conduct of hostilities in the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None. However, the issue has been discussed with EC partners at regular intervals.

South Africa

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what grants or donations the Foreign Office has given to the South African Rugby Football Union in the last five years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: To mark the unification of the bodies that had previously controlled rugby union in South Africa, the British embassy in Cape Town donated 125,000 rand to the South African Rugby Football Union's township development programme in April 1992. A similar amount had previously been donated to mark the unification of the bodies controlling cricket in South Africa.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Court of Justice

Dr. Godman: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 650, if he will list the rulings sought by courts as provided in article 177 of the treaty of Rome and the decision given by the court in each case.

The Attorney-General: Details of the cases referred to the European Court of Justice under article 177 by each of the named courts in the last five years are set out in the table.

Number of the Case	Name of the Case	White Paper reference/ Law Report (if available)
A. Magistrates Courts 9 references.
C 118/88	Suffolk Coastal District Council v. Nottcutts Garden Centres Ltd.	Cm. 467
C 134/88	Solicitor for Mansfield District Council v. Payless DIY Ltd.	Cm. 467
C 145/88	Torfaen Borough Council v. B & Q plc	Cm. 1023/ (1989) ECR 3851
C 166/88	The City of Wakefield Metropolitan District Council v. B & Q plc	Cm. 467
C 195/88	Shrewsbury and Atcham Borough Council v. B & Q plc	Cm. 641
C 232/88	Derry City Council v. Hampden Homecare plc	Cm. 641
C 291/88	Torfaen Borough Council v. Texas Homecare Ltd.	Cm. 801
C 304/90	Reading Borough Council v. Payless DIY Ltd. and Others	White Paper not yet published
C 116/91	Licensing Authority South Eastern Traffic Area v. British Gas plc	Cm. 2065/ (1992) 3 CMLR 65
B. Crown Court 4 references.
C 23/89	Quietlynn Limited v. Southend Borough Council	Cm. 801/ (1990) ECR 3059
C38/90	R. v. Thomas Edward Lomas	Cm. 1234/ (1992) 2 CMLR 653
C 151/90	R. v. Fletcher Prichard and North Riding Lamb Limited	Cm. 2065
C 116/92	Huyton Wilson and Charlton v. Crown Prosecution Service	White Paper not yet published
C. High Court 22 references.
C 126/88	The Boots Company plc v. Her Majesty's Commissioners of Customs and Excise	Cm. 1234
C 174/88	R. v. Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal ex parte Hall and Sons (Dairy Farmers) Ltd.	Cm. 1234
C 306/88	Rochdale Borough Council v. Anders	Cm. 2065
C 331/88	R. v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and Secretary of State for Health ex parte FEDESA	Cm. 1457/ (1990) ECR 4023
C 372/88	MMB v. Cricket St. Thomas Estate	Cm. 1234/ (1990) 2 CMLR 800
C 71/89 and C 72/89	R. v. IBAP ex parte BEOCO and Others	Cm. 1457
C 221/89	R. v. Secretary of State for Transport ex parte Factortame Ltd. and Others	Cm. 1857/ (1991) 3 CMLR 589
C 292/89	R. v. IAT ex parte Antonissen	Cm. 1657/ (1991) 2 CMLR 373
C 350/89	Sheptonhurst Ltd. v. Newham London Borough Council	Cm. 1657/ (1991) 3 CMLR 463
C 84/90	R. v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ex parte J. J. Dent and another	Cm. 2065/ (1992) 2 CMLR 597
C 243/90	R. v. Secretary of State for Social Security ex parte Smithson	Cm. 2065/ (1992) 1 CMLR 1061
C 370/90	R. v. IAT (1) and Surinder Singh (2) ex parte Secretary of State for the Home Department	White Paper not yet published

Number of the Case	Name of the Case	White Paper reference/ Law Report (if available)
C 9/91	R. v. Secretary of State for Social Security ex parte EOC	Cm. 2065
C 200/91	Coloroll Pension Trustees Ltd. v. J. R. Russell and Others	Cm. 2065
C 321/91	R. v. Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce ex parte Tara Meat Packers Ltd.	Cm. 2065
C 2/92	R. v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	Cm. 2065
C 11/92	R. v. Secretary of State for Health ex parte Gallaher Ltd. and Others	Cm. 2065
C 124/92	An Board Bainne Co-Operative Ltd. and Another v. IBAP	White Paper not yet published
C 128/92	H. J. Banks and Co. Ltd. v. British Coal Corporation
C 275/92	Her Majesty's Customs and Excise v. Gerhart and Jorg Schindler	White Paper not yet published
C 432/92	R. v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ex parte S. P. Anastasious Ltd. and Others
D. Court of Appeal 10 references
C 262/88	Barber v. Guardian Royal Exchange	Cm. 1234/ (1990) 2 CMLR 513
C 301/88	R. v. IBAP ex parte Fish Producers Organisation	Cm. 1457/ (1990) ECR 3803
C 15/90	D. M. Middleburgh v. Chief Adjudication Officer	Cm. 1857/ (1992) 1 CMLR
C 1991/90	Generics (UK) Ltd. and Another v. Smith Kline and French Laboratories Ltd.	White Paper not yet published
C 63/91	Sonia Jackson v. Chief Adjudication Officer	White Paper not yet published
C 64/91	Patricia Cresswell v. Chief Adjudication Officer	White Paper not yet published
C 127/92	Dr. Enderby v. Frenchay Health Authority (1) and Secretary of State for Health (2)	White Paper not yet published
C 132/92	Mrs. F. M. Roberts v. Birds Eye Walls Ltd.	White Paper not yet published
C 406/92	The Owners of Cargo lately laden on board the ship "Tatry" v. The Owners of the Ship "Maciej Rataj"
C 410/92	Elsie Rita Johnson v. Chief Adjudication Officer
E. House of Lords 5 references
C 188/89	Foster and Others v. British Gas plc	Cm. 1457/ (1990) ECR 3313
C 213/89	R. v. Secretary of State for Transport ex parte Factortame Limited and Others	Cm. 1234
C 169/91	Stoke and Norwich City Councils v. B & Q plc	Cm. 1857
C 271/91	Her Majesty's Marshall v. Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority	Cm. 1857
C 328/91	R. v. Secretary of State for Social Security ex parte Thomas and Others	Cm. 2065

Mr. Ghazanfer Ali

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 15 March, Official Report, column 34, what information he has received about the outcome of court proceedings in Pakistan concerning Mr. Ghazanfer Ali.

The Prime Minister: The two murder charges facing Mr. Ghanzanfer Ali were heard on 13 and 14 March. Both cases were adjourned until 8 and 12 April. We shall continue to watch developments.

World Forestry Organisation

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what representation he has had from Professor Ingvar Carlsson, former Prime Minister of Sweden, on the establishment of a world forestry organisation; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: None. Ambassador Ola Ullsten announced at the recent global forestry conference in Indonesia an initiative to establish a world commission on forestry and sustainable development. The Ministers concerned know of the initiative and expect to receive more information about it shortly.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people respectively in top grades of employment at the Cabinet Office.

The Prime Minister: Recruits to the senior grades, as to any grade in the civil service, are selected on merit on the basis of fair and open competition, unless one of the exceptions permitted under the Civil Service Order in Council 1991 applies. Various steps have been taken by the civil service commissioners to aid recruitment from all sectors of the community, including: extending links with institutions of higher education; equal opportunities training for all those involved in selection; using validated section procedures.

The Cabinet office, which has signed up domestically to Opportunity 2000, is working towards achieving the civil service-wide benchmark of increasing the proportion of women in the top three grades to 15 per cent. or more by the year 2000. The Department continually seeks to encourage the employment of people from the enthnic minorities and those with disabilities.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister when the Cabinet Office last conducted surveys of (a) ethnic origins and (b) the number women among its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A survey of the ethnic origins of all non-industrial civil servants was completed in 1988. The Cabinet Office introduced a computerised personnel database in 1991. All staff were given the opportunity to update their own entries, which include sections on ethnic origins. All new staff are given the opportunity to complete an ethnic monitoring questionnaire. There are no firm plans to conduct further surveys. The sex of employees is identified in staff records.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in to the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Associations

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses and flats have been built by housing associations in the London borough of Ealing, what were the associations concerned, the locations and the cost at 1993 prices in each of the past 10 years; how many future such developments are planned and at what locations and cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My Department does not keep the detailed records which would allow me to answer this question. I have referred it to the Housing Corporation and asked it to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities in England which are debt free.

Mr. Squire: Returns to the Department indicate that the following local authorities are debt-free for the purposes of the capital control system. The list shows authorities which had no money outstanding by way of longer-term borrowing at 31 December 1992, and a nil or negative credit ceiling at 31 March 1992.

Bedford
Bracknell Forest
Broadland
Chiltern
Christchurch
City of London
Dorset
Mid Sussex
Ryedale
St. Edmundsbury
Sevenoaks
South Bucks
Swale
Tunbridge Wells
West Sussex

Avon and Somerset Police Authority
Devon and Cornwall Policy Authority
Peak Park Planning Board

Unitary Development Plans

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for which local authorities in London and the south-east of England unitary development plans (a) have been completed, (b) have not been completed, (c) are currently out to consultation and (d) are currently subject to public inquiry; and in respect of which plans he has issued his report.

Mr. Baldry: The London borough of Barnet adopted its unitary development plan in November 1991, and the London borough of Havering is due to adopt its UDP on 31 March 1993. All other London boroughs are currently preparing UDPs. Outside London, district authorities in the south-east of England do not prepare UDPs, but are required to prepare district-wide local plans.

UDPs for the London boroughs of Hillingdon, Newham, Camden and Croydon are at consultation stage; those for the London boroughs of Barking, Merton, Brent, Bexley, Tower Hamlets, Lambeth, Haringey and Lewisham are on deposit for public inspection.

The London boroughs of Hounslow, Kensington and Chelsea, Wandsworth, Richmond and Kingston are currently holding public inquiries into objections to their UDPs; the following London boroughs have completed their public inquiries: Islington, Redbridge, Sutton, Enfield, Southwark, Bromley, Greenwich, the City of London, Waltham Forest, the City of Westminster, Harrow, Hammersmith and Fulham, Hackney and Ealing.

Following a public inquiry, the inspector makes his recommendations direct to the local authority. The Secretary of State does not issue reports in respect of development plans.

Council Tax

Mr Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the amounts of council tax transitional relief granted to each (a) London borough, (b) other metropolitan boroughs and (c) other local authorities in England; and what is the amount of transitional relief as a percentage of the total transitional relief granted.

Mr. Squire: Authorities have been invited to submit claims for council tax transitional reduction scheme grant for 1993-94. We have no estimates of the amount of each authority's grant entitlement.

Birds

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Joint Nature Conservancy Council inventory of marine sites of importance to birds to be produced.

Mr. Maclean: At present the Joint Nature Conservation Committee has no plans to produce such an inventory. The former Nature Conservancy Council published survey results of the most important areas for seabirds in the North sea and west of Britain, in 1987 and 1990 respectively. The JNCC's remaining survey work in the English channel and south-west approaches is about to be completed.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how he intends to safeguard the wider coastal and marine environment under the EC habitats and species directive.

Mr. Maclean: The Government's proposals for implementing the EC habitats and species directive will be issued in due course.

Coastal Zones

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action is being taken by his officials to pursue the proposed EC directive on coastal zone planning and management.

Mr. Maclean: At present, the Commission has not published a proposed directive on coastal zone planning. The Government will take an active part in seeking to ensure that any proposals that come forward are workable and effective.

Rented Property

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce legislation that requires landlords to ensure regular servicing of appliances fitted within their properties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Housing (Management of Houses in Multiple Occupation) Regulations 1990 require managers of houses in multiple occupation to observe proper standards of management and to keep existing facilities in good repair. These facilities include gas and electric appliances, and sanitary and cooking facilities. Failure to comply with the regulations is a criminal offence.

Private landlords also have certain statutory obligations to carry out repairs and maintenance under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. These include ensuring that the installations for the supply of gas and electricity and for space and water heating are kept in proper working order.

Homelessness

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what statutory responsibility local authorities have to offer homeless families a choice in the type of temporary accommodation they are offered.

Mr. Baldry: Local authorities have no statutory responsibility to offer a choice of temporary accommodation; this is a matter for their discretion in the light of local circumstances.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provision he is making for the homeless people about to be evicted from the cold weather shelters; and how many beds are currently provided by those shelters.

Mr. Baldry: Under the Government's £96 million rough sleepers initiative, we have provided funding of £1·5 million for this year's winter shelter programme, which at its height provided 400 extra bedspaces in nine winter shelters in central London. The purpose of the winter shelter programme was only to provide shelter for people in central London who would otherwise sleep rough over the winter months. The shelters will close at the end of March.

Currently, around 170 of the 400 places are still in use; over 50 of these people have accepted offers of other accommodation, and the voluntary organisations running the shelters are continuing to help find alternative accommodation for those that remain. In doing so, they will be assisted by two new hostels funded under the RSI which opened this month, and which will provide a further 100 bed spaces; by vacancies in other London hostels; and by an estimated 100 units of permanent accommodation provided under the RSI becoming available in the last two weeks of March.

East Thames Corridor

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total public funding being committed to his plans to encourage development on the east Thames corridor.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's preferred approach to the east Thames corridor is to put in place a planning framework which will seek to maximise the development benefits of public investment in infrastructure and urban regeneration over the next 20 years. It is not possible to estimate the total of public expenditure in the area over that period.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what effect the census validation survey has on the distribution of the standard spending assessments of population estimates for local authorities; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect on the level of grant through the standard spending assessment formula population estimates to metropolitan district authorities of the under-enumeration formulas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Squire: The effect of the census validation survey has been to ensure that the mid-1991 population figures produced by the registrar general for use in the calculation of standard spending assessments are as accurate as possible.

We have looked most carefully at the mid-1991 population figures based on the 1991 census results, given their implications for standard spending assessments and revenue support grant entitlements. We are satisfied that the methods the registrar general has employed to produce these estimates, particularly in relation to the allocation of census under-enumeration, are the most appropriate in the circumstances and do not disadvantage metropolitan or any other class of authorities.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take to adjust the standard spending assessments population estimates for Leeds and Wakefield because of the under-enumeration following the OPCS survey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Squire: The provisional mid-1991 population figures used in the calculation of the 1993-94 standard spending assessments already include allowances for the under-enumeration identified from the OPCS census validation survey.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he uses to allocate under-enumerations of population to local authorities for standard spending assessment purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Squire: It is the registrar general who is responsible for preparing the population figures used in the calculation of standard spending assessments, including the formulation of criteria for allocating estimates of under-enumeration to local authority areas. He has set out the methods used to compile his figures in the OPCS monitor PP1 92/1, a copy of which is in the Library.

Landfill

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the preliminary study prepared by Cooper and Lybrand on the subject of a levy on landfills and licensed rubbish dumps.

Mr. Maclean: A copy of the report "Landfill Costs and Prices: Correcting Possible Market Distortions" by Coopers and Lybrand was placed in the Library of the House on 9 February 1993.

Urban Programme

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources will be made available for the urban programme in 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Squire: I am pleased to announce a substantial urban programme funding package for 1993-94. Allocations to the 57 urban programme authorities in England for 1993-94 total £163 million. These resources will fund projects which have been approved in this and previous financial years. The allocations are set out in the table.

An additional £20 million is being provided for urban partnership fund projects as part of the new capital partnership programme. Successful project bids under this initiative were announced by my right hon. and learned Friend, on 12 February 1993 [Official Report columns 834-35]. Together with the £232 million being made available for city challenge, resources will rise by £90 million to £408 million in 1993-94.

Urban programme allocation 1993-94

	£ million
Newcastle	5·340
Gateshead	5·272
Hartlepool	1·309
Langbaurgh	1·331
Middlesbrough	3·325
North Tyneside	2·231
South Tyneside	3·158
Stockton	1·280
Sunderland	3·317
Manchester	9·048
Salford	4·529
Blackburn	2·115
Bolton	2·253
Burnley	1·396
Oldham	2·554
Preston	1·210
Rochdale	2·475
Wigan	1·704
Liverpool	12·364
Halton	0·968
Knowsley	2·615
St. Helens	1·185
Sefton	1·000
Wirral	2·340
Birmingham	14·847
Coventry	3·065
Dudley	1·030
Sandwell	3·148
Walsall	1·051
Wolverhampton	3·522
The Wrekin	0·634
Derby	0·837
Leicester	3·143
Nottingham	3·530
Barnsley	1·342
Bradford	3·002
Doncaster	1·288
Hull	3·265
Kirklees	0·724
Leeds	3·473
Rotherham	1·486
Sheffield	3·940
Hackney	3·425
Islington	5·873
Lambeth	5·863
Brent	1·436
Greenwich	1·112
Hammersmith and Fulham	1·707
Haringey	2·012
Kensington and Chelsea	1·202
Lewisham	1·530
Newham	1·974
Southwark	1·826
Tower Hamlets	3·083
Wandsworth	2·110

	£ million
Bristol	1·109
Plymouth	0·925
Total	162·834

Greater London Council

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many bodies, elected or appointed institutions or other groups now administer the responsibilities previously discharged under the auspices of the Greater London council; and if he will list the function of each.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The responsibilities of the Greater London council were transferred to a number of existing or new successor authorities on 1 April 1986. The London residuary body issued in 1987 a booklet entitled "London Now" summarising in general terms which services and duties went to which authorities. I have arranged for a copy of the booklet to be deposited in the Library. On 1 April 1990 each inner London council became the local education authority for its area on abolition of the Inner London education authority. Functions inherited by the LRB as a consequence of the abolition of the GLC and of the ILEA and subsequently disposed of by them are reported in the LRB's annual reports which are laid before Parliament, copies of which are in the Library.

Hedgerows

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many agreements have so far been entered into under the hedgerow incentive scheme; what is the total length of hedgerow involved and the amount of money involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 26 March 1992]: As at 26 March 1993, 481 agreements had been made under the scheme since it was launched in July 1992, as a result of which some 640 km of hedgerow will be restored over the next five years. I will write to the hon. Member with regard to the anticipated cost of these works.

Palm House, Sefton Park

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the environment when he will meet members of the action committee to save the palm house in Sefton park; what funds are available for the continued refurbishment of the palm house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The hon. Member will remember, that I wrote to him in November of last year, agreeing to meet with himself, Liverpool city council and members of the save the palm house committee. Since then, an urban programme grant has been approved in January 1993 and has secured the safety of the palm house structure and provided Liverpool city council with an opportunity to explore further options for the long-term future of the building and its environs.

With this in mind, the city council's planning and development services department has proposals to establish a joint council/voluntary sector action committee of its own. However, this is at a preliminary stage and subject to approval by the city council. Once this is formalised, a meeting can then be arranged.

Toxic Waste Imports

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will consider holding an inquiry into the commercial trade in toxic waste with particular reference to trade between Germany and the United Kingdom;

(2) what representations he is making to the European Commission regarding the import of toxic waste going from Germany to the ReChem plant in Pontypool;

(3) if he will consider preventing the import of toxic waste from Germany to the ReChem plant at Pontypool;

(4) what ports in the United Kingdom will handle the proposed imports of toxic waste from Germany destined for the ReChem plant in Pontypool.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 29 March 1993]: I see no need for such an inquiry. The UK Government have asked the German Government to ban the proposed shipment of hazardous waste from Hamburg. The UK's policy of self-sufficiency in final disposal for developed countries has been incorporated into the EC waste shipments regulation coming into operation in May 1994. I understand that the proposed shipment would be handled at Hull.

WALES

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what statutory provisions governs the responsibility of the Welsh Development Agency in respect of the conservation of flora, fauna, landscape and physiographical features.

Mr. David Hunt: The agency is subject to the same provisions as apply to other public bodies.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) which members of the Welsh Development Agency since 1975 were appointed because of their experience of and capacity in matters relating to the environment;

(2) if he will list the existing members of the Welsh Development Agency showing which have experience of, and have shown capacity in, industry, commerce, banking, accountancy, finance, the organisation of representation of workers, administration, local government and matters relating to the environment respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: Appointments to the board of the agency are made on the basis of an individual's overall experience and expertise and having regard to the terms of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975. Such appointments are rarely dependent on a single attribute.

Each of the current members of the board brings a wide range of skills and expertise to the agency. Current membership is as follows:

Dr. Gwyn Jones—Chairman
Dr. Roy Bichan—Deputy Chairman
Sir Donald Walters
Mr. E. Glyn Davies[1]
Mr Richard Brewster
Mr. John Foley MBE
Mr. David Malpas
Dr. Pamela Kirby
Mr. Philip Head[2]—Chief Executive

[1] Ex officio member as Chairman of the Development Board for Rural Wales.

[2] In accordance with the requirements of the WDA Act 1975, the WDA Chief Executive is appointed a member of the WDA Board.

Breast Screening

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which places the mammography screening service has visited in 1992 and 1993 to date; and where the service is currently planned to visit during the remainder of 1993.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Breast Test Wales provides a breast screening service throughout Wales. Detailed information about the mobile screening programme in 1992 together with current and planned programmes for 1993 is not held centrally. This is available from the director of Breast Test Wales who is responsible for the management and delivery of the service.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what criteria the mammography screening service has adopted in choosing the places it has visited to date.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In line with national guidelines for breast screening, Breast Test Wales is working to a three-yearly screening cycle. Within these parameters, it is for the director of Breast Test Wales to provide the service taking into account support services and geographical planning.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many places the mammography screening service in Wales has visited on more than one occasion.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Following completion of the first three-year screening cycle in parts of south-east Wales, I understand that second round screening has begun in that area. Information about the locations involved can be obtained from the director of Breast Test Wales.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange for the mammography screening service to visit Merthyr Tydfil during 1993.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The decision about which locations the mobile screening service will visit in 1993 and beyond is the responsibility of the director of Breast Test Wales.

European Community Funds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to secure that supplementary credit approvals for local authorities in Wales in 1993-94 on European regional development fund and RECHAR moneys are applied in line with the additionality principle.

Mr. David Hunt: Officials wrote to all local authorities on 20 January informing them of the arrangements which will apply to the issue of supplementary credit approvals to cover all ERDF grant-related expenditure incurred by them from 1 April 1993.

ReChem Incinerator (Emissions)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the statement made by the parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on toxic waste monitoring, Official Report, 10 July 1992, column 777, if he will specify the form of the investigation into the Gwent farmer's complaints about airborne emissions from the ReChem incinerator.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Between 1982 and 1984, various samples were collected by the farmer's veterinary surgeons and examined at veterinary investigation centres or at a private veterinary laboratory. In addition, senior veterinary officers from the veterinary investigation service made a number of visits to the farm in question. It was concluded that there was ample evidence to support the view that the animal problems were caused by common disease conditions.

Community Councils

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of all community councils in Wales by district showing the electorate in each case.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not held centrally.

Housing (Garden City)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet Alyn and Deeside district council to discuss housing problems in Garden city, Deeside.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The hon. Gentleman will recall that my right hon. Friend met him and a delegation of members from the council to discuss a number of their concerns, including resources for housing, on 26 January. Welsh Office officials are meeting representatives of Alyn and Deeside district council today to discuss the full range of their housing problems and plans.

Badger Setts

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of badger setts, by county, closed or otherwise, seriously interfered with by or under licence from his Department's officials between 18 January and 15 March.

Mr. David Hunt: During the period in question, two licences were issued by the Department permitting interference with one badger sett in Clwyd and one in Gwynedd.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications he has received under the Protection of Badgers Act 1992 to enter dogs into setts; how many have been granted; and when, where and for what purpose.

Mr. David Hunt: The Department has received four applications for licences to permit the entry of dogs into badger setts, only one of which has been approved. On 12 March, a licence was granted to allow the introduction of a dog into a sett near Denbigh, Clwyd for fox control purposes.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what conditions he has applied to licences granted for the purpose of entering dogs into badger setts.

Mr. David Hunt: The conditions for the one licence issued were that the licence was valid for a single day, that a wildlife expert from the agricultural development and advisory service would be in attendance and that the operation should cease if there was any evidence of disturbance to badgers.

Pit Closures

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for increases in the budgets of the training and enterprise councils in the areas covered by pit closures in Wales for specific additional training schemes for former coal miners affected by the coal industry pit closure programme.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have announced resources of over £106 million in 1993-94 for TECs in Wales—a massive investment enabling them to have on offer a range of opportunities including skills training at all levels and support for those wishing to start their own businesses. I will continue to review provision with the TECs in the light of developments in those areas relevant to the coal review.

NHS Trusts (Pay Levels)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what analysis he has made of the salary percentage increases of top management in NHS trusts to take effect from 1 April; what assessment he has made of the impact of the Chancellor's 1·5 per cent. upper limit for public sector pay for 1993 on the pay increases for (a) top management, (b) senior medical staff, (c) nursing and (d) auxiliary staff in trust hospitals and other trust provider units in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: NHS staff including all those employed by NHS trusts are subject to the current public sector pay policy restricting settlements in the 1993 pay round to a maximum of 1·5 per cent. Offers made to date to staff groups covered by the pay review body and Whitley arrangements are within this limit.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what instructions he has issued to Welsh training and enterprise councils in relation to the submission of claims for invoices at (a) project approval stage and (b) expenditure incurred stage; what guidelines he has issued as to the proper procedure if any TECs have been paid on the basis of claims submitted at project approval stage and in advance in need; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The TEC operating agreement sets out the procedures to be followed by TECs when submitting claims. TECs have recently been reminded to examine their systems to ensure that the terms of the TEC operating agreement are being met.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress is being made towards meeting the guarantee on hospital waiting times under the patients charter in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Significant progress has been made in reducing waiting times in line with the patient's charter guarantees. The number waiting over one month for urgent hospital treatment is expected to have fallen from 717 in March 1992 to nil or virtually nil by the end of March 1993.

By the end of this month, health authorities expect to have eliminated the waiting lists over 18 months for hip and knee replacements and cataract operations.

The number of people waiting over two years for non-urgent treatment fell from 2,251 in March 1992 to 1,528 last September. During February, the number fell to 933 and it is estimated to have fallen during this month to about 100. If any are still outstanding at the end of this month, all will have been offered firm admission dates.

This represents a magnificent achievement by Welsh health authorities.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxpayers

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax liabilities of taxpayers in 1993-94 (a) including and (b) excluding the effects of changes in national insurance contributions compared with what their liability would be under the indexed 1987-88 income tax regime, giving figures for the top and bottom (i) percentile, (ii) 5 per cent., (iii) decile, (iv) quintile and (v) 50 per cent. of taxpayers.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates are given in the table.

£ million

	Tax liability under		Tax and national insurance liability under
	1993-94 regime	1987-88 regime indexed to 1993-94	1993-94 regime	1987-88 regime indexed to 1993-94
Taxpayers under the 1987-88 indexed regime
Top 1 per cent.	9,300	12,500	9,600	12,800
Top 5 per cent.	19,300	23,300	20,900	25,000
Top 10 per cent.	26,000	30,600	29,300	34,100
Top 20 per cent.	35,700	41,400	42,100	48,400
Top 50 per cent.	52,500	60,500	65,400	75,000
Bottom 50 per cent.	8,100	10,100	12,100	14,900
Bottom 20 per cent.	1,000	1,400	1,700	2,300
Bottom 10 per cent.	230	330	480	630
Bottom 5 per cent.	60	80	160	210

Information for the bottom 1 per cent. of taxpayers is not available. The 1987-88 income tax regime has been indexed to 1993-94 levels by reference to the statutory formula and allowing for independent taxation. For the purpose of the calculations the indexed regime of 1987-88 has been applied directly to the income base of 1993-94. In practice, retention of the 1987-88 regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer of 25 February, Official Report, column 691, showing changes in tax and national insurance liability compared with an indexed 1987-88 tax regime, giving an estimate for 1993-94.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates of the average reductions in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowances and thresholds are in the table. The 1987-88 income tax regime has been indexed to 1993-94 levels by reference to the statutory formula and allowing for independent taxation. For the purpose of the calculations the indexed regime of 1987-88 has been applied directly to the income base of 1993-94. In practice, retention of the 1987-88 regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Average change in 1993-94 compared with 1987-88 indexed regime

Range of individual's income in 1993-94 £	Income tax £	Income tax and national insurance £
Under 5,000	60	70
5,000-10,000	170	240
10,000-15,000	260	400
15,000-20,000	340	470
20,000-25,000	430	550
25,000-30,000	500	610
30,000-40,000	430	530
40,000-50,000	920	1,010
50,000-70,000	2,400	2,480
70,000-80,000	5,130	5,200
Over 80,000	19,200	19,200
Average	400	480

Value Added Tax

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total proceeds from value added tax in each year since 1978-79, at 1993 prices; and what are the projections for each year to 1995-96.

Sir John Cope: The VAT proceeds at 1992 prices are as follows:

Year	Revenue £ Billions
1978-79	13·1
1979-80	19·2
1980-81	22·1
1981-82	21·3
1982-83	23·4
1983-84	24·5
1984-85	28·4
1985-86	28·0
1986-87	30·0
1987-88	32·4
1988-89	34·8
1989-90	34·8
1990-91	33·4
1991-92	36·6
1992-93	[1]37·0
1993-94	[2]39·0

[1] Latest estimate.
[2] Forecast.

Forecasts are not available beyond 1993-94. 1993 prices are not yet available.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount of unpaid VAT written off by HM Customs and Excise for the last five years for which figures are available.

Sir John Cope: VAT write-offs are scheduled on a calendar year basis. A "written off" amount is where, for accounting purposes, a tax liability is removed from the records. However, the liability is not extinguished and may, if at a later stage circumstances change, be resurrected. The audited figures for the last five years are:

Year	£'000
1987	214,123
1988	209,471
1989	173,981
1990	208,024
1991	[1]512,284

[1] The figure for 1991 includes some £80 million written-off following a special review of long standing debts on the VAT ledger.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his plans to extend VAT to domestic fuel will include standing charges on gas and electricity bills.

Sir John Cope: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 26 March at column 746.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate for each region (a) the total increase in household costs, (b) the average household cost and (c) the average proportion of household income that will be consumed by his proposed extension of value added tax to heating costs (i) in 1994-95 and (ii) in 1995-96.

Sir John Cope [holding answer 29 March 1993]: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many traders were deregistered for value added tax because they had ceased trading in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Sir John Cope: The numbers of traders who were deregistered for value added tax because they had ceased trading in 1990-91 and 1991-92 are as follows:

	Number
1990-91	119,486
1991-92	114,372

Corporation Tax

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what forecasts have been produced by the Inland Revenue for corporation tax receipts for 1992-93 and 1993-94 from (a) the major clearing banks, (b) other banks, (c) insurance companies, (d) other financial institutions and (e) privatised companies;

(2) what was the estimate of corporation tax receipts forecast in 1990 by the Inland Revenue for the banks for 1990-91 and 1991-92; and what were the actual receipts of corporation tax from the banks for these years.

Mr. Dorrell: Forecasts of the yield of corporation tax, and of advance corporation tax, are published annually in the Financial Statement and Budget Report issued on Budget day. It is not normal practice to release forecasts in the detail requested.

Tax Remission

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in how many cases (a) inheritance tax and (b) capital gains tax was remitted or written off as irrecoverable for each year since 1989.

Mr. Dorrell: The total number of cases and amounts of inheritance tax and capital gains tax remitted off or written off by the Inland Revenue for each year since 1989 (figures for 1992 are not yet available) is as follows:

	INHERITANCE TAX		CAPITAL TAX GAINS
	Number of cases	Nearest £	Number of cases	Nearest £ thousand
1989	10	70,730	5,449	10,856,000
1990	34	225,549	6,492	12,076,000
1991	35	413,038	8,418	29,721,000

Debtor Countries

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many countries have had their official debt to the United Kingdom written off.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 22 March 1993]: Thirty-eight countries have received some form of official bilateral debt or debt service reduction from the United Kingdom Government. Twenty-three countries have received retrospective terms adjustment from the Overseas Development Administration entirely transforming old aid loans into grants. The Export Credits Guarantee Department has participated in debt restructurings on Toronto terms with 18 countries involving debt or debt service forgiveness equivalent to a one-third reduction in the present value of eligible debt, and restructurings on Trinidad terms with 13 countries involving debt or debt service forgiveness equivalent to one half reduction in the present value of eligible debt. In addition, two exceptional debt restructurings have been agreed with Poland and Egypt which reduce the present value of the stock of these countries eligible by 50 per cent. The details are set out in the table.

ODA RTA	Toronto terms	Trinidad terms	Exceptional treatment
Afghanistan
Bangladesh
	Benin	Benin
Bolivia	Bolivia	Bolivia
Botswana
	Burkina Faso
	Central African Rep
Ethiopia		Ethiopia
Egypt			Egypt
Gambia Ghana
	Guinea-Bissau
	Guinea Republic	Guinea Republic
	Guyana
Honduras
Indonesia
Kenya
Lesotho
	Madagascar
Malawi
	Mali	Mali
	Mauritania	Mauritania
Mozambique	Mozambique	Mozambique
Nepal
		Nicaragua
	Niger
Pakistan
			Poland
Senegal	Senegal
Sri Lanka
Sudan
Tanzania
	Tanzania	Tanzania
	Togo	Togo
Uganda	Uganda	Uganda
Western Samoa
	Zaire
	Zambia	Zambia
23	18	13	2

Barlow Clowes

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on instructions he has given to recover public funds from Barlow Clowes by means of legal proceedings against the Bank of Credit and Commerce International.

Mr. Nelson: An application in the names of the Treasury, Barlow Clowes liquidators and receivers, and others for leave to serve proceedings against BCCI is pending before the court. It would not be appropriate to comment on this or any other action arising out of the Barlow Clowes affair which is before the court.

European Community (Convergence)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what requests he has received from institutions of the European Community for a report on their programme for attaining convergence within the economies of the Community; what reply has been sent; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Nelson: The United Kingdom presented a convergence programme in November 1991. A copy of this programme was placed in the House of Commons Library. It is our intention to submit an updated convergence programme during 1993.

Equatorial Bank

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the reasons for closing the Equatorial bank.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 24 March 1993]: No. I understand that the decision to petition for administration was taken by the Equatorial's directors.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to hold an inquiry into the events surrounding the closure of the Equatorial bank.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 24 March 1993]: I have no such plans.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when and by whom he was first informed of the problems that subsequently led to the closure of the Equatorial bank; and when he was first informed that the Equatorial bank was to be closed.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 24 March 1993]: As the Bingham report makes clear, information on supervisory matters is passed to the Treasury by the Bank of England at a number of levels. However, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on individual institutions.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the meetings, during the last year, he has had at which the Equatorial bank was discussed.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 24 March 1993]: I hold meetings from time to time with the governor or with my officials at which banking supervision issues are discussed. It would not be appropriate for me to disclose whether or not a particular institution was mentioned at any such meeting. Equatorial was, however, raised briefly by the hon. Gentleman at a meeting we had on 23 March.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Strip Searching

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what security risks necessitate the use of strip searching in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mates: The purpose of the full searching of prisoners in Northern Ireland is to detect items such as explosives, weapons and drugs, in order to reduce the risk of escape and the potential for injury to prisoners, staff and visitors.

RUC (Disabled Personnel)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve have been physically disabled as a result of terrorism to date; how many have been retrained and re-employed by the Police Authority for Northern Ireland; and what opportunities are available for retraining and re-employment within the Royal Ulster Constabulary for personnel disabled in service.

Mr. Mates [holding reply sent on 10 March 1993]: The term "physically disabled" is difficult to define precisely, but current RUC records in relation to injuries as a result of terrorist attacks indicate that since 1970 a total of 7,025 officers have been injured as a result of terrorism. Of these, 121 have been granted medical retirement due to the extent of their injuries/illness.

The Police Authority for Northern Ireland does not currently have the facility to retrain RUC officers for further employment. A serving or ex-RUC officer may apply in open competition through the Northern Ireland Civil Service Commission for employment in the civil service, including secondment to the police authority. There are currently six civil servants employed by the police authority who retired on medical grounds from the RUC. Information as to how many such officers have been employed since 1970 is not readily available.

Where possible, the RUC, through its welfare branch and occupational health unit provides support and rehabilitation for injured officers. This service extends to the provision of counselling help to the injured officers' families. In addition, the RUC benevolent fund provides continuing support for the officer and the family in both financial and social aspects of the trauma. However, the RUC does not have the facilities to re-train or re-employ every officer injured as a result of terrorism. Where a recovery period is required or where illness dictates (including sickness not related to terrorism), officers may be employed on restricted duties. On 10 March 1993, a total of 80 officers who had been injured as a result of terrorism were employed on restricted duties. This total includes a small number of disabled officers who, although eligible, decided not to seek medical retirement from the force.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Blood Donation

Mr. Luff: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what plans he has better to promote the opportunities for the giving of blood by all those who work in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Michael Martin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 14 January, Official Report, col. 440, which detailed the arrangements provided in the Treasury where Members, their staff and staff of the House may give blood. Those apart, a proposal from the North London blood transfusion service that its mobile unit should be parked in the precincts of the Palace of Westminster is currently before the Administration Committee.

Printing and Publication Costs

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what is the approximate cost per page to the House of printing and publishing one page of the Notice Paper and of the Order Paper.

Mr. Michael J. Martin [holding answer 25 March 1993]: A number of copies of the Vote bundle is supplied to the House either complete or in various, pre-determined combinations of its 11 main sections. The page content of each section varies widely from day to day and Her Majesty's Stationery Office charges the House 18p for each page of every copy supplied.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee how many pages of the Official Report have been devoted to (a) oral and written questions to the right hon. Member answering on behalf of the Church Commissioners and (b) to the passage of Church of England measures, in sessions 1990-91, 1991-92, and 1992-93 to date; and what was the approximate cost to the Official Report of the preparation, printing and publishing of such pages.

Mr. Michael J. Martin [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The price of the daily Official Report does not vary with page content. Over the period in question, it has been £6 for session 1990-91 and £7·50 for sessions 1991-92 and 1992-93. Information on the number of pages devoted to questions to the Church Commissioners and to Church of England measures and on the cost of their preparation by the Department of the Official Report is as follows:

Oral and written questions (Church Commissioners) and Church of England Measures [Costs incurred by the Department of the Official Report]

	Number of pages	Number of questions	Preparation costs £
Oral questions
1990-91	7·2	18	79·92
1991-92	3·2	7	31·08
1992 to date	3·75	12	53·28
Totals	14·15	37	164·28
Written questions
1990-91	3·35	19	35·91
1991-92	0·65	4	7·56
1992 to date	3·6	26	49·14
Totals	7·6	49	92·61
Church of England measures
1990-91	10·25	n/a	175·50
1991-92	8·75	n/a	141·75
1992 to date	nil	n/a	nil
Totals	19	—	317·25

SCOTLAND

Badger Setts

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of badger setts, by county, closed or otherwise, seriously interfered with by or under licence from his Department's officials between 18 January and 15 March.

Sir Hector Monro: None.

Forestry

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how he plans to carry out the proposed review of incentives for forestry.

Mr. Lang: I and my fellow Ministers are keen to improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives in line with my statement on forestry in September 1991. We gave a commitment in the manifesto to review the effectiveness of the current incentives for forestry investment, and this will be completed by the end of the year.

We have established a small group of officials, with representatives from the Treasury, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, Welsh Office, Department of the Environment and the Forestry Commission, under Scottish Office chairmanship, to review the effectiveness of the current incentives for forestry investment, to review options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands and to make proposals for changes which would improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives, having regard to the Government's other economic and environmental policies.

Stracathro hospital

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current costs of providing accident and emergency services at Stracathro hospital; and what are the average costs for Tayside and Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: In 1991-92, average costs per accident and emergency attendance were:

	£
Stracathro hospital	45·00
Tayside health board	34·24
Scotland	34·96

Community Midwives

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the numbers and location of general practitioner community midwife schemes for each health board in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community midwives there are in each health board in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested is set out in the table.

NHS Community Midwives by Health Board: head count at 30 September 1992[1]

	Community midwives	Combined duty nurses[2]
Scotland	298	591
Argyll and Clyde	36	49
Ayrshire and Arran	37	2
Borders	—	56
Dumfries and Galloway	6	45
Fife	24	—
Forth Valley	21	14
Grampian	13	85
Greater Glasgow	49	21
Highland	12	148
Lanarkshire	28	29
Lothian	61	2
Orkney	—	17
Shetland	—	19
Tayside	11	64
Western Isles	—	40

[1] Data are provisional.
[2] Staff who practise more than one profession:
health visitors/district nurses/community midwives, district nurses/community midwives, health visitors/community midwives.

Brackletter Waste Disposal Site

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce a decision on the compulsory purchase order for the Brackletter waste disposal site, Spean Bridge, Invernesshire.

Sir Hector Monro: I expect the decision on the compulsory purchase order for the Brackletter waste disposal site to be issued shortly.

MV Havkong

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the investigations he is carrying out into all aspects of the incident on 23 January in Braefoot bay, involving MV Havkong.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Marine safety is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. The incident is the subject of investigations being carried out by the Department of Transport's marine accident investigation branch and the Health and Safety Executive. The Scottish Office is not carrying out any separate investigation but close contact is being maintained with the Department of Transport.

Housing

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much of its 1992-93 budget Scottish Homes has spent to date; if he will break this figure down by Scottish region and by category of expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 25 March 1993]: To date, Scottish Homes has spent £315 million of its total budget in 1992-93, representing 89 per cent. of the total budget. The breakdown by Scottish Homes district and by programme category is as follows:

District	Expenditure £ million
Highlands' Islands and Grampian	26·3
Tayside and Fife	41·0
Lanark and Central	37·2
Edinburgh, Lothian and Borders	41·0
North and South Clyde	54·3
City of Glasgow	99·5
Ayrshire, Dumfries and Galloway	15·7
TOTAL	315

Programme category	Expenditure £ million
Partnership Areas	22·7
Inner City	66·4
Outer City	36·9
Smaller Urban Renewal	7·4
Urban Areas	74·6
Rural Areas	42·6
New Towns	3·2
Own Stock	61·2
TOTAL	315

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the most recent figures for empty local authority housing in Scotland for (a) up to six months, (b) up to 12 months and (c) over one year; and if he will list the local authorities concerned.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The latest information on empty local authority housing in Scotland is published in table 17 of the statistical bulletin HSG/1992/8, "Housing Trends in Scotland—Quarter ended 30 June 1992". The bulletin is available in the House Library.

Stracathro Hospital

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated costs of transferring accident and emergency services from Stracathro hospital to Dundee hospitals.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 26 March 1993]: Most major trauma cases are already referred directly to the specialist Accident and Emergency centre in Dundee. Any transfer of the remaining cases together with the out-of-hours service could be absorbed within the existing Dundee hospitals at no extra cost.

The Scottish ambulance service is currently examining the effects of the planned changes to determine whether it will incur additional costs.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated annual savings in transferring accident and emergency services from Stracathro hospital to Dundee hospitals.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Board's proposal to transfer of accident and emergency service from Stracathro to Dundee is based on grounds of improving quality rather than in terms of cost-effectiveness. In practice much major trauma is already diverted to Dundee. I understand, however, that Tayside health board estimates that it could save around £98,000 from proposed service changes.

Timeshare properties

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the proposed classification of non-commercial timeshare properties as non-domestic for the purposes of calculating council tax.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 29 March 1993]: Before making the Council Tax (Dwellings) (Scotland) Regulations 1993, which define timeshare units as non-domestic property, we received representations from the Timeshare Council, the Scandinavian Village Association, the Melfort Club and three others. In the period since the regulations were made, on 8 March, up to 26 March, we received representations concerning the regulations from 98 Members of Parliament and four other individuals.

Women Prisoners

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland of those women in prison in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992 respectively, how many were imprisoned for (i) violence against the person, (ii) sexual offences, (iii) burglary, (iv) robbery, (v) theft, resettling, embezzlement, fraud and forgery, (vi) drug offences and (vii) other offences.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The information is not available in the form requested. The table sets out the number of female receptions to penal establishments using the best available approximations in The Scottish Office classification of crimes and offences to the categories listed. Information is not available for 1992.

The number of female receptions to Scottish penal establishments by type of offence, 1990-91

	1990	1991
Violence against the person	52	45
Sexual offences	1	1
Burglary	11	16
Robbery	4	4
Theft, resetting, embezzlement, fraud and forgery	340	390
Drugs	16	14
Other crimes and offences	95	108
Total receptions	519	578

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland of those women in prison in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992, how many were serving sentences of (i) up to 18 months, (ii) between 18 months and three years, (iii) between three years and five years and (iv) five years or more.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The available information is set out in the table:

Average daily female prison population in Scottish penal establishments by length of sentence, 1990-1992

Length of sentence	1990	1991	[1]1992
Less than 18 months	71	84	90
18 months or more but less than three years	4	4	9
Three years or more but less than five years	10	6	5
Five years or more	16	17	16
Others[2]	37	32	37
Total[3]	137	143	158

[1] Provisional.
[2] Includes females held on remand, recalled, etc.
[3] Components may not add up to the total due to rounding.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women were in prison in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992; and of that total how many were (i) juveniles, (ii) young adults under 25 years and (iii) adults.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The available information is set out in the table:

Average daily female prison population in Scottish penal establishments by type of prisoner, 1990-1992

Year	Adult	Young offenders[1]	Total[2]
1990	112	26	137
1991	122	22	143
[3]1992	139	19	158

[1] Young offenders are aged between 16 and 21 but a small number are held in a young offenders institution up to the age of 23.
[2] Components may not add up to the total due to rounding.
[3] Provisional.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he intends to make to the cash limits for 1992-93 within his responsibility.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1993, column 307]: The revised cash limit for the non-voted cash limit SO/LA1, which covers non-housing capital expenditure by local authorities is £652,087,000 and not £653,587,000.

Natural Heritage

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met non-governmental environmental organisations to discuss matters relating to Scotland's natural heritage.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 26 March 1993]: Scottish Office Ministers meet representatives of non-government environmental organisations including Rural Forum and the Scottish Wildlife and Countryside Link at formal meetings, visits and other occasions. Most recently I met representatives concerned with conservation in agriculture on Friday 19 March; and with the Scottish Conservation Projects Trust on Monday 22 March. In addition my officials also have regular contact with these and other non-government environmental organisations.

Edinburgh Dental School and Hospital

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all decisions taken by his Department since 1979 concerning the future of the Edinburgh dental school and hospital.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 26 March 1993]: In 1989 a working party established under the chairmanship of Sir Donald McCallum recommended the closure of the Edinburgh dental school and the establishment of a new dental hospital and postgraduate dental institute for Edinburgh. My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State endorsed this proposal and gave a commitment to provide such capital investment as is necessary to establish both the new dental hospital and the postgraduate institute. That commitment stands.

EDUCATION

Teachers' Pay

4. Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the increase in average teacher salaries since 1979 after allowing for inflation.

Mr. Patten: Since this Government came into office in 1979, the average teacher's pay has increased by some 46 per cent. over and above the rate of inflation.

Religious Education

18. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what his Department is doing to ensure that schools are complying with the guidelines for religious education.

Mr. Patten: To ensure that all local agreed syllabuses are brought into line with the Education Reform Act 1988, the current Education Bill proposes that all local authorities review their syllabus within one year of Royal Assent, unless they have done so since 1988, and every five years subsequently.

New inspection arrangements will highlight publicly instances where schools are failing to provide religious education and governing bodies will be required to prepare action plans to address difficulties raised by inspection reports.

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) what assessment he has made of the National Curriculum Council's report, "Analysis of Agreed Syllabuses for Religious Education"; and what immediate steps he will take to ensure that agreed syallabuses comply with the provision of the Education Reform Act 1988 requiring religious education to be in the main Christian;

(2) if he will issue further guidelines as to the operation of the provision of the Education Reform Act 1988 requiring religious education to be in the main Christian.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend strongly supports the National Curriculum Council's work in assisting local conferences to decide how best to bring their agreed syllabuses into line with the requirements of the 1988 Education Reform Act. We are proposing, in the current Education Bill, to require local authorities to review all local agreed syllabuses not reviewed since the passage of that Act, and to review them every five years subsequently.

My right hon. Friend plans to issue a revised circular of guidance after the passage of the Bill through Parliament.

Corporal Punishment

19. Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what action he is taking to end corporal punishment in schools.

Mr. Forth: Corporal punishment is already prohibited in maintained schools and for those pupils in independent schools whose fees are met from public funds. We will of course reflect carefully on the recent judgment by the European Court of Human Rights.

Grant-maintained Schools

20. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many schools in Essex have now opted out of local authority control; and if he will make a statement on Government policies to encourage further schools to seek grant-maintained status.

Mr. Forth: Thirty-three schools in Essex are today operating as self-governing grant-maintained schools. From Thursday that number will be 53, with three more approved for a later start. These figures, and the 34 further Essex schools with applications in the pipeline, demonstrate the appeal of self-government to parents. Provisions in the Education Bill will ease the path to GM status.

28. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many schools have acquired grant-maintained status to date.

Mr. Forth: Four hundred and ninety one schools in England will be operating as self-governing grant-maintained schools on 1 April and a further 15 are approved for a later start.

Politics and Government

21. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the current proportion of pupils taking GCSEs in politics, government and related subjects.

Mr. Boswell: In the summer of 1992, some 5 per cent. of pupils who reached the age of 16 during the academic year attempted GCSEs in politics and related subjects in the social sciences. The flexibility within the national curriculum at key stage 4 will enable schools to continue to offer courses in such subjects.

School Buildings

22. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what expenditure on the maintenance of school buildings was incurred in each of the last three years for which records are available.

Mr. Forth: For the three years to 1990-91 revenue expenditure by English local education authorities on school repairs, building and grounds maintenance was £553 million, £621 million and £657 million respectively. In addition authorities spent £565 million, £688 million and £648 million on school capital work, some of which will have contributed to the maintenance of buildings involved.

Class Sizes

23. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what recent guidance he has given to education authorities about class sizes in rural schools.

Mr. Forth: Our policy is to provide greater autonomy for schools so that they can make their own decisions on the deployment of resources. It would run counter to that policy to seek to impose a view on what class sizes would be most appropriate for rural schools.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will issue advice to schools on best practice in relation to class size in primary and secondary schools.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will issue guidance on the size of classes in schools.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 9 March (Official Report, column 522).

Youth Service

24. Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is his policy on the appropriate level of youth service provision.

Mr. Boswell: The youth service is committed to the principle that the planning, monitoring and evaluation of the curriculum should be determined locally, and not nationally. The appropriate level of provision to deliver local youth service objectives is primarily a matter for individual local education authorities in accordance with their duty under sections 41 and 53 of the Education Act 1944.

Japanese

25. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether he will make a statement on the teaching of Japanese in schools.

Mr. Boswell: The national curriculum requires all secondary school pupils to study at least one of 19 eligible foreign languages up to the age of 16. Japanese is one of these. It is for schools to decide whether to offer Japanese in the light of demand and of the resources available to them.

School Activities (Charges)

26. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about charges made to pupils in secondary schools for educational activities.

Mr. Forth: The Education Reform Act 1988 provides that, with the exception of fees for individual music tuition, no charges may be made for activities taking place during the school day. In no circumstances may schools charge for activities which are required for a prescribed public examination or are part of the national curriculum.

School Governors

27. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education now many school governors have been sacked by education authorities in the last six years; and if he will list the authorities concerned.

Mr. Forth: This information is not collected centrally by the Department.

Universities (Industrial and Commercial Development)

29. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he will next meet the Director General of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the contribution universities can make to successful industrial and commercial development.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend currently has no plans to meet the Director General of the CBI. However, Ministers are encouraged to note from their day to day contacts with representatives of industry and the universities that they are very conscious of the need to promote links for their mutual benefit.

Nursery Education

30. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what studies he has commissioned as to the value of nursery education; and what initiatives he proposes.

Mr. Forth: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) on 2 March, Official Report, col. 123.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assistance he can give to schools who have children with special needs.

Mr. Forth: Local education authorities maintained schools are resourced for the vast majority of such children through the general funding allocated to them by the local education authority. In the case of grant-maintained schools, such provision is made through annual maintenance grant. For the smaller number of pupils who have statements of special educational needs (SEN), responsibility for arranging any necessary additional provision lies with the LEA. The Education Bill now before Parliament ensures that LEAs will continue to be able to offer SEN support services to all LEA and grant-maintained schools for all of their pupils with special needs.

The Department provides for capital work for special needs pupils in county, controlled and maintained special schools through annual capital guidelines (ACGs). Some £5·5 million of ACGs were distributed for 1993-94, with a further £3·6 million of resources earmarked for issue as supplementary credit approvals, pending decisions on related statutory proposals. A further sum will be available to non-maintained special schools in 1993-94 through a separate capital grant programme.

Mr. Jim Cunningham To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many children have special educational needs.

Mr. Forth: In January 1992 there were nearly 165,000 children for whom statements of special educational needs were being maintained by local education authorities in England.

Single-sex Schools

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many boys and how many girls respectively, receive single-sex education in state schools in England.

Mr. Forth: In January 1992, 148,000 boys attended maintained primary and secondary boys' schools and 180,000 girls attended maintained primary or secondary girls' schools in England. Some single-sex schools accept a few pupils of the opposite sex. In January 1992 there were about 1,000 such pupils.

Standard Assessment Tests

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he is taking to monitor standard assessment tests in relation to teacher contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has made it clear that he looks to teachers to carry out their contractual commitments to assess, record and report on the development, progress and attainment of pupils. He will be keeping the position under review.

Racial Incidents

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what guidance his Department gives to local authorities and to grant-maintained schools regarding adopting guidelines in respect of racial incidents in and around schools.

Mr. Forth: Reports of the Inter-departmental Racial Attacks Group in 1989 and 1991 recommended that local education authorities and schools which had not already adopted policy statements on race relations and developed guidelines for responding to racial incidents should reconsider their positions. They also recommended that guidelines should reflect local consultation and policy statements should be widely distributed. Copies of both the group's reports—"The response to racial attacks and harassment: guidance for the statutory agencies" and "The response to racial attacks: sustaining the momentum"—are in the Library.

Primary Education

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will give an estimate figure for the proportion of primary schools in (a) Cornwall and (b) England under the separate classification of local education authority and grant-maintained schools, which cannot deliver the requirements of the national curriculum because of a lack of appropriate buildings, equipment or facilities for physical education.

Mr. Forth: No such figures are available.

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what monitoring has been carried out on progress on improving primary education since the publication of the National Curriculum Council's and Office for Standards in Education's report in January.

Mr. Forth: The National Curriculum Council and Ofsted continue to monitor the progress of the national curriculum with particular regard to primary education in the light of their recent reports. Ofsted will provide my right hon. Friend with a further report in the new year.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what provision he will make in respect of grants from the European regional development fund in 1993-94.

Mr. Patten: The Minister for Industry's written answer of 30 June 1992 (Official Report, columns 525-26) announced details of the new arrangements for providing public expenditure cover for forecast ERDF receipts. I will make provision available during the year to offset wholly payments in respect of grants from the European regional development fund to be made in 1993-94 towards approved capital expenditure projects based at grant-aided educational institutions, and recurrent expenditure projects of an educational nature. This provision is currently estimated to be a maximum of £13 million.

School Attendance

Sir Rhodes Boyson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will seek advice on the legal status of a swipe card as a means of recording school attendance with regard to its possible use as an alibi by a juvenile criminal and the legitimacy of shifting the onus of registration from teachers to pupils.

Mr. Forth: We look to individual schools to ensure that, where electronic aids to pupil registration are employed, adequate safeguards are instituted to maintain the integrity of the systems. Such safeguards might include teacher supervision at swiping points and random checks of cards held by pupils. The Department will be working with the National Council for Educational Technology to evaluate the potential of information technology as a means of monitoring pupil attendance. The scope for abuse will, of course, be one of the issues that we shall be examining.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people, respectively, in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Eggar: Recruits to the senior grades in the Department (as to any grade in the civil service) are selected on merit on the basis of fair and open competition, unless one of the exceptions permitted under the Civil Service Order in Council 1991 applies. Various steps have been taken by the civil service commissioners to aid recruitment from all sectors of the community, including the extension of links with institutions of higher education, equal opportunities training for those involved in selection and the use of validated selection procedures.

Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department last conducted surveys of (a) ethnic origins and (b) the number of women among its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Voluntary surveys of ethnic origin were last conducted in 1988 (DTI) and 1990 (Department of Energy). The resulting database has been continuously updated with information on new staff and leavers and special exercises have been conducted to improve the positive response rate; 90 per cent. of staff currently employed by the Department have declared their ethnic origin.

Gender information is automatically held on the Department's personnel database and specific surveys to establish the number of women employed are not necessary.

Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many and what percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall in his Department are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled people.

Mr. Eggar: The figures for the Department, including its Executive Agencies, as at 1 January 1993 are:

	(a) Women		(b)[1] Ethnic Minorities		(c)[1] Registered Disabled
Grade level	Number	Percentage staff	Number respondents	Percentage staff	Number	Percentage staff
Grade 1	—	—	—	—	—	—
Grade 2	—	—	—	—	—	—
Grade 3	6	11·0	—	—	—	—
Grade 4	2	12·5	—	—	—	—
Grade 5	39	14·0	2	0·7	—	—
Grade 6	26	11·0	7	3·0	—	—
Grade 7	176	13·0	26	1·9	3	0·2
All staff excluding industrials and casuals	5,715	44·0	1,228	9·5	121	0·9

[1] (b) Ethnic minority figures are based on 90 per cent. positive response rate to ethnic origin survey.
(c) The Department also employs a number of disabled staff who are not registered.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to ensure that the United Kingdom fulfils its obligations under the chemical weapons convention with regard to chemicals that fall within the scope of the treaty but are not routinely monitored by the Organsiation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons.

Mr. Needham: The scope of the monitoring regime provided for in the chemical weapons convention is very broad. Known chemical weapons agents and their precursors, and toxic chemicals of particular concern and their precursors, are listed in the convention and will be monitored routinely. In addition, all plant sites producing by synthesis more than 200 tonnes of discrete organic chemicals per year will be subject to on-site verification four years after the convention enters into force, unless the conference of states parties decides otherwise.

It is intended to introduce legislation when parliamentary time permits to prohibit the production of chemicals for purposes prohibited by the convention.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how many chemicals and families of chemicals will be subject to monitoring for routine verification by the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons under the terms of the chemical weapons convention;

(2) how many chemicals and families of chemicals fall within the overall scope of the chemical weapons convention through its definition of chemical weapons.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The chemical weapons convention lists 43 chemicals or families of chemicals which will be subject to monitoring for routine verification by the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons. In addition, all plant sites (except those producing exclusively explosives or hydrocarbons) producing more than 200 tonnes per year of unscheduled discrete organic chemicals, or more than 30 tonnes of such chemicals containing phosphorous, sulphur or fluorine, will be required to make an annual declaration and, in the case of plants producing more than 200 tonnes per year, may be subject to on-site verification.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is his Department's policy that article VII of the chemical weapons convention requires the United Kingdom national authority to conduct any verification to ensure United Kingdom compliance with the chemical weapons convention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: Under the chemical weapons convention, the role of conducting verification to ensure compliance is assigned to the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons. Legislation will be introduced when parliamentary time permits to provide the necessary powers to ensure that the United Kingdom fulfils its obligations under the convention.

Nuclear Installations

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what is his estimate of the volume of carbon dioxide released to the atmosphere by (a) the construction of Britain's Magnox AGR and PWR reactors and (b) the operation of Britain's nuclear reactors;

(2) what is his estimate of the carbon dioxide released to the atmosphere in the manufacture, quarrying and engineering of all building materials used in the building of Sizewell B PWR.

Mr. Maclean [holding answers 29 March 1993]: I have been asked to reply.

It is very difficult to estimate the volumes of carbon dioxide released in the construction and operation of nuclear power plant, although the available estimates suggest that life cycle emissions are unlikely to exceed one twentieth of those from an equivalent coal fired plant; and only about ten percent of this is likely to be incurred during the construction phase of a PWR station. Estimates specific to the construction of Sizewell B are not available.

United Arab Emirates

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of trade between Great Britain and the United Arab Emirates during 1992.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: Information on United Kingdom visible trade is published in the Business Monitor MA20, Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom, which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the value of arms sales to the United Arab Emirates for each of the last two years.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it has been the consistent policy of successive Governments not to disclose particulars of defence trade with other countries.

Wood Trade

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will show, in cash terms, the level of import and export of (a) hard wood and (b) soft wood into and out of Britain in each year since 1988.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The information is given in the table.

£ million

	(a) Trade in hard wood[1]		(b) Trade in soft wood[2]
	Exports	Imports	Exports	Imports
1988	11·7	292·3	13·3	1,054·3
1989	14·5	321·1	12·1	1,092·6
1990	16·3	298·5	8·8	1,096·5
1991	16·1	237·5	9·3	794·0
1992	17·8	237·0	10·0	774·9

[1] Hard wood is defined as headings 246.15, 247.5, 248.1, 248.4 and 248.5 of the Standard International Trade Classification (revision 3).

[2] Soft wood is defined as headings 246.11, 247.3, 247.4, 248.2 and 248.3 of the Standard International Trade Classification (revision 3).

Source: Business Monitor MA20.
Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom.

Trade Balance

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the balance of trade in (a) cars, (b) electronic goods, (c) IT equipment, (d) telecommunications and (e) white goods in 1979 and 1992.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 March 1993]: The available information is given in the table.

United Kingdom crude balances[1] (£ million)

	1979	1992
Cars (a)	−1,764	−2,360
Information technology and electronics (b)	−435	−2,697
Of which:
Office machinery and computers	−238	−1,564
Telegraph and telephone equipment	50	−187
Radio and electronic capital goods	119	241
Domestic electrical appliances (b)	−125	−482

Note:
[1] Crude balance equals exports (fob) minus imports (cif).

Sources:
(a) Business Monitor MA20—Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom.
(b) Business Monitor MQ10—Overseas Trade analysed in terms of industries.

TRANSPORT

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he first announced the Government's commitment to the Jubilee line extension into docklands; and when he now expects the final agreement to be signed.

Mr. Norris: 16 November 1989; negotiations on the private sector contribution continue, and it would not be sensible for me to speculate about when they might finish.

British Rail (Appointments)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many potential candidates were considered for designation to become each of (a) the rail regulator, (b) the director of passenger rail franchising and (c) chairman of Railtrack.

Mr. Freeman: A number of candidates were considered for each of the posts.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the exchanges of correspondence which took place between himself and those he has designated to become (a) the rail regulator, (b) the director of passenger rail franchising and (c) the chairman of Railtrack, referring to the roles to which they are nominated.

Mr. Freeman: No. The Government have already made clear publicly the roles which the regulator, the franchising director, and Railtrack will have after the Railways Bill is enacted.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what costs were incurred in the advertisement and selection of those designated to become (a) the rail regulator, (b) the director of passenger rail franchising and (c) the chairman of Railtrack.

Mr. Freeman: The Department of Transport paid to Norman Broadbent International, who assisted in the recruitment, £132,098, including value added tax. This payment covered fees, advertisements, and general expenses. Work done by officials in the course of their duties in relation to the appointments cannot accurately be costed.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether present or former employees of the British Railways Board were specifically excluded from consideration for designation to become each of (a) the rail regulator, (b) the director of passenger rail franchising and (c) the chairman of Railtrack.

Mr. Freeman: No.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of Railtrack's senior appointments come from (a) BR, (b) his Department, and (c) elsewhere; and how pay levels for people in (a) and (b) have altered.

Mr. Freeman: On 24 March, BR announced the appointments of 11 senior members-designate of Railtrack. Of these, ten came from within BR and the other was on secondment from the Department of Transport. Selection and appointment of staff of the "shadow" Railtrack are generally matters for the BR board. There are two exceptions: first, Mr. Robert Horton, whose appointment as Railtrack's chairman-designate was made by the Secretary of State, and who will continue to be a member of the BR board until Railtrack is established as a separate Government-owned company next year. Secondly, Mr. David Moss, Railtrack's commercial director-designate, who is a grade 3 official seconded to the BR board from the Department of Transport. In neither case did the salary alter with the appointment to shadow Railtrack.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria and procedures were used in identifying and selecting those designated to become (a) the rail regulator, (b) the director of passenger rail franchising and (c) chairman of Railtrack.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend appointed the candidates who in his judgment were the best fitted to carry out these roles. The Department engaged Norman Broadbent International to assist in the identification of suitable candidates.

British Rail (Objectives)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whhether he will set new objectives for British Rail to apply from 1 April.

Mr. MacGregor: Following is the text of a letter which I have today sent to the Chairman of British Rail, setting new objectives to apply from 1 April 1993:

"The Government sets objectives for BR which supplement the statutory and financial duties of the Board. The current objectives, which applied for a 3-year period, expire on 31 March 1993. We are now moving into a period of major change for BR, in preparation for privatisation. I am therefore writing to set out one year interim objectives for the operation of the present railway business, appropriate to this period of transition. These objectives will apply from 1 April 1993. The aim is to maintain a safe, efficient railway supplying high standards of service to its customers.

I shall also be setting the Board some specific privatisation objectives updating those set in July 1992. These will be set out in a separate letter.

Safety

The Board has a statutory duty to have regard to safety of operation. I welcome the considerable progress on safety improvements which has been made over the last 3 years. Maintaining and further improving standards of safety on the railways will continue to be an objective of major importance for the Board. This should be accompanied by continuing development of increasingly effective means of appraisal of safety investment. The BR Safety Plans produced in 1991 and 1992 have proved valuable; a further annual Safety plan should be submitted during 1993.

Quality of Service

Quality of Service remains a very high priority for BR, as reflected in your Passenger's Charter. I do not propose, for this transitional period, to make significant changes to the previously agreed quality of service objectives, as developed by the Passenger's Charter. For the future, the Franchising Director will wish to review with BR the current means of measuring quality of service, and consider whether any alternative measures should be developed which better reflect customer requirements and priorities.

BR's objectives for 1993-94 are therefore:

(i) Reliability and punctuality

Seek to achieve the agreed Passenger's Charter targets for 1993; these apply performance indicators for both reliability and punctuality on each of the service groups within Network SouthEast, InterCity and Regional Railways.

(ii) Train enquiry bureaux/ticket offices/carriage cleaning

Maintain the current agreed objectives as follows:

Train Enquiry Bureaux

95 per cent. of calls to be answered within 30 seconds.

Ticket Offices

Maximum queuing time of 3 minutes off-peak and 5 minutes peak.

Carriage Cleaning	InterCity Per cent.	NSE Per cent.	Regional Per cent.
Interior daily clean	100	100	100
Exterior wash	[1]95	[1]100	[2]100

[1] Daily.

[2]Every two days.

(iii) Customer Satisfaction

Measures of customer satisfaction can be more valuable and relevant for businesses in assessing the service they provide than the measures at (ii) above and (iv) below. I welcome the fact that the passenger businesses regularly carry out customer surveys and I would expect British Rail to place increasing emphasis on such measures of satisfaction. The Passenger's Charter commits British Rail to publishing the results of customer surveys and I look forward to such publication during 1993-94. In particular, I look to British Rail to measure and publish customers' satisfaction with the provision of customer information.

(iv) Overcrowding

For Network SouthEast and Regional Railways urban and shorter rural routes you should continue to work towards the objective that the ratio of passengers to seats on individual trains should not be more than 135 per cent. on sliding-door trains and 110 per cent. on slam-door trains, with no standing for longer than 20 minutes except by choice. I recognise however that the appropriateness of this measure has been questioned and am sure that the Franchising Director will wish to consider alternatives which might reflect more fully the conditions experienced by passengers and the value they place on avoiding overcrowding.

Productivity and cost control

Improving productivity and making the most efficient use of resources continues to be of major importance across the whole of the railway business. The Board should continue to monitor unit cost trends and publish them in its annual report. I welcome the steps the Board is taking to reduce working expenses. This is particularly necessary bearing in mind the recent reductions in the Board's revenues, notably income from passengers. I look to the Board to reduce underlying working expenses for the passenger businesses by at least 5 per cent. in real terms compared to 1992-93.

Passenger Businesses—Operating Profit/Loss

In addition to the cost reductions set out above, I am sure that Network SouthEast, InterCity and Regional Railways will be exploring all possible means of increasing passenger numbers and income during 1993-94, thus improving their operating profits/losses.

I look to the businesses to achieve at least the following targets for total profit/(loss) on ordinary activities, before PSO grant:

	£ million
Network SouthEast	(128)
InterCity	12
Regional	(411)

Freight Businesses

I will be setting specific restructuring objectives for freight in the light of our joint consideration of the results of the study carried out by Mercer.

In addition, during this transitional period I expect both businesses to make every effort to improve their operating result. This means that management should persist in taking necessary action in respect of loss making services and continue to reduce costs. It will also enable the Board to continue to retain traffic which can at least cover its avoidable costs.

In focussing on operating result, it will be important for the businesses not to lose sight of the need to earn a commercial return on new investment. The basis for decisions on new investment will therefore continue to be an 8 per cent. rate of return.

Red Star and Rail Express Systems

Red Star should be privatised during 1993, in accordance with agreed objectives.

Rail Express Services should be prepared for privatisation as soon as possible.

Channel Tunnel Services

Preparation of all the necessary infrastructure should be completed in time for the opening of the Channel Tunnel. Freight services should start operating from the opening of the Tunnel and scheduled commercial intercapitals services as soon as practicable in 1994. BR should make maximum use of the commercial opportunities, for freight and passenger services, resulting from the opening of the Channel Tunnel, and start to prepare Channel Tunnel services for privatisation.

Transmark

Transmark should be privatised during 1993, in line with agreed objectives.

Public Accountability

Progress in achieving these objectives should be published in BR's Annual Report and Accounts for 1993-94."

EC Cohesion Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has made to and received from the Government of the Republic of Ireland on co-ordination of that country's future applications for assistance from the European Community cohesion fund on transport infrastructure projects affecting ports on the east coast of Ireland with potential United Kingdom transport infrastructure provision at appropriate landfalls on the west coast of Great Britain and onward from such ports to major European markets.

Mr. Norris: None.

Paddington-Heathrow Rail Line

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his Budget statement on public-private infrastructure investment, when he expects the design team will be set up for the electrification of the Paddington-Heathrow railway line.

Mr. Freeman: Preliminary design studies have already been carried out sufficient for cost estimates to be completed. I understand that it is intended to form a design team by September 1993 to finalise details.

Road Safety Departments

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many local authority road safety departments have been closed in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list local authorities that have a road safety department and those that have closed such departments in the last year.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As far as the Department is aware, all local authorities employ staff engaged in road safety, but no central record is kept of whether these are located in a separate road safety department.

Cycle Helmets

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many local authorities have run reduced price schemes for cycle helmets in each year since 1980.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Neither the Department nor local authorities keep a central record of these. We do, however, have information that, by the end of 1990, there were 76 local authorities and other organisations running low-cost cycle helmet schemes.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what initiative his Department is undertaking to promote the wearing of cycle helmets.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I am pleased to announce that on March 25 I launched a new television campaign to promote the wearing of cycle helmets, particularly by children.

Car Phones

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will bring in regulations to make it an offence to use a hand-held car phone while driving a moving vehicle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is an offence for a driver to fail to control a vehicle or drive in a dangerous or careless manner. These powers are sufficient.

In addition, the highway code says:

"you must exercise proper control of your vehicle at all times. Do not use a hand held telephone or microphone while you are driving. Find a safe place to stop first".

Roads Expenditure

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the number of cars on the roads; and how much was spent on roads, per car, by (a) national and (b) local Government in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: In December 1991, there were 17·7 million vehicles of body type cars which were licensed and for which the address of the registered keeper was in England.

In 1991-92, the Department of Transport spent £1,926 million on national roads and local authorities spent £2,578 million on local roads.

It would not be appropriate to present expenditure figures on a per car basis as spending also reflects the provision made for heavy and light goods vehicles, buses and coaches, other classes of vehicles, and pedestrians.

Roads, Croydon

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent on road improvements in the London borough of Croydon in the last five years.

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is highway authority for the A23 trunk road in Croydon: other roads in the areaa are the responsibility of the London Borough. Expenditure on improvement works, excluding fees, on the A23 in the borough in each financial year was as follows:

	£
1988-89	814,055
1989-90	2,119,069
1990-91	2,199,430
1991-92	203,094
1992-93	[1]156,240

[1]provisional

Expenditure in the first three years, in particular, is not typical because it includes the cost of a major national trunk road improvement.

Newbury Bypass

Mr. David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be in a position to announce the go-ahead for the Newbury bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The decision following the 1992 public inquiry into supplementary proposals for the A34 Newbury bypass and the compulsory purchase of the land needed for the scheme was issued on 25 March. In accordance with the inspector's recommendations my right hon. Frends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment are minded to make the remaining statutory orders for the scheme, subject to consultations on a number of modifications to the published proposals. Subject to the satisfactory conclusion of these consultations and availability of funds, I hope that work will start on this much-needed bypass early next year.

Overbridge (Clints Brow)

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the full cost of the overbridge to accommodate cattle at Clints brow, Egremont, Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The full cost of the Longhorn farm overbridge at Clints brow is currently estimated at £236,000.

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the date of the first approach to his Department to request an overbridge at Clints brow, Egremont, Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Department was first made aware of the road safety implications of dairy cattle crossing the trunk road at Clints brow in November 1991.

Bypass (Egremont)

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date he expects the full opening of the A595 bypass at Egremont, Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: Completion of the bypass works is expected to be 7 May 1993. Sections of the bypass are already open to traffic.

West Cumbria

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to visit west Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Secretary of State has no current plans to visit West Cumbria.

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his Department's plans for road improvements in west Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 26 March 1993]: The Department's plans for road improvements in West Cumbria are contained in the White Paper "Roads for Prosperity" and set out in the programme "Trunk Roads England, into the 1990s".

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish estimates for 1993-94 showing the number of self-employed men and women who pay (a) class four national insurance contributions, (b) class two contributions, (c) class three contributions, (d) no national insurance contributions, (e) the number who have profits above the upper profits limit for class four contributions and (f) the total number of self-employed.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table:

million

	Men	Women
(a)	1·8	0·2
(b)	2·2	0·3
(c)	Reliable estimates are not available
(d)	nil	0·5
(e)	The total number with profits above the upper profits limit is estimated to be 0·5 million, of which some 5 per cent. are women
(f)	2·25	0·75

[1] Figures in the table (a-e) have been rounded to nearest 0·1 million.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish estimates for 1992-93 and 1993-94 of the numbers of male and female employees who are on earnings below the national insurance lower earnings limit.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that in both 1992-93 and 1993-94 there will be some 0·75 million male employees and 2·25 million females employees who earn less than the lower earnings limit.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on Treasury revenues in 1993-94 of (a) raising the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions to the level of the personal tax allowance and (b) raising the upper earnings limit to £27,145.

Miss Widdecombe: The effect on the amount of contributions raised in respect of 1993-94 would be:
(a) −£0·4 billion
(b) +£0·6 billion

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total amount raised from (a) employers' and (b) employees' national insurance contributions in 1978-79; what is his estimate of the figure for 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

National insurance contributions raised (£ billion)

Year[3]	Employees	Employers
1978-79	3·7	[1]5·9
[2]1993-94	14·6	23·6

[1]Total excludes the national insurance surcharge.
[2]Source: Government Actuary's Report on the Social Security Bill 1992 (Cm. 2097).
[3]Figures include the National Health Service allocation.

Refugees

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many refugees have applied for a community care grant after arriving in the United Kingdom; and how many have been refused in each of the last two years.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested has already been placed in the Library. No decisions have yet been made about which services will be market tested in future years.

Pensions

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to publish gender-disaggregated statistics on private and occupational pension provision.

Miss Widdecombe: Where available, information relating to occupational and personal pensions is provided on a gender-disaggregated basis on request. We have no plans to alter that arrangement.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by Watson Europe on pensions in Britain and Europe.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to her reply, 29 March 1993]: I am arranging for a copy of the research data provided by Watson Europe to be placed in the Library today. The net benefit totals given for each of the family models covered by this study are expressed in sterling equivalents. A summary table showing figures which reflect purchasing power parity, derived from OECD data, is included. None of the figures includes the value of health benefits.

Income Support (Unemployed People)

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the benefit of an unemployed person who is in receipt of income support is retained or is suspended where a doubt arises about their availability for work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: While a doubt about an unemployed person's availability for work is being considered, income support may be paid at a reduced rate if the adjudication officer is satisfied that the claimant or a member of his family would otherwise suffer hardship.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) of 9 February, Official Report, columns 601-2, if he will instruct the chief executives of agencies within his responsibility to discontinue the practice of delaying letters to hon. Members in response to parliamentary questions until the day after copies have been sent to Ministers.

Miss Widdecombe: Chief executives of the Department's next steps agencies are expected to abide by the guidance to all Departments when the present publication arrangements were introduced in October 1992; that hon. Members should receive a letter in reply within twenty four hours of him or her receiving the responsible Minister's own reply. I understand that so far they have done so in almost every case.

Postage Costs

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what his Department and its agencies paid in postage in the last year for which records are available.

Mr. Burt: The cost to the Department and its executive agencies in 1991-92, the latest year for which information is available, was about £64 million.

Pension Law Review Committee

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress is being made by the pension law review committee.

Mr. Lilley: The review has attracted a great deal of interest and the committee is currently analysing evidence from some 1,700 written submissions, seven days of oral hearings, during which a number of organisations and individuals gave evidence to support their submissions, and three public meetings.

Under the weight and detail of all this evidence, Professor Goode has asked for a short extension to his reporting timetable. I am concerned to have this report as quickly as possible, but given the complexity of the task, the importance of the outcome and the need for a very careful analysis of the issues, I have agreed to extend the deadline for the report to 30 September 1993.

Copies of Professor Goode's letter, requesting the extension, and my reply have been placed in the Library.

NHS Transport, Leeds

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 497, whether the contract for providing a bus service for staff travelling between Quarry House, Leeds, and Leeds city station was (a) advertised, (b) subject to competitive tendering and (c) awarded on the basis of the lowest tender; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The contract for the bus service between Quarry House, Leeds and Leeds city British Rail station was not advertised. In view of the need at the time to provide a bus service at short notice and the fact that limited hours of service were involved, five local omnibus operators were contacted and invited to tender for the contract. The tenders were carefully considered in accordance with departmental guidelines and the contract awarded to the company offering best value for money.

Reciprocal Pension Agreements

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when Her Majesty's Government last took steps to negotiate a reciprocal pension agreement with a foreign country; what criteria have been used in selecting the countries in respect of which agreements have thus far been concluded; and if he will now take steps to conclude agreements with all those countries with which no agreement exists, to which significant numbers of United Kingdom pensioners have retired.

Miss Widdecombe: The United Kingdom most recently concluded a social security agreement with Barbados which came into force in April 1992. It fulfils a commitment given to the Government of Barbados in 1974.

In order to enter into an agreement with the United Kingdom the other country's social security scheme had to be sufficiently similar to provide for reciprocity. Increasingly, there had to be sufficient movement of workers between the two countries to justify the outlay of resources to negotiate, operate and maintain the agreement. Above all, any additional costs had to be affordable.

The majority of United Kingdom pensioners overseas live in Australia, Canada, New Zealand and South Africa. The United Kingdom already has social security agreements with Australia, Canada and New Zealand, which, in general, allow residence or insurance in one country to be used by the country where the pensioner normally resides to satisfy its qualifying conditions for a pension. They do not allow for United Kingdom pension increases to be paid in those countries. There is no agreement with South Africa. We have no plans to revise the agreements with Australia, Canada and New Zealand, or to negotiate an agreement with South Africa.

Social Fund

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the balance outstanding for (a) grants and (b) loans from the social fund at the most recent available date in the district covering the Stoke on Trent, North parliamentary constituency; if he will give a breakdown by reason of the number of grant and loan applications refused since 1 April 1992 for that district; how many review applications were received by that district; and how many of them resulted in a changed decision.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from David Riggs to Ms Joan Walley, dated 29 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is the responsibility of Michael Bichard to answer questions about relevant operational matters. However, as Mr. Bichard is away at the moment I am replying on his behalf to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what was the balance outstanding for (a) grants and (b) loans from the Social Fund at the most recent available date in the District covering the Stoke on Trent North parliamentary constituency; if he will give a breakdown by reason of the number of grant and loan applications refused since 1st April 1992 for that district; how many review applications were received by that district; and how many of them resulted in a changed decision.

The following details are provided for the Benefits Agency's North Staffordshire District which deals with your constituency.

The outstanding balance of the District Social Fund allocation at 28 February 1993, the latest date for which figures are available, was £66,912 for grants and £113,528 for loans.

Details of the numbers of grant and loan applications refused and of reasons for refusal are given at Appendix A.

During the period 1 April 1992 to 28 February 1993, 2,658 review applications were received by North Staffordshire District. Of these, 852 resulted in a changed decision.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Appendix A

Details of Grant and Loan Refusals for North Staffordshire District 1 April 1992—28 February 1993 (Latest available data)

Reason for Refusal	Grants	Loans
Not in receipt of Income Support (IS)	465	377
In receipt of IS for less than 26 weeks	—	1,326
Direction 4 not satisfied	4,256	—
Applicant excluded by Direction	9	11
No serious risk to health or safety	—	132
Requested amount below minimum allowable	28	114
Previous decision for same item(s) within 26 weeks	249	292
Item excluded by Direction	167	203
Alternative item available	4	12
Help available from another source	25	25
Grant awarded on loan request	—	271
Savings over £500 meet cost	14	5
Savings over £1,000 meet cost (customer or partner over 60)	9	3
Enough money available to meet crisis	—	5
Total debt exceeds £1,000	—	17
Inability to repay	—	229
Insufficient priority	969	1,575
Other reasons	25	75

Note: Secretary of State's Directions are listed in the Social Fund Guide, a copy of which is in the Library.

DEFENCE

RAF (Radios)

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision on the contract for the supply of management radios for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Aitken: I am pleased to announce that a contract to supply and maintain 6,000 management radios for the Royal Air Force has today been awarded to Phillips Communications Systems Ltd in Cambridge. Contractual details are commercially confidential but the approximate value of the contract is £13 million. The contract was won by Phillips in competition. The radios will be used for secure local communications on RAF bases.

Iraq

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent information he has relating to the prosecution of Iraqi personnel for alleged breaches of international conventions or treaties relating to the conduct of hostilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. The United Nations continues to gather evidence and the United Kingdom is contributing in full to this process. No decisions have been taken on the way forward.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what responsibilities his Department had for the provision of information about Iraqi military capabilities and intentions prior to 2 August 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Within my Department, the defence intelligence staff are responsible for the provision of assessments for the Government on defence policies, intentions and capabilities of any potential enemies.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether compensation payments have now been made to those Ministry of Defence personnel who were held captive by the Iraqi Government after the invasion of Kuwait; and if he will make a statement:

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Compensation payments have been made to those personnel who were forced to abandon personal effects in Kuwait. Personnel held captive by the Iraqi Government after the invasion are submitting claims via the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the United Nations Compensation Commission in accordance with UN resolution 687 and the rules developed by the governing council of the UNCC.

Convention Breaches

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy regarding the prosecution of British service personnel for possible breaches of international conventions or treaties relating to the conduct of hostilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: British service personnel are subject to both domestic and international law at all times. Any allegation that members of our armed forces had contravened the laws of armed conflict would be investigated, and if necessary the evidence would be referred to the appropriate authority for consideration of proceedings against the individuals concerned.

Gulf Trust

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current amount of money in the Gulf Trust; how much money has been paid out by the Gulf Trust in the last 18 months; and how many people have been provided with assistance by the Gulf Trust.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current amount of money in the Gulf Trust, including accrued interest, is £2,854,570. The amount of money paid out by the Gulf Trust in the last 18 months to reimburse the benevolent funds for payments in respect of Gulf related cases is £193,661. Some payments made over the period have yet to be reimbursed from the Gulf Trust. 159 individuals have so far been provided with assistance from the trust together with four charitable bodies and three charitable funds.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has concerning the criteria for payments to be made by the Gulf Trust; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The criteria for payments made by the Gulf Trust are set out in the trust deed. The objectives of the trust are the relief of financial need of the beneficiaries and to relieve sickness, distress or any other physical or mental disability of the beneficiaries insofar as they have arisen or may arise by virtue of the military and other operations relating to or in connection with the Gulf conflict. Provision may also be made for such other charitable purposes for the benefit of the beneficiaries as the united services trustee as trustee of the fund in its absolute discretion, thinks fit.

To be a beneficiary a person must be a member of Her Majesty's armed forces involved in military and other operations relating to or in connection with the Gulf conflict; the civilian personnel attached to or accompanying such members of the armed forces; and their respective dependants. Individual applications for assistance from the Gulf Trust are handled by the service benevolent funds working within the terms of the Gulf trust deed, their own trust deeds and charity law and they apply their normal, established policies in making payments.

Yugoslavia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what recent discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts relating to the deployment of armed forces to (a) Kosovo and (b) the former Yugoslavian republic of Macedonia; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent consideration he has given to the deployment of British armed forces to (a) Kosovo and (b) the former Yugoslavian republic of Macedonia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No consideration has been given to the deployment of British forces into Serbia, of which Kosovo is a province. There is a CSCE civilian observer mission in Kosovo but the United Nations has made no proposals for a deployment there. In the case of Macedonia, United Nations Security Council resolution 795 of 11 December 1992 authorised the deployment there of an infantry battalion and a number of United Nations military observers (UNMOs) and United Nations civil police to provide a monitoring presence on Macedonia's borders with Albania and the former Republic of Yugoslavia. The United Kingdom agreed to a United Nations request to redeploy one United Kingdom UNMO to Macedonia; and to redeploy temporarily nine personnel and three vehicles from the United Kingdom field ambulance unit in Croatia to assist with the provision of medical care for United Nations forces in Macedonia pending the arrival of the Nordic battalion with its own capability. In the event, however, the deployment of the United Kingdom field ambulance personnel was not required.

Belize

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent incursions there have been across the border from Guatemala to Belize which United Kingdom armed forces personnel have attempted to prevent; what discussions Her Majesty's Government held with the Governments of Guatemala and Belize on these incidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There have been no such recent incidents.

Housing

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provisions he has made to publicise the Housing Corporation's do-it-yourself shared ownership scheme to service personnel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The do-it-yourself shared ownership (DIYSO) scheme is widely publicised in the three services. The joint service housing advice office distribute a DIYSO information leaflet, on a monthly basis, to every service unit world-wide via the joint services married quarters sales office bulletins. The Army families advice bureau also circulates the leaflet to all housing commandants, families officers, Army welfare assistants and through resettlement channels. The three service magazines advertise the scheme and there are briefings and presentations to service personnel worldwide.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what means he is taking to encourage the sale of surplus housing to service personnel at a 30 per cent. discount; and what plans he has for raising the discount to serving personnel to a maximum of 60 per cent.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All surplus married quarters which are suitable for individual sale are normally offered to service personnel through the services discount scheme in the first instance. There are no plans to raise the discount to 60 per cent.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by his Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Aitken: The number and value of contracts recorded as placed in the last three years with these firms, and with other businesses which are clearly linked to them, are detailed in the table. Data for 1989-90 and earlier years are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

	1992-93[1]	1991-92	1990-91
Arthur Andersen	nil	nil	2 contracts £370,000
Andersen Consulting	7 contracts £6,450,613	4 contracts £496,147	4 contracts £2,788,922
KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock	4 contracts £203,361	9 contracts £565,850	11 contracts £2,802,179
KPMG Management Consulting	1 contract[2]	nil	nil
Touche Ross & Co.	6 contracts £1,749,875	6 contracts £1,129,552	6 contracts £1,110,437
Touche Ross Management Consultants	9 contracts £1,172,351	13 contracts £802,305	nil
Ernst & Young	nil	1 contract[1]	3 contracts £297,890
Ernst & Young Management Consultants	4 contracts £335,300	5 contracts £559,653	6 contracts £1,234,624
Price Waterhouse	10 contracts £1,145,419	8 contracts £471,122	4 contracts £582,409

[1] All contracts recorded centrally up to end February, but may not include contracts placed in late February.
[2] As it is our practice to treat values of individual contracts as commercially confidential, I am not able to reveal the value of this contract.

It is not possible to identify the duration and nature of each and everyone of these contracts without disproportionate cost.

Homing Pigeons

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what operational establishments of homing pigeons currently exist in Her Majesty's armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Brilliant Pebbles

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent communications he has had with the United States Department of Defense in regard to the Brilliant Pebbles space-based interceptor system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States continues to keep the United Kingdom advised of the progress on all elements of the strategic defence initiative programme. The new administration however has yet to give precise details of its proposed SDI architecture.

Theatre Defence Interceptor

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what orders or research contracts have been placed in the United Kingdom under the Pentagon's strategic defence initiative office for the responsive theatre defence interceptor.

Mr. Aitken: No United States-funded research contracts specifically related to candidate theatre defence interceptors have been awarded to my Department. It is not our practice to give details of individual contracts won directly by United Kingdom firms or universities, although we believe that there are none at present in this category.

Recruitment

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has spent in each of the last three years on manpower recruitment; and how much of this was accounted for by media advertising.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The information in respect of centrally controlled expenditure is as follows:

	Financial years
	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93
	£ million	£ million	£ million
Recruitment	n/a	84·88	72·86
Media advertising	12·01	10·51	7·04

Details of recruitment expenditure other than media advertising, prior to April 1991, are not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Until 1 April 1991 recruitment of centrally funded civilian staff was carried out by the Civil Service Commission and details of expenditure for the Ministry of Defence are therefore unobtainable.

HEALTH

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list, for each of the last five years, the duration, value and nature of contracts awarded by her Department to Arthur Andersen, Andersen Consulting, KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, Touche Ross, Ernst and Young and Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Sackville: The information has been placed in the Library. Information is not readily available before the year 1991-92 nor for the duration of individual contracts.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Hoon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to extend the list of medical conditions which confer exemption from prescription charges to include cystic fibrosis.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) on 25 March at column 696.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to replace free prescriptions entirely with the pre-payment certificate scheme.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people, respectively, in top grades of employment at her Department.

Mr. Sackville: Recruits to senior grades in the Department are selected on merit on the basis of fair and open competition with certain limited and legally permitted exceptions. Various steps have been taken throughout the civil service to aid recruitment from all sectors of the community including equal opportunities training for those involved in selection and the use of validated selection procedures.

The Department supports these initiatives and monitors carefully the results of all recruitment exercises.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when her Department last conducted surveys of (a) ethnic origins and (b) the number of women among its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether she will make a statement;

(2) how many and what percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall in her Department are (a) women, (b) from ethnic minorities and (c) disabled people.

Mr. Sackville: The last survey of ethnic origin conducted in the Department was in December 1992. A further survey is planned later in this year. No special surveys are conducted to determine the number of women employed by the Department as this information is readily available.

The information requested on the number of women, ethnic minority staff and disabled people is shown in the table:

Grade	Total staff (numbers)	Women number	Per cent.	Ethnic minorities number	Per cent.	Disabled people number	Per cent.
1	2	0	—	0	—	0	—
2	5	0	—	0	—	0	—
3	26	6	23·1	0	—	0	—
4	28	7	25·0	0	—	2	7·1
5	193	63	32·6	11	5·7	1	0·5
6	142	49	34·5	4	2·8	0	—
7	557	172	30·8	22	3·9	3	0·5
All Grades (including 1·7)	5,112	2,819	55·1	651	12·7	68	1·3

Notes:
1. Number of staff, based on figures obtained from the Department's personnel computer system as at 24 March 1993.
2. The figures exclude special hospitals, youth treatment service, staff on loan, secondees in to the Department and casual staff of all grades.
3. The figures for disabled people are for Registered Disabled People only.
4. Numbers of ethnic minority staff relate to those responding to the ethnic origin questionnaire.

First Aid

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she has taken in support of the St. John Ambulance Breath of Life campaign launch day; and if she will make a statement as to the importance of first aid education to the public.

Dr. Mawhinney: At the invitation of St. John Ambulance my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched the campaign on 23 March.

Basic resuscitation treatment in the first minute or two after an accident or heart attack can be vital in sustaining life until skilled professional help arrives. The more people who are willing to train in these skills the greater the benefit to the public.

Azapropazone

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the known side-effects of the drug azapropazone; and what steps are taken to draw the attention of patients for whom this drug is prescribed to these side-effects;

(2) whether she will direct that the known side-effects of the drug azapropazone are drawn to the personal attention of the patients for whom this drug is prescribed.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the side effects of azapropazone is given in the British National Formulary, which the Department issues free of charge to all prescribers, and in the data sheet for the product, which is produced by the manufacturer and authorised by the licensing authority. The side effects include photosensitive skin rashes, gastrointestinal bleeding and perforation of peptic ulcers. Blood disorders and kidney damage have been reported rarely. It is for doctors to use their clinical judgment in discussing with the patient the likely benefits and possible side effects associated with their treatment.

New legislation will make it mandatory to provide information to patients on the likely side effects of a medicine either by means of the label or package leaflet. This is intended to supplement the information given to the patient by their doctor.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on how the Medicines Control Agency's opening balance will be financed when it becomes a trading fund on 1 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In order that the Medicines Control Agency can begin trading on 1 April 1993 two separate sums need be paid into the fund's opening balance via a Contingencies Fund advance:

i. £9 million to cover money paid in advance by the pharmaceutical industry up to 31 March 1993, primarily in respect of licence application fees;

ii. £5·1 million to cover the surplus of income over expenditure at 31 March 1993.

Parliamentary approval of this new expenditure will be sought in the 1993-94 estimates for the Department of Health administration, miscellaneous health and personal social services, England vote (class XII, vote 3). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £14·1 million will be met by repayable advances from the Contingency Fund.

Obsessive Disorders

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines her Department has issued to health care professionals for dealing with people who suffer from obsessive and compulsive disorders.

Mr. Yeo: The care and management of people suffering from obsessive-compulsive disorders is a matter for the health professionals involved, taking into account the views of the sufferers and their families.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what counselling is available to people who suffer from phobias, obsessive and compulsive disorders and anxiety attacks.

Mr. Yeo: Counselling may be available through primary care services including counsellors attached to general practitioner practices. Voluntary organisations specialising in such disorders may also provide counselling. Hospital psychiatric departments offer a range of treatments for such disorders, on referral. The Royal College of Psychiatrists has published a patient fact sheet on anxiety and phobias, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding is available for self-help groups which support (a) sufferers of obsessive and compulsive disorders and (b) sufferers who are dependent on benzodiazepines.

Mr. Yeo: Local self-help groups are expected to undertake their own fund raising. Groups constituted as voluntary organisations may apply for funding from social services departments, district health authorities or other local grant-giving agencies such as charitable trusts. In 1993-94 the Department of Health will be grant aiding several national voluntary bodies active in this field, including the National Association for Mental Health (MIND) and Phobia Action.

Ambulance Service

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what arrangements have been made for ambulance staff who have been transferred into trust employment to retain their rights of appeal against disciplinary action or dismissal, formerly involving regional health authorities;

(2) how many appeals relating to disciplinary action or dismissal of ambulance staff have been heard by trust boards in the last available year; and how many applications for hearing appeals have been rejected;

(3) how many appeals relating to disciplinary action or dismissal of ambulance staff have been upheld by trust boards and how many have been dismissed in the last available year.

Dr. Mawhinney: Staff who transfer to national health service trusts with their Whitley terms and conditions of service retain the right to disciplinary appeals procedures outlined in section 40 of the General Whitley Council handbook. Copies are available in the Library. Information on appeals is not available centrally.

Cardiomyoplasty

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what study her Department has made of the use, including that at Manchester's Wythenshawe hospital, of cardiomyoplasty in the treatment of serious heart conditions where previously a heart transplant was seen as the only life-saving option; how many people in the United Kingdom who die prematurely of heart disease each year could be helped by cardiomyoplasty; what action she will be taking in regard to its use; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The place of cardiomyoplasty in the surgical management of cardiac disease is not yet established. It is not possible to estimate the number of people who might benefit. The development of this procedure is being monitored by the Department.

Food Poisoning

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions she has reached from the cumulative data acquired during investigations into food poisoning outbreaks.

Mr. Sackville: The cumulative data acquired is not in itself sufficient to draw firm conclusions. These data provide valuable indicators which prompt further analytical and laboratory investigations.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will introduce legislation to require local authorities to publish the results of food poisoning investigations; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on 15 March at column 6.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what performance standards apply to public sector agencies undertaking the investigation of food poisoning outbreaks; and if these standards are published;

(2) whether she will review the quality of food poisoning outbreak investigations by local authorities to ensure uniformity of standards of inquiry.

Mr. Sackville: There are no uniform performance standards which apply to public sector agencies. The Government have set up an informal working party to produce guidance to all investigating officers on the management of and reporting of foodborne illness.

The Department of Health and the Department of the Environment also issued joint guidance, in October 1991, to health authorities and local authorities reminding them of the collaborative arrangements that should have been made for communicable disease control. A copy is available in the Library.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reports of salmonella food poisoning her Department has received from local authorities either directly or via the public health laboratory for each year since 1987.

Mr. Sackville: Reports of cases of salmonellosis are received via the Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS).

The table shows total of laboratory reports of all salmonellas made to the public health laboratory service:

Salmonella in humans
England and Wales
Annual totals 1987 to 1992

Year	All salmonellas
1987	20,532
1988	27,478
1989	29,998
1990	30,112
1991	27,693
[1]1992	31,352

Source: PHLS/SVS Update on Salmonella Infection.

[1] 1992 data is not directly comparable with previous years because of the introduction from 1 January 1992 of a new Public Health Laboratory Service reporting system for human salmonellosis.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what private bodies are employed by her Department to undertake investigations into food poisoning outbreaks.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of prosecutions made in each EC country for breaches in each country's food hygiene legislation and the total fines realised in each of the last three years.

Mr. Sackville: Member states are required to make an annual return to the Commission which includes the number of infringements of food hygiene legislation, but not specifically details of the number of prosecutions nor of the money collected from fines. The first returns were made in 1992 but have not yet been published by the Commission.

Racial Harassment

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance her Department has given to local authority social service departments in respect of racial harassment; and what steps she has taken to ensure that staff are sufficiently trained to fulfil it.

Mr. Yeo: In 1989 the report of an inter-Departmental group was issued which offered guidance to statutory agencies on the response to racial attacks and harassment. Copies of the report were sent to all directors of social services departments. A progress report was issued in December 1991. Copies of both reports are available in the Library.

Wessex Regional Health Authority

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports were submitted to her Department by Department of Health auditors, by auditors appointed by the Department, by the district auditor or by auditors appointed by the Audit Commission, regarding Wessex regional health authority, in each year since 1984; and, in each case, what was the subject of the report, the date received, and whether it was a public or confidential report.

Mr. Sackville: Information on audit reports submitted to the Department of Health regarding Wessex regional health authority since 1984 is shown in the table. The date given for each is the date on which the report was signed and sent to the Department.

Date	Title and subject	Report prepared by
14 November 1984[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1984 —No issues raised	Department of Health statutory auditors
30 October 1985[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1985 —Sundry creditors —Computer installation: Programmer access to 'live' files —Wessex Kuwait collaboration project—Managerial and financial control —Performance of works consultants	Department of Health statutory auditors
26 September 1986[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1986 —Computer installation (reiteration of 1984-85 report) —Performance of works consultants (reiteration of 1984-85 report)	Department of Health statutory auditors
9 February 1987[1]	Interim report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1987 —The development and procurement of a regional information systems plan (RISP)	Department of Health statutory auditors
9 February 1987	Report In Confidence to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ending 31 March 1987 —The development and procurement of a regional information systems plan (RISP)	Department of Health statutory auditor
25 August 1987[1]	Interim report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1987 —Financial control over regional information systems plan (RISP) expenditure —The recruitment of staff and the use of contract staff in connection with RISP development and existing computing services —The engagement and control of management consultants —Purchase of computers	Department of Health statutory auditors
26 October 1987[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1987 —No other issues raised	Department of Health statutory auditor
29 October 1987	Report In Confidence to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1987 —Consultants' travelling expenses	Department of Health statutory auditor
November 1987	Report In Confidence to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1988 —Regional information systems plan (RISP)	Department of Health statutory auditor
2 November 1988[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1988 —Reiteration of interim audit report dated 25 August 1987	Department of Health statutory auditor

Date	Title and subject	Report prepared by
10 April 1989[1]	Interim report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1989 —Regional computer centre—Inadequate level of security caused by certain staff having access to 'live' files	Department of Health statutory auditor
12 September 1989[1]	Interim report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1989 —Control of capital expenditure—Inadequate control of capital projects	Department of Health statutory auditor
31 October 1989[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1989 —No other issues raised	Department of Health statutory auditor
28 August 1990[1]	Interim report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of the Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1990 —Regional information systems plan (RISP)—Contract and procurement procedures, project management and accounting —Regional computing services as supplied by CIPFA Financial Management (formerly Wessex Information Systems Ltd., WISL)—Contracting arrangements, management control and user requirements	Department of Health statutory auditor
31 October 1990[1]	Report to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1990 —No other issues raised	Department of Health statutory auditor
31 October 1990	Report In Confidence to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1990 —Capital programme and cash management	Department of Health statutory auditor
15 July 1992	Report In Confidence to the Secretary of State on the audit of the accounts of Wessex regional health authority for the year ended 31 March 1991 —A review of the regional information systems plan —A review of Wessex integrated systems contracts 1988-91	District auditor
15 July 1992[1]	Report In The Public Interest: Wessex regional health authority statutory report of the district auditor, Local Government Finance Act 1982, National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990	District auditor

[1] Those reports carried out by the statutory auditor (or district audit service) and submitted to Wessex regional health authority. All other reports were submitted to the Secretary of State "in confidence".

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health at what stage and for what reasons, her Department sought external legal advice about the possible publication of the Health Trac and Qa reports by West Midlands regional health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: No external legal advice was sought by the Department.

Pit Closures

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the health implications of the Government's pit closure programme; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is published evidence of the health hazards of working in the mining industry, and of the consequences for employed people generally and their families of changes in employment status. Health authorities monitor, assess and where appropriate respond to the needs of their local populations.

Care Homes

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to monitor the effects of community care implementation on registered care homes affording generalist provision for single homeless people.

Mr. Yeo: We shall be monitoring the implementation of the new community care arrangements in a variety of ways. As part of this we will be studying how authorities meet the care needs of homeless people.

HIV-AIDS Grant

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 351, if she will describe the process involved which caused the change from the previous answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 800, with regard to HIV/AIDS grant to the London borough of Bromley; how many other local authorities benefited by the same process; and if she will list the comparable figures for each local authority for changes at the same point in the financial year since the introduction of HIV/AIDS grant support to local authorities.

Mr. Sackville: A sum of money was identified from this year's programmed spending which enabled the Department to meet Bromley's late bid. No other authorities received money in this way.

Five Communities Health Authority

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will announce the chairman and members of the Five Communities health authority that will commission planned health provision replacing the former Scunthorpe health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: Mrs. Veronica Pettifer has been appointed as chairman of the new merged Grimsby and Scunthorpe health authority.

The appointment of the members of the new health authority is a matter for Yorkshire regional health authority.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the health implications of the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel and heating; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: None.

Vaccination and Immunisation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number and percentage of (a) general practices and (b) community medical officers in each family health services authority area in England who have reached the vaccination and immunisation higher and lower targets and booster targets as at the latest available date; and if she will make a statement on the combined impact of general practitioner and community medical officer efforts in this area on (i) percentage of all babies being immunised and vaccinated and (ii) incidence of the diseases being immunised and vaccinated against.

Mr. Sackville: The target payments scheme applies only to general practitioners. Details are set out by family health service authority (FHSA) as at 1 April 1992 in the table.

All those in the national health service responsible for immunisation deserve great credit for their efforts during the past four years. The latest national immunisation coverage estimates show acceptance of 95 per cent., for diphtheria, tetanus and polio, 93 per cent. for measles, mumps and rubella, and 91 per cent. for whooping cough; well on the way towards our target of at least 95 per cent. coverage for all these diseases by 1995. Indigenous diphtheria and neonatal tetanus no longer occur, and even measles and whooping cough cases are becoming rare in general practice. No child in England and Wales has died from acute measles-related illness since 1989.

Practice Target Achievement April 1992

FHSA	Vacc and Imm Main Target				Vac and Imm Booster
	Higher		Lower		Higher		Lower
	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
Northern
Cleveland	71	80	17	19	54	61	26	29
Cumbria	95	94	3	3	93	92	5	5
Durham	67	83	11	14	65	80	13	16
Northumberland	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Gateshead	26	76	6	18	23	68	9	26
Newcastle	32	65	11	22	27	55	13	27
North Tyneside	31	86	3	8	25	69	10	28
South Tyneside	24	80	6	20	23	77	4	13
Sunderland	45	85	5	9	30	57	18	34
Yorkshire
Humberside	136	82	26	16	93	56	60	36
North Yorkshire	108	94	5	4	109	95	4	3
Bradford	66	67	19	19	42	43	35	36
Calderdale	25	69	0	0	18	50	7	19
Kirklees	62	77	16	20	52	64	22	27
Leeds	89	67	19	14	76	58	27	20
Wakefield	35	73	7	15	24	50	11	23
Trent
Derbyshire	151	94	3	2	146	91	6	4
Leicester	122	82	16	11	93	62	35	23
Lincolnshire	101	92	7	6	96	87	11	10
Nottingham	158	85	15	8	141	76	25	13
Barnsley	30	75	9	23	23	58	14	35
Doncaster	37	76	11	22	29	59	16	33
Rotherham	27	69	9	23	21	54	13	33
Sheffield	109	93	6	5	79	68	33	28
East Anglia
Cambridge	91	92	6	6	88	89	7	7
Norfolk	103	90	6	5	103	90	7	6
Suffolk	85	98	2	2	83	95	4	5
North West Thames
Bedfordshire	82	80	7	7	69	67	19	18
Hertfordshire	132	87	6	4	126	83	12	8
Barnet	51	65	8	10	45	57	9	11

FHSA	Vacc and Imm Main Target				Vac and Imm Booster
	Higher		Lower		Higher		Lower
	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
Brent and Harrow	82	60	19	14	79	58	15	11
Ealing, Hammersmith, Hounslow	109	60	31	17	97	53	37	20
Hillingdon	39	70	13	23	35	63	13	23
Kensington, Chelsea, Westminster	39	32	13	11	34	28	11	9
North East Thames
Essex	265	93	16	6	255	89	25	9
Barking and Havering	78	77	21	21	64	63	30	30
Camden and Islington	28	26	11	10	21	20	11	10
City and East London	49	28	19	11	40	23	21	12
Enfield and Haringey	71	56	17	14	54	43	21	17
Redbridge and Waltham Forest	60	47	26	20	54	43	26	20
South East Thames
East Sussex	123	84	9	6	114	78	15	10
Kent	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Greenwich and Bexley	53	61	26	30	51	59	25	29
Bromley	40	71	12	21	41	73	9	16
Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
South West Thames
Surrey	138	88	10	6	127	81	20	13
West Sussex	95	85	2	2	91	81	6	5
Croydon	52	74	8	11	41	59	16	23
Kingston and Richmond	55	83	2	3	48	73	11	17
Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth	81	58	21	15	62	44	30	21
Wessex
Dorset	103	95	4	4	106	98	1	1
Hampshire	211	93	8	4	203	90	16	7
Wiltshire	84	94	1	1	85	96	0	0
Isle of Wight	20	100	0	0	19	95	1	5
Oxford
Berkshire	111	85	7	5	108	83	9	7
Buckinghamshire	86	92	3	3	81	87	8	9
Northamptonshire	81	94	4	5	74	86	10	12
Oxfordshire	85	97	0	0	85	97	0	0
South Western
Avon	135	87	7	5	128	83	10	6
Cornwall and Isles of Scilly	77	96	2	3	79	99	0	0
Devon	178	96	4	2	173	94	9	5
Gloucestershire	83	95	2	2	82	94	3	3
Somerset	76	97	1	1	75	96	2	3
West Midlands
Hereford and Worcester	96	90	0	0	91	85	5	5
Shropshire	53	83	10	16	50	78	12	19
Staffordshire	156	80	25	13	133	68	45	23
Warwickshire	62	78	11	14	60	76	12	15
Birmingham	178	68	33	13	168	64	35	13
Coventry	51	74	14	20	54	78	10	14
Dudley	53	90	4	7	50	85	7	12
Sandwell	51	75	12	18	40	59	18	26
Solihull	31	97	1	3	30	94	2	6
Walsall	58	77	15	20	50	67	18	24
Wolverhampton	51	75	10	15	26	38	25	37
Mersey
Cheshire	135	93	4	3	128	88	11	8
Liverpool	52	48	22	20	38	35	19	18
St. Helens and Knowsley	43	57	26	34	24	32	30	39
Sefton	38	69	11	20	34	62	9	16
Wirral	49	70	18	26	46	66	16	23
North Western
Lancashire	228	80	34	12	176	62	53	19
Bolton	45	64	9	13	41	59	10	14
Bury	45	96	1	2	37	79	9	19
Manchester	59	52	28	25	35	31	24	21
Oldham	35	78	9	20	25	56	17	38
Rochdale	32	78	6	15	28	68	6	15
Salford	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Stockport	48	81	10	17	44	75	10	17
Tameside	31	74	8	19	29	69	9	21

FHSA	Vacc and Imm Main Target				Vac and Imm Booster
	Higher		Lower		Higher		Lower
	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
Trafford	46	87	6	11	46	87	6	11
Wigan	42	61	11	16	29	42	13	19

Data are not yet available for four FHSAs: Northumberland; Kent; Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham; and Salford.

Community Care

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals she has to apply citizens charter principles to the defining and recording of unmet need in the health and social services area for those segments of the population benefiting from care in the community.

Mr. Yeo: Our new community care arrangements represent an application of the principles of the citizens charter. Assessment puts the individual at the centre of the process so that services can be tailored to need rather than need to services. We have made clear that the results of assessments and the subsequent care plan should be discussed with users and carers and that authorities should collect and record the information they need to plan to improve their services.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 31 March 1993

DEFENCE

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any of Her Majesty's armed forces (a) have been equipped since 1963 or (b) are currently equipped with United States weapons tipped with depleted uranium; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The only equipment which falls into this category is the US-manufactured Vulcan phalanx close-in weapons system which uses US-manufactured depleted uranium tipped ammunition, and which has been fitted in some Royal Navy surface ships since 1982.

The Army has United Kingdom-manufactured depleted uranium tank ammunition which was procured for, and used during, the Gulf conflict.

Army Static Workshop Productivity Scheme

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Touche Ross was given the task of reviewing the Army static workshop productivity scheme by means of competitive tender.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes. Touche Ross provided the winning bid from six competitors.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of the Touche Ross Army static workshop productivity scheme review.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The fees paid for the report are a matter of commercial confidence between the Ministry of Defence and the company. It is not our practice to disclose such costs.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the defence establishments which were covered by the Touche Ross Army static workshop productivity scheme review.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The review was conducted at a representative sample of three sites:

34 Base Workshop REME, Donnington
35 Base Workshop REME, Old Dalby
31 District Workshop REME, Catterick

A further seven sites will be affected by the review:

18 Base Workshop REME, Bovington
26 District Workshop REME, Stirling
27 District Workshop REME, Warminster
36 District Workshop REME, Colchester
43 District Workshop REME, Aldershot
44 District Workshop REME, Ashford
Engineer Resources Workship REME, Long Marston

Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about defence agency status for the Army static workshops.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Army static workshops in Great Britain are to be established as a defence agency of the Ministry of Defence on 1 April 1993, under the new title of the Army base repair organisation. The Army base repair organisation comprises its headquarters at Andover, a contract repair branch and a network of base and district workshops. Together they employ some 3,581 civilian and 219 military staff.

The role of the Army base repair organisation ranges from minor repair to full refurbishment of equipment for the Army. The chief executive has to ensure that the service is available in peacetime and that it has the capacity to cope immediately with increased workloads in times of crisis and war.

Strategically placed workshops will provide a 24-hour, 365 days a year recovery service in direct support of Army units together with a repair facility to effect repairs beyond the capability of local units. Four workshops will provide an in-depth refurbishment and modification service, which is essential to the operational readiness of Army equipment. In addition, a separate division of the agency will provide a complementary service by contracting with industry for repair and refurbishment of equipments.

As the first chief executive, Brigadier J. R. Drew will be offered new opportunities to build on the current organisation's professional expertise and high performance standards. Through a more commercial approach, the chief executive will actively seek to improve the efficiency and value for money of his organisation.

The chief executive has been set the following targets for 1993-94.

1. To complete the repair programme to plan.
2. By 1 April 1994, to conduct a customer survey of quality and to institute a system for measuring the timeliness of the agency's output and to set improving targets for both.
3. To complete the market test of 18 base workshop by 1 April 1994.
4. To reduce by 5 per cent. the ratio of labour costs to hours of production by 1 April 1994.
5. By 1 October 1993, establish the value and the proportion of risk price contracts placed by the agency, and by 1 April 1994 set targets for increases in 1994-95.
6. To operate a full cost, accruals accounting system by 1 April 1994.

I have arranged for copies of the agency's framework document to be placed in the Library of both Houses.

Management Consultants

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which expenditure heading within his Department's budget includes the cost of employing management consultants; and what has been the total expenditure under this heading, for each of the last five years.

Mr. Aitken: The costs of management consultancy contracts can be attributed to various vote sub-items of the Defence budget. The total costs of employing management consultants for each of the last five years have been as follows:

Financial year	£ million
1987-88	5·140
1988-89	3·109
1989-90	5·292
1990-91	3·935
1991-92	5·700

Heavy Airlift Capability

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Ministry had with the United States Department of Defense on the latter's building up of military heavy airlift capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We maintain regular routine contacts with the United States Department of Defense on a range of issues including discussion of plans for military airlift capability.

Nuclear-powered Warships (Safety Committee)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make it his practice to list the Departments and agencies of Her Majesty's Government which are represented on the nuclear-powered warships safety committee.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The membership of the nuclear-powered warships safety committee includes experts from the Ministry of Defence, Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Department of Health, Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate (Scottish Office), the Atomic Energy Authority, the National Radiological Protection Board and the nuclear installations inspectorate.

Married Quarters

Dr. Blackburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on future plans for the defence married quarters estate.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In February 1992, my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Defence announced that the Ministry of Defence's housing task force had recommended that in order to provide a more responsive and cost-effective housing service for service personnel, the ownership and management of the Department's stock of married quarters in mainland Great Britain should be transferred to a new, non-profit making body in the private sector. The prospective transfer offered the prospect of providing a better planned, better maintained married quarters estate for our service men and service women. Service men and service women would continue to pay rents for their married quarters at levels recommended by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body. My Department has been giving this proposal detailed consideration. I now propose to establish a non-profit making housing trust with a view to negotiating the terms of any eventual transfer to it of a long lease of the married quarters estate. Further detailed work will be required to evaluate and develop the concept before a final decision is taken on how best to proceed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Landlord and Tenant Law

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to implement the recommendations in the Law Commission's report "Landlord and Tenant Law, Privity of Contract and Estate" (Law Com. No. 174).

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government have decided to implement these recommendations for the future leases but not for existing leases. This decision will affect only those agreements entered into after the commencement date of the necessary legislation, which will also provide for a statutory requirement in respect of both future and existing leases to encourage landlords to act promptly when suing for arrears of rent or service charges. Notice of any such claims against a former tenant will in future have to be served within nine months after the money becomes due.

Commercial Court

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of how the dates set for commercial court cases are affected by the changes in the number of judges.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Day-to-day deployment of High Court judges in the Queen's Bench Division is a matter for the Lord Chief Justice, but dates set for cases are affected by a number of factors apart from the availability of judges, including the length of case, interruptions of unplanned emergency business and cases overrunning the time estimates of the parties. In the recent announcement of plans to appoint additional High Court judges it was made clear that the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice had agreed that additional judge power would be made available to address any continuing problems in the commercial court.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what has been the number of commercial court judges in each of the last four years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Under section 6 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, the Lord Chancellor nominates the High Court judges who may be deployed to sit in the commercial court. Apart from the commercial judge himself, who is in charge of the list and who sits full time, the others who sit there are drawn according to need and availability from that pool of nominated judges. The number in the pool fluctuates from time to time because of promotions or retirements. In January 1990 there were 11 nominees and in July 1991 there were 12. At the end of December 1992 there were 10 nominees and at the present time there are 11. Throughout the period the equivalent of either five or six nominated judges have been deployed from the pool by the Lord Chief Justice to sit in the commercial court.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will estimate the time it would take to recover the delays of cases taken from the commercial court list if there were available (a) five, (b) six and (c) seven specialist judges.

Mr. John M. Taylor: There is no fixed time within which cases before the commercial court are expected to come to trial. Dates set for cases are affected by factors beyond the number of judges sitting, including the readiness and availability of the parties and their witnesses. The commercial court operates a system of providing fixed dates and cases are generally listed for dates when parties have indicated they will be ready for trial. Though there has had to be some replanning of lists recently, in relisting cases the convenience of the parties has been taken into account, particularly as many parties and their witnesses are from overseas. It is planned to make additional judge power available to the commercial court and there will be additional flexibility in the range of dates which may be offered to parties.

Land Registration

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the percentage of land acreage in (a) England and (b) Wales which is not currently officially registered.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The hon. Member's question concerns a specific matter on which the chief executive of her Majesty's Land Registry is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from John Manthorpe to Mr. Dafydd Wigley, dated 30 March 1993.

As Chief Executive, it is my responsibility to answer questions on operational matters concerning HM Land Registry. The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has consequently asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question to him concerning the percentage of land acreage in (a) England and (b) Wales which is not currently officially registered.

I regret that statistics relating to registered land acreage are not maintained by the Registry. However, out of an estimated 19·7 million titles in England, 13·6 million are registered and out of an estimated 1·3 million titles in Wales 0·6 million are registered. The majority of registered titles relate to residential properties in urban areas.

I hope you will find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the House library.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make it his policy to bring forward legislation to secure that compulsory registration of all land is undertaken in England and Wales.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Under the existing provisions of the Land Registration Acts, land is compulsorily registered on sale throughout England and Wales. Over 14 million titles are now registered at Her Majesty's Land Registry and this will increase progressively as transactions occur.

In the citizens charter White Paper in November 1992 the Government announced their intention to explore ideas for completing the land register. Her Majesty's Land Registry has now issued a consultation document, "Completing the Land Register in England and Wales", which seeks views on whether the Land Registration Acts should be amended to speed up eventual completion of the register.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. John M. Taylor: In the last 12 months the Lord Chancellor's Department has let 29 commissions for the professional services required to manage its accommodation and develop new court buildings. Previously these services were provided by PSA Services. Lists of the commissions let follow.

The Department is currently market testing its internal audit services. The results will be known in the next few months.

The Lord Chancellor's Department's plans for next year are still under consideration.

The Lord Chancellor is also responsible for two executive agencies, the Public Record Office and Her Majesty's Land Registry. These are separate Government Departments and questions should normally, therefore, refer specifically to them. In this instance, as the questions concern an operational matter on which the chief executives of the agencies are best placed to provide an answer, I have asked them to reply direct.

Estate Management

Group/Circuit	Managing Agent
Kingston Group	Drivers Jonas
M. & O. Circuit	E. C. Harris
M. & O. Circuit	Bernard Thorpe
N. E. Circuit	Bernard Thorpe
HQ Building	PSA (BM) SE
London Group	McBains
N. Circuit	Grimley J. R. Eve
Maidstone Group	McBains
RCJ	Turner & Townsend
Wales & Chester	Torpy

Court building

Scheme	Service	Company
Docklands	Feasibility and design	Kyle Stewart
	Estate surveying	Knight Frank and Rutley
	Quantity surveying	C. F. Baker & Partners
Cardiff	Project management	W. S. Atkins
Crawley	Feasibility and design	PSA Projects
Staines	Feasibility and design	Kyle Stewart
Neath	Project management	W. S. Atkins
	Design	Powell Dobson
	Civil engineering	Travers Morgan

Scheme	Service	Company
Pontypridd	Project management	W. S. Atkins
	Design	Alex Gordon
	Structural engineering	Veryard and Partners
	Civil engineering	Hubert Jenkins
Leicester	Project management	CS Project Management
	Design and engineering	W. F. Johnson and Partners
	Quantity surveying	Silk and Frazier
Newport, Isle of Wight	Project management	TT Project Management
	Design	Rainey Petrie
Bournemouth	Project management	Widnell Project Management

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Spencer Batiste, dated 25 March 1993:

As part of his reply to your recent Parliamentary Question as set out below, the Parliamentary Secretary at the Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to write to you about market testing in the Public Record Office.

Parliamentary Question: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subject to market testing within the next 12 months.

Date appeared: 24 March 1993. For Written Answer: 31 March 1993. PQ reference No. 93/261.

No professional services have been market tested at the Public Record Office within the last 12 months. The only professional service the Office is proposing to test within the next 12 months is internal audit.

If you have any further questions please do not hesitate to ask me.

Letter from John Manthorpe to Mr. Spencer Batiste, dated 30 March 1993:

As Chief Executive, it is my responsibility to answer questions on operational matters concerning Her Majesty's Land Registry. The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has consequently asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question to him concerning the Agency's market testing of professional services.

Within the last 12 months, market testing exercises have been concluded on professional Building Management and Estates services and on certain professional legal services provided to the Land Registry. In both cases, contracts were awarded to organisations from the private sector.

The surveying services provided by both the Ordnance Survey and the Land Registry are currently being market tested but the review has not yet been concluded.

No further professional services are the subject of market testing in the current programme which ends on 30 September 1993. The Registry's programme for the following twelve months has not yet been finalised.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the House Library.

Legal Aid

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department within what period he expects to introduce competitive tendering for legal aid franchises.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Any such developments will be discussed with the Legal Aid Board and the legal profession. No timetable has been set.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions the issue of competitive tendering for franchises to undertake legal aid work has been discussed with members and officials of the Legal Aid Board (a) by Ministers in the Lord Chancellor's Department and (b) officials.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The board has been kept in touch with the Lord Chancellor's thinking on the development of the legal aid scheme in the longer term, but no formal discussions have been held on competitive tendering.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to seek compulsory competitive tendering of legal aid work.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Competitive tendering may be an appropriate longer-term arrangement for the provision of certain publicly funded legal services. The Legal Aid Board and the legal profession will be consulted at the appropriate time.

Mary Winch

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) if he will order a full investigation into the case of Mary Winch previously of Caernarfon now of Eastbourne; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to be able to reply to letters concerning Miss Mary Winch dated June 1991, 12 August 1991, 26 September 1991, 11 October 1991, 26 October 1991 and 16 May 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Miss Mary Winch has taken legal action against the public trustee which has not yet concluded. It would not be appropriate to comment whilst those proceedings are before the courts.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Prosecutions

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Attorney-General what amendment he proposes to make to the undertaking given by the Solicitor-General on 25 April 1986 in relation to the reinstitution of proceedings which have been terminated, consequent upon the post of deputy Director of Public Prosecutions being put into abeyance.

The Attorney-General: The hon. Member refers to an assurance given during the course of the debate on 25 April 1986, at column 640, on prosecution policy.

The fundamental consideration remains that individuals should be able to rely on decisions taken by the prosecuting authorities. The policy of the Director of Public Prosecutions is that a decision to terminate proceedings or not to prosecute should not, in the absence of special circumstances, be altered once it has been communicated to the defendant or prospective defendant unless it was taken and expressed to be taken because the evidence was insufficient. In such a case it would be appropriate to reconsider the decision if further significant evidence were to become available at a later date—especially if the alleged offence is a serious one.

Special circumstances which might justify departure from this policy include:

(1) rare cases where reconsiderations of the original decision show that it was not justified and the maintenance of confidence in the criminal justice system requires that a prosecution be brought notwithstanding the earlier decision; and

(2) those cases where termination has been effected specifically with a view to the collection and preparation of the necessary evidence which is thought likely to become available in the fairly near future. In such circumstances the CPS will advise the defendant of the possibility that proceedings will be re-instituted.

In the circumstances described at 1 and 2 the decision will be taken at chief crown prosecutor level with effect from 1 April 1993.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Appointments

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the report of the review of public appointments.

The Prime Minister: I will arrange for a copy of the latest report of the review of public appointments (1989) to be placed in the Library of the House.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister if he will now publish the report of the Central Policy Review Staff in 1973 on the system of public appointments.

The Prime Minister: I do not know of such a report. The hon. Member may have in mind an inter-departmental working party of officials in 1974 which studied certain aspects of appointments in the public sector. Their advice recommended the establishment of the public appointments unit. I will arrange for a copy of the working party's report to be placed in the Library of the House.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those non-departmental public bodies which (a) have been abolished since 1979 and (b) have been established since 1979.

The Prime Minister: A full list of non-departmental public bodies in existence for each year since 1979 is available in the following publications: "Report on Non-Departmental Public Bodies" (Pliatzky Report, Cmnd 7797, January 1980), "Non-Departmental Public Bodies: Facts and Figures 1980", "Non-Departmental Public Bodies: Facts and Figures 1981", and "Public Bodies" published annually from 1982. Copies of these publications are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

For each year since 1986, a press notice has listed separately public bodies which have been created and abolished. Copies are being sent to the hon. Member, and to the Libraries of both Houses. Such summary data for the years 1979 to 1985 do not exist, and could be reconstructed only at disproportionate cost.

Coal Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) on 25 March, Official Report, column 1223, if he will set out a detailed itemised breakdown of the annual expenditure of £18 billion invested in the British coal industry since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Grant aid made available to the coal industry since 1979 is set out in the table:

Grants[1] to British Coal and payments under the Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme[2]

Financial year	Deficit and Deficiency Grants £ million	Operating Grants £ million	Social and Restructuring Grants £ million	Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme[2] £ million	Total £ million
1979-80	159	30	62	15	266
1980-81	149	26	79	15	269
1981-82	428	27	120	48	623
1982-83	374	12	134	80	600
1983-84	875	—	270	190	1,335
1984-85	2,225	—	189	200	2,614
1985-86	50	—	513	563	1,126
1986-87	288	—	594	610	1,492
1987-88	200	—	477	295	972
1988-89	0	—	297	168	465
1989-90	6,153	—	1,090	126	7,369
1990-91	0	—	141	93	234
1991-92	0	—	457	61	518
1992-93[3]	0	—	622	43	665
TOTAL	10,901	95	5,045	2,507	18,548

[1] Grants to British Coal are at outturn prices, on an accruals basis, taken from British Coal's Annual Report and Accounts.
[2] Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme. Figures exclude administration costs.
[3] 1992-93 figures provisional.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 467, if it is Her Majesty's Government's policy that a cessation of United Kingdom underground nuclear tests is dependent on the negotiations of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

The Prime Minister: Our policy has always been to keep our testing programme to the minimum necessary to maintain the safety and credibility of our deterrent. In the absence of a comprehensive test ban, whether we continued to test would naturally depend on our needs at the time, and whether they could be met by means other than testing. We believe any restraints on testing should be negotiated and verifiable.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the effect on the United Kingdom of legal and other restrictions applying to states to prevent their conducting nuclear tests.

The Prime Minister: The effect would depend on the scope and nature of such restrictions. If backed by effective verification and inspection mechanisms they could play a useful part in strengthening the nuclear non-proliferation regime. In our approach to these issues we shall be seeking an outcome which ensures this objective is achieved, but which enables us to maintain the safety and credibility of our deterrent.

Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what detailed measures he is taking to satisfy himself that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise possess the expertise in timber technology to assess whether imports come from legal or illegal sources in relation to CITES.

The Prime Minister: In their enforcement of the CITES controls Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are assisted by a wide range of qualified experts from outside the Department. Where the identification of particular specimens of timber and their sources is necessary Customs will continue to seek the advice of qualified experts in this field.

Council Tax (Care Homes)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what consultation there has been between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Health on the imposition of council tax on charitable residential care accommodation ; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The two Departments have discussed a number of representations which have argued that residential care homes should be exempted from the council tax. Care homes will receive a number of reliefs, which will together mean that their council tax bills will be small. These bills represent a reasonable contribution to the cost of the local authority services from which care homes and their residents benefit.

Security Service

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the commissioner appointed under the Security Service Act 1989 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's third annual report, for 1992, has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 4(6) of the Security Service Act 1989. The confidential appendix to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 4(7) of the 1989 Act. I am grateful to the commissioner for his work in reviewing the issue of warrants and in providing assistance to the tribunal as provided in the Act. I note that he is satisfied that the Secretaries of State have properly exercised their powers under the Act and that the arrangements in force for ensuring that the service discloses information only in accordance with the provisions of the 1989 Act are working satisfactorily.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the commissioner appointed under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A copy of the right hon. Sir Thomas Bingham's first report, covering 1992, has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(7) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The confidential appendix to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(8) of the 1985 Act. I am grateful to the commissioner for his report. I note in particular his observations that the Secretaries of State take great care to satisfy themselves that the warrants are necessary for the purposes stated in the Act, and that the system for the issue of warrants is working as intended by Parliament.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Advertisements

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to produce a code of practice on the use of women in advertisements.

Mr. Leigh: The codes of advertising practice administered by the advertisting industry's self-regulatory bodies require that advertisements be legal, decent, honest and truthful. Complaints about advertisements are judged against the prevailing standards of decency and acceptability and a separate code concerning the portrayal of women in advertising is unnecessary.

British Approvals Board for Telecommunications

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how long is the average time taken for a modem to receive BABT approval; and what steps he intends to take about misleading advertisements which do not clearly state when advertised modems are unapproved.

Mr. Leigh: The time taken for a modem to receive British Approvals Board of Telecommunications approval will vary greatly according to the design and complexity of the equipment, whether or not it complies with the standards, or requires further work by the applicant before compliance is achieved. BABT statistics indicate that a fully compliant "standard" modem, requiring no alteration at the testing stage, will take six to eight weeks from the date of acceptance of the test sample by the laboratory to the issue by BABT of the type approval. BABT would expect to take two weeks of that period to evaluate test results, manufacturing details and documentation and, if satisfied, issue the certificate. The minimum recorded time is three weeks from application to approval.

Advertisement and display of the approval status of telecommunications terminal equipment is a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications. He takes whatever action is appropriate to enforce the orders. The Department and Oftel, in consultation with manufacturers, operators and users, will continue to monitor and review the operation of the advertising orders.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the current procedures for the obtaining of BABT approval for devices connected to the public telephone network, the length of time such approvals take and on his assessment of the need for the approval system as it currently operates.

Mr. Leigh: In common with virtually all developed countries, telecommunications terminal equipment must be approved before it can be legally connected to the United Kingdom public telecommunications network in order to protect the PTN, and its operators and users, from harm.

The British Approvals Board for Telecommunications is the approval authority in the United Kingdom for all types of telecommunications terminal equipment. It evaluates the applications, accompanying documentation, manufacturing details and test results on the equipment and, if satisfied, issues a type approval. As far as categorisation is possible, a "typical" type approval, for a single-line apparatus, would be expected to take eight to 12 weeks from the date the applicant submits a sample of the product to one of the five designated laboratories, to the issue of the type approval by BABT. The time spent at the test laboratory, in particular, necessarily varies greatly; major determinants include the complexity of the equipment and the level of testing required, whether the equipment passes first time or fails part of the testing schedule, needs adjustment by the manufacturer and testing again. For its part, BABT will normally carry out evaluation and issue of the approval within two weeks for a compliant product.

The United Kingdom is an acknowledged leader in Europe in liberalisation of equipment approvals procedures. Consistent with our EC obligations, we will continue to review, with BABT, Oftel and terminal manufacturers, network operators and users, ways of simplifying the United Kingdom approvals regime.

Assisted Area Status (Portsmouth)

Mr. David Martin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make an announcement on the result of the application by Portsmouth for assisted area status.

Mr. Heseltine: The needs and circumstances of all areas are being carefully considered in the assisted areas map review. The results will be announced as soon as possible, after the necessary clearance of the European Commission.

Cohesion Instrument and Fund

Mr. Milligan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he will take to ensure that all projects supported by the EC cohesion instrument and fund comply with EC environmental legislation and policy.

Mr. Eggar: The regulation governing the cohesion financial instrument will require the Commission to satisfy itself, before approving a project and during its implementation, that it complies with EC environmental legislation and policies, including where appropriate the carrying out of environmental impact assessments.

Energy Technology

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the criteria by which his Department assesses which energy technologies should receive research and development funding from his Department.

Mr. Eggar: My Department is currently carrying out a review of the basis of its support for science, technology, and innovation. Pending the outcome of that review, the aims of the Department in funding R and D into energy technologies remain broadly as they were for the former Department of Energy:

(a) to support work which would not otherwise be undertaken on an appropriate timescale or to the necessary extent to:
  (i) contribute to the maximum economic exploitation of the United Kingdom's energy resources;
  (ii) establish and develop economic options for energy supply and distribution;
  (iii) enable the Department to carry out its statutory and regulatory responsibilities;

(b) to encourage United Kingdom industry to develop capabilities, services, and technologies which will enable them to compete successfully in energy markets;

(c) to ensure the effective dissemination of the results of R and D work.

Trading Standards

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to transfer responsibility for the enforcement of part 2 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 from his departmental officials to local trading standards officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: Part 2 of the Fair Trading Act concerns references to the Consumer Protection Advisory Committee and contains no enforcement provisions.

Direct Selling

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made as to the enforcement of the current legislation covering direct selling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: We are reviewing the legislation governing pyramid selling and similar trading schemes.

EC Regional Funds

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will now give his support to Britain seeking objective 2 status for the London region from the European Community.

Mr. Heseltine: The criteria for eligibility under objective 2 for the period from 1994 will be decided during the review of the structural funds regulations which has just begun. I do not expect decisions on the designation of specific areas to arise before the summer. It would therefore be premature to state now to which, if any, particular areas, we can give support.

Car Industry

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will meet a delegation of Ford representatives of employees, hon. Members and Members of the European Parliament at an early opportunity to discuss the future of the British car industry.

Mr. Heseltine: I have regular contact with people throughout the British motor industry. In particular my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and I met Ford senior management in January and discussed a wide range of issues with them. Further, last October my right hon. Friend met a delegation of Ford representatives and others led by the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) and Carole Tongue, MEP for London East.

If the hon. Member, however, has specific issues about the industry that he wishes to raise I suggest that he write to me setting out his concerns.

Insurance Companies

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any insurance company is currently in breach of its solvency margin.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Yes, and those that are in breach are the focus of regulatory action.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what exemptions from normal Companies Acts disclosures are allowed to insurance companies.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: They are entitled to draw up their accounts in accordance with schedule 9A of the 1985 Companies Act, instead of the usual schedule 4, and may obtain various exemptions from disclosure in that way.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the required solvency margins of insurance companies; what monitoring of these margins is undertaken by his Department; and in what form the results of this monitoring are published.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The margin of solvency for each insurance company is determined in accordance with part II of the Insurance Companies Regulations 1981. The principal method of monitoring the margin is the examination of the annual accounts and statements submitted in accordance with the Insurance Companies (Accounts and Statements) Regulations 1983. Copies of these accounts and statements, which include the solvency margin calculation, are available from Companies House. The Department's own monitoring results are not published.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether insurance companies are required to show equity assets at current market values in their accounts.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: In their accounts filed under the Companies Act 1985, schedule 9A allows equity assets to be valued at either cost or market value. In the annual returns made under the Insurance Companies Act 1982 it is normal to show equity assets at middle market value in accordance with section 46 of the Insurance Companies Regulations 1981.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action his Department takes when it discovers an insurance company has breached its solvency margin.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Department issues a notice in accordance with either section 32 or section 33 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 requiring the company to submit a plan to restore a sound financial position or, in the case of the latter, a short-term financial scheme. It is also usual practice to hold a meeting with the company as a matter of urgency to try and establish what has caused the breach and to discuss remedies.

Sub-Post Offices

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many sub-post offices have been proposed for closure since 1 October 1992; and how many were proposed for closure in the period between 1 April 1992 and 1 October 1992.

Mr. Leigh: Post Office Counters Ltd. has proposed 16 sub-post offices for closure since 1 October 1992, of which five have closed to date. Between 1 April 1992 and 1 October 1992, 25 sub-post offices were proposed for closure of which 23 have closed to date.

In addition, closures may occur, particularly in rural areas, where it has not been possible to find suitable replacement candidates for sub-postmasterships.

Wind Energy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to promote participation in the one-day workshop on local community wind energy projects being held at the Open university on 22 April, sponsored by his Department.

Mr. Eggar: My Department has agreed to provide £2,000 towards the running costs of this workshop, which is being organised by the British Wind Energy Association and the Energy and Environment Research Unit of the Open university. The promotion of participation in the workshop is the joint responsibility of those organisations.

Nuclear Installations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the reasons why it is not practicable to supply full design information questionnaires on nuclear installations for the purpose of safeguards as stated in departmental memorandum EC/4140/93 on SEC(92)2360, at paragraph 5.1, dated 5 March.

Mr. Eggar: Much of the safeguards design information, which the present amendment envisages operators providing for new nuclear installations under the proposed new article 2 to the Regulation (Euratom) 3227/76, may not be available nine months before commencement of construction of an installation.

Electrical Goods

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to implement compulsory electro-magnetic compatibility testing for certain electrical goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have no plans to implement compulsory electromagnetic compatibility testing for electrical/electronic products. The European Community directive on electromagnetic compatibility (89/336/EEC) was adopted in May 1989 and the United Kingdom regulations (SI 1992/2372) came into force in October 1992. They set down the basis for satisfying the essential protection requirements of the directive and the routes for demonstrating compliance. The most common route is likely to be by reference to harmonised standards and these determine, among other things, the tests which manufacturers may wish to conduct or have conducted on their behalf.

It is the responsibility of the manufacturer to decide which route to compliance is the most appropriate to ensure that the performance of his product satisfies the protection requirements of the directive.

Fuel Cell Technology

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the value of current assistance provided to British firms to help the development of fuel cell technology; and what forms such assistance takes.

Mr. Eggar: My Department promotes the development of solid oxide and solid polymer fuel cell systems through its advanced fuel cell R and D programme. Under this programme financial assistance is available for appropriate projects and the results are disseminated in order to guide future work. The programme budget for 1993-94 is £1·1 million.

South Africa

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on how British companies have complied with the European Community code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa during the 12-month period to 30 June 1992.

Mr. Heseltine: By 1 March 1993, 100 companies had submitted reports to the DTI under the code of conduct. Copies of the reports and of the Department's analysis and summary have, as in previous years, been placed in the Library of each House. These documents may also be inspected at the Department's export market information centre, at the British embassy in Pretoria, at the British consulate-general in Johannesburg, and at the British consulates in Cape Town and Durban.

The analysis and summary is the seventh since the adoption of the revised code of conduct by EC Foreign Ministers in November 1985. Reports were received from all British companies, except two, whose interests are known or believed to warrant a full report under the code. The two companies not reporting were reminded of the existence of the code and of the importance the Government attach to it.

The reporting period under review has seen a further decrease in the number of black employees of British subsidiaries being paid below the code's recommended minimum level. Companies' reports indicated that nearly 99 per cent. of employees were paid above this level.

The level of companies' involvement with trade unions representing black workers was maintained, with the majority of companies reporting formal involvement with the trades unions. Many companies have taken steps to alleviate the particular hardships experienced by their migrant workers.

As in previous years, all companies provided "on-the-job" training and many provided additional training facilities. Companies continued to report impressive levels of involvement in projects benefiting not only their employees and their families but the wider communities from which their work forces were drawn. Companies also continued to encourage the growth of black business.

The period covered by the report has seen the continuation of the recession in South Africa, with unemployment steadily increasing. Progress on the political front has been slower than expected. However, positive steps have been taken towards the achievement of a new democratic constitution and we hope that this will be taken forward when multi-party talks resume early next month.

The Government are once more grateful to companies for their continued co-operation in providing reports and urge them to maintain this performance and to comply fully with the code.

Export Intelligence Service

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will announce the results of his review of his Department's export intelligence service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: A study was conducted for my Department by consultants KPMG and I am grateful to all those who contributed to it. I have accepted the key finding of the review that the present system of matching United Kingdom firms expressed export interests with business opportunities reported from abroad does not fully meet the needs either of the United Kingdom which subscribe to it or of the potential foreign buyers seeking a United Kingdom source of supply of goods and services. But the review did conclude that the system generated some £200 million of extra exports annually. I have therefore decided that these sales justify continuation of export intelligence, but with operational improvements and the creation of a parallel source of supply system to answer foreign buyers' inquiries.

The contract signed in 1989, now with Prelink Ltd., to operate the marketing, matching and distribution of export intelligence has generally worked well. Consequently, I have decided to accept its proposal for introducing the changes to export intelligence and for setting up a new source of supply service from 1 April 1993. I am extending its contract to 31 March 1998.

Opencast Coal Mining

Mr. Dover: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was (a) the contribution to British Coal from privately operated opencast sites and (b) the subsidy to British Coal from the Exchequer for the latest year for which both figures are available.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The contribution to British Coal from private sector licensed opencast sites is not recorded separately in their accounts. However, the total royalties receivable from licensed opencast sites and deep mines amounted to £14 million in 1991-92. The corporation's opencast sites are operated by private sector contractors and generated an operating profit of £171 million in that year. Government grant income credited to the corporation's accounts in that year was £457 million.

Fuel Costs

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the expected effect of the imposition of value added tax for domestic fuel bills on (a) energy consumption, (b) the demand for electricity and (c) the market for coal-fired electricity.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The impact of introducing VAT at the standard rate would reduce energy consumption and electricity demand in the aggregate by less than 1 per cent. Decisions in the market place would determine the effect on coal-fired among sources of electricity.

Aviation Committee

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how often Ministry of Defence representatives have attended meetings of the aviation committee in each of the last three years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: Representatives of the Ministry of Defence or its agencies have attended every meeting of the aviation committee held over the last three years.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the aviation committee was established within his Department.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: The answer is 1986.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions in each year the aviation committee has met.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: The Aviation Committee has met on three occasions each year except for 1986 when it met twice, 1987 when it met on four occasions, and 1989 when it met once.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the current membership of the aviation committee.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry gave on 11 February 1993, Official Report, column 720.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the launch aid given to each sector of the manufacturing industry in each of the last five years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: Launch aid is provided under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 and is available only to the aerospace industry. Launch aid received by the aerospace industry in each of the last five years is as follows:

	£ million
1992-93	31·3
1991-92	78·7
1990-91	141·1
1989-90	133·6
1988-89	98·4

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the projected launch aid to be given to each sector of the manufacturing industry for each of the next two financial years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: Launch aid is provided under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 and is available only to the aerospace industry. Projected launch aid to be given in 1993-94 is £2·6 million. At this stage there are no plans to provide launch aid in 1994-95.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the repayments of launch aid made by each sector of manufacturing industry for each of the last five years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 March 1993]: Launch aid is provided under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 and is only available to the aerospace industry. Repayments of launch aid received by the aerospace industry in each of the last five years is as follows:

	£ millions
1992-93	69·5
1991-92	82·9
1990-91	51·8
1989-90	41·9
1988-89	19·9

Coal Mines

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will ensure that, as part of any deregulation steps being taken by the Government in relation to the coal mines, there is full discussion with the trade unions on questions relating to safety standards in private coal mines; and if he will consult the Health and Safety Executive before taking any final decisions.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 30 March 1993]: The Government are determined that there should be no lowering of safety standards in coal mines. It is for the Health and Safety Commission and its executive to regulate safety in the coal industry in consultation with all interested bodies, including the trade unions. My Department will continue to keep the Commission informed about developments in the industry.

Timber and Paper Products

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many prosecutions have been brought under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, concerning claims of the environmental friendliness and sustainability of timber and paper products in each of the last five years; and how many such prosecutions have been successful in each year.

Mr. Leigh [pursuant to his answer, 28 January 1993, column 817]: It has been brought to my attention that the statistics provided in that answer were incorrect. Regrettably, those statistics, which were produced by the Office of Fair Trading, concerned prosecutions under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 involving all types of statement, rather than only environmental claims, about timber and paper products. In fact, none of the prosecutions covered by the statistics involved environmental claims. Thus, my reply should have stated that the OFT has not been notified of any prosecutions by local authorities under the TDA concerning claims of the environmental friendliness and sustainability of timber and paper products over the last five years—1988 to 1992 inclusive. I offer my apologies to the House for giving incorrect information in my original reply.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Market Testing

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which Departments appointed consultants or accountancy firms as advisers on market testing after seeking competitive bids.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not held centrally.

European Social Science Project

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 24 March, Official Report, column 604, on costs of European science projects, if he will list the annual costs of the four largest European social science research projects.

Mr. Jackson: Full information is not available. The following are the four largest social science research projects within Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) funded centres which have received European Community (EC) funding and which have a European dimension:

1. The ELSNET (Network of Excellence in Language and Speech), operated by the ESRC-funded Research Centre in Human Communication at the University of Edinburgh, is wholly supported by European Community (EC) funding at a cost of £162,000 per annum.
